Reed has made a couple of high-profile appearances this year with his younger admirers, playing with the Strokes at the Rolling Stone 1,000th-issue party in May, then fronting the Raconteurs for a thrilling version of the VU's "White Light/White Heat" at the MTV Video Music Awards show in August.

"Oh, they were awesome," Reed says of the Raconteurs, a side project for White Stripes frontman Jack White. "I wish they would back me for the next year, but everybody would just stare at Jack."

Reed says he is impressed by the musical talent of the younger generation but emphasizes that "in the end, it's the writer."

"There's always going to be great singers, great players, but they have to play something," he says. "If you don't have a Tennessee Williams, you don't have 'A Streetcar Named Desire,' even though you've got Marlon Brando. What's he gonna do, sit and read the Yellow Pages?"

Reed claims not to be "conversant" enough to identify the great lyric writers of today, but then he mentions a few names: Bright Eyes, Beck, Radiohead.

"Which one of them is the Tennessee Williams? I'm not a critic," he says. "But those are people where you can listen to it and not be offended, you know what I mean? They're trying to go a little deeper."

Reed hasn't released a new album since 2003's "The Raven," a sprawling two-CD work inspired by Edgar Allan Poe, but he has been keeping busy. Earlier this year, he released his second book of photography, "Lou Reed's New York," and he recently created a soundtrack of electronic music for an instructional DVD by his tai chi teacher, Master Ren Guangyi. He also served as its narrator.

His latest project is a stage version of his concept album "Berlin" from 1973, to be performed in upcoming months in New York and Australia. A profoundly dark song cycle, lavishly produced by Bob Ezrin (Pink Floyd's "The Wall"), the album was savaged by many critics upon its release. Now notables such as Ezrin, producer Hal Willner, visual artist Julian Schnabel and singer Antony are lending their talents to bring it to the stage for the first time.

was trying to get back to religion that focuses on unity and love." As a former member of The Melody Makers Ziggy has moved on to become his own artist.

The Arizona Republic calls Ziggy Marley's music "reggae jammin' for the new generation," in which Marley adds, "[reggae] resonates at the core of the human soul. The message, the sound, the beat of reggae, it vibrates the spirit."

Along with Marley's musical influence, he is spreading love in other ways. He has established an organization called U.R.G.E., Unlimited Resource Giving Enlightenment, which is non-profit and supports a wide range of issues involving the children of Jamaica, Ethopia, and other developing countries. It has been reported that his most recent concern and support has gone towards the Youth AIDS Campaign.

He has released five different albums since his career has commenced. Four of them are solo albums and "Love is My Religion" is his first full CD that consists of a dozen original songs by the legendary descendant. You can download the songs from his Web site if you have Itunes to see what you're in store for.

He also has a DVD released called "Life and Debt" which is a documentary that portray's Jamaica's economic decline in the 20th Century. Renowned songs by Bob Marley are scattered through it as it portrays the everyday lives of some select Jamaican's. You can also check out music video's in the "media" section of the site if you still need to be convinced that this is a concert that must be seen.

Trevor Hall is opening for Marley Saturday night. Doors open at 7:30 p.m. and the show starts at 8 p.m. Tickets are $29 in advance and $34 at the door. To find out more about Ziggy Marley and his organization, U.R.G.E., visit www.ziggymarley.com. There is a section on the U.R.G.E. organization and multiple links that address global concerns like health and environment, hunger, and the economic impact of aids.

If you have other plans this Saturday, you can catch him on tour in on Friday, November 10 in Providence, Rhode Island at Lupo's Heartbreak Hotel. Or even in Boston on Sunday November 12 at The Roxy. That's a whole weekend of Marley and each performance is a mere hop, skip, and a jump away. Northampton is the most convenient so be sure to make it to The Calvin Theatre if you are interested in a love-filled night of reggea brilliance.

Ziggy Marley brings his 'Love is my Religion' tour to Northampton's Calvin Theatre on Saturday night.

Turkish star says he's Borat

BY SUZAN FRASAR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ANKARA, Turkey (AP) — A Turkish Internet celebrity is so convinced he was the inspiration for Sacha Baron Cohen's "Borat" character, he's traveling to London seeking an apology and a way to get paid from the film's surprise success.

Mahir Cagri, 44, became a cyber celebrity after posting a personal Web site in 1999, featuring unintentionally amusing photos of himself playing pingpong or the accordion and sunbathing in a skimpy bathing suit. Fans were captivated by his broken English and hilarious invitation to women: "Who is want to come TURKEY I can invitate ... She can stay my home."

"The world knows he is copying Mahir," Cagri told The Associated Press in a telephone interview from his hometown of Izmir on Monday, minutes before he was to board a plane for Istanbul to appear on a talk show.

"I am not saying this – the world is. I have received so many e-mails from people in the United States who tell me he is imitating me," he said.

Cagri, a freelance journalist, was scheduled to fly to London on Tuesday for meetings with his manager and lawyer there to discuss his options and hold interviews with British newspapers. He hopes to receive an "acknowledgment or an apology" from Baron Cohen.

"The bombshell is going to fall," he said of his London trip. "(Cohen) is making money by using me."

The title character in the movie "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan" was first developed for "Da Ali G Show" on HBO. The 20th Century Fox movie took in $26.5 million in the U.S. its opening weekend, more than any other film.

On the commentary track to the DVD of "Da Ali G Show," Baron Cohen says Borat was influenced by someone he met in southern Russia.

"I can't remember his name – he was a doctor" Baron Cohen said. "The moment I met him, I was totally crying. He was a hysterically funny guy, albeit totally unintentionally."

Cahoon recruits faster players

Many times the small confines change the way the game is played in these arenas.

"It gets very chaotic out there. Beyond that it gets to the point where everything happens so fast – you don't have much time or much space," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "The game gets pretty hectic and sloppy. Then when the puck wasn't sitting down it made it all the much worse. I was just really happy we were able to play a pretty solid third period after we let it get away from us in the second."

In recent years Cahoon has been recruiting speedy players such as sophomore Chris Davis and freshman Will Ortiz – to take advantage of the home rink's dimensions. The ice at Mullins Center is 200 feet by 95 feet, a full 10 feet wider than Schneider.

Mullins Center's rink is the second-largest in the conference Towse Rink at the Whittemore Center in Durham, N.H. is five feet wider at 200 by 100.

SERIOUS INJURY AVERTED

Every one of the 4,116 fans in attendance held their breath when junior Matt Burto went crashing head first into the boards in Friday night's 4-1 UMass win over the Friars.

In the third period Burto had control of the puck and advanced on the Providence goal. After getting a shot off on Friars' goalie Tyler Sims, Burto lost his footing and went hurtling into the boards.

It appeared that his left shoulder and head took the brunt of the impact. Burto lay motionless on the ice when Sims skated over and immediately called for UMass trainers.

After Saturday's game, Cahoon said that, thankfully, Burto had averted a serious injury, but was day-to-day.

"He looked a whole lot better [Saturday]," the coach said. "He spent part of the night [Friday] night in the hospital for observation and he was doing so well that they let him go home. That's all positive stuff and now it's just a question of giving him enough time to mend."

There is no indication of when Burto will get back on the ice.

NATIONAL CONSIDERATION

UMass received 78 votes in this week's USCHO.com/CSTV college hockey poll. Although it is not quite enough to crack the Top 20, the Minutemen garnered far more consideration than the 12 votes they earned last week.

The Minutemen sit atop the conference tied with UML and Boston University. Each team has six conference points.

KAREN WINKLER/COLLEGIAN

Goaltender Jon Quick and the Minutemen swept a home-and-home series from the Providence Friars this weekend with two wins.

Temple moves on without Cheney for their respective squads will be Temple guard Marty Collins and George Washington's Danilo Pinnock, who were both selected in the 2006 NBA draft.

The New York Knicks selected Collins with the 29th pick in the first round. Collins ended his Temple career fourth on the school's all-time scoring list with 1,919 points and led the Owls in scoring with 16.8 points, 4.0 assists, and 2.8 steals per game last season. Pinnock was drafted 28th in the second round by the Dallas Mavericks The former GW standout averaged 14.5 points per game last season, 5.3 rebounds per game and was second in assists (3.1).

REVOLVING DOOR

Receiving the head coaching job at Duquesne has not spelt success recently. Ron Everhart hopes he's the coach to avoid the almost inevitable revolving door at Duquesne. The former Northeastern coach is the sixth coach in Duquesne since 1989. But with just two returning players and a team which has only won five conference games in as many years, the road to resurrection will be a tough one. The Dukes went 3-24 last season and have not had a winning season in 12 years.

A difficult job only got tougher when five players on the Duquesne squad – Northeastern transfer Shawn James, Siena transfer Kojo Mensah, transfer Stuard Baldonado, guard Aaron Jackson, and junior college transfer Sam Ashaolu – were all shot on the Duquesne campus in September. Ashaulso suffered head wounds from the shooting that endangered his life. It is yet to be determined whether he'll ever to play basketball again. Jackson was one of the two returning players for the Dukes this season.

NO EASY ROAD TO FOLLOW

UMass has a formidable out-of-conference schedule this season in preparation for the A-10 portion of its season. The Maroon and White travel to the No. 5 Pittsburgh Panthers on Nov. 18 and then square off against state rival, No. 15 Boston College on Dec. 2 at the Mullins Center. UMass coach Travis Ford brings his team into the Bluegrass state to take on his alma mater, the No. 22 Kentucky Wildcats, and Rick Pitino's Louisville Cardinals in back-to-back games in mid-December.

"Every single day I wake up, I'm more concerned about that, that I bit off more than I can chew," Ford said.

Saint Louis triumphs in A-10 Tournament

Outstanding Player award for her success in the tournament.

Having earned the conference's automatic bid into the NCAA tournament, Saint Louis will face Drake (12-5-2) in the first round. The Billikens will host the match at the Robert R. Hermann Stadium in Saint Louis on Friday, Nov. 10.

SLU will play the winner of the game between third-seeded Illinois (14-7-0) and Southeast Missouri State (10-7-2). Saint Louis defeated both those squads during the regular season.

If Saint Louis can slip past Drake, then the Billikens should be in good position to win their second-round match and advance to the third round. Looking even further down the line, Saint Louis would face the No. 2 seed Florida State (14-3-4) in the third round, barring any upsets.

NCAA TOURNAMENT

Notre Dame (20-0-1), North Carolina (21-1-0), Santa Clara (15-4-1) and Texas (17-3-2) all earned No. 1 seeds in the NCAA Soccer Championship tournament. The field of 64 consists of teams that earned automatic bids by winning their conference tournament and those that were invited based on the merit of their season record.

Although the bracket is dominated by teams from warm climates, especially the South and Midwest, the Northeast has several representatives. Boston University (13-4-3), Niagara (12-6-1), Boston College (11-6-2) and Hartford (10-8-2) are all crammed together in the same semi-final bracket. Connecticut (10-7-3) and Long Island (13-7-1) also earned births in different regions.

Saint Louis is the only Atlantic 10 team to qualify for the NCAA tournament.

OFFENSIVE PLAYER OF THE YEAR

The Atlantic 10 conference named senior forward Ali Wean of Saint Joseph's its Offensive Player of the Year. Wean led the league in both goals (14) and points (33). Both marks are program records for the Hawks. The senior's career totals are good enough for second all-time in goals (23) and points (57).

DEFENSIVE PLAYER OF THE YEAR

Senior defender Courtney Hulcer of Saint Louis earned Defensive Player of the Year honors for the second season in a row. She was a key player of the Billiken defense that finished second in the A-10 in goals allowed, with 19.

The two-way defender is second on the team with 49 shots and fourth in assists (5). Hulcer was also named to the All-Championship team and became the first player in A-10 history to win consecutive Defensive Player of the Year awards.

ROOKIE OF THE YEAR

The A-10 also named freshman forward Julia Bradenberg of Saint Louis its Rookie of the Year. Bradenberg finished first on her team with nine goals and 25 points.

Rhode Island grabs conference honors

The A-10 Rookie of the Year honor is St. Louis freshman defender Rob Viviano. Viviano started every game for the Billikens and anchors the nationally-ranked defense that allowed (0.89) goals per game and had a low goals-against average (0.87).

St. Louis senior midfielder John DiRaimondo is the A-10 Student Athlete of the Year. He is an accounting major and last season he had been selected to the 2005 Atlantic 10 All-Academic Team selection. Last season, DiRaimondo earned the A-10 Offensive Player of the Year.

Other notable honors this season include, for his work in the classroom and on the field, ESPN The Magazine's first-team Academic All-America selection. He is also a two-time Hermann Trophy candidate along with College Soccer News second-team All-America honor.

This season he led his team in scoring with 14 points (five goals, four assists).

St. Louis head coach Dan Donigan earned the Atlantic 10 Coach of the Year award. In his sixth season as the Billikens head coach, Donigan's team finished first in the Atlantic 10 and clinched a first-round bye in the NCAA tournament. Under Donigan St. Louis finished unbeaten in conference play for the first time in 23 years with an 8-0-1 mark and nationally ranked at No. 8.

Donigan played soccer at the University of Connecticut were he was a three-time All-American forward. In his six seasons at St. Louis they have yet to have a losing season.

Crucial offseason for Minutewomen

decided before the team opens the spring season in February.

"The jury on this team is really still out," Dixon said. "Are we the team that went out and beat Binghamton, or are we the team that lost in an awful performance to Cornell? And that's the sort of lack of competitiveness that I feel is missing right now.

"This team has great potential," she added. "They are missing that extra piece that pushes them from seventh to second. It's hard to teach that. I don't think it's only from experience. I think experience is a piece of that, but it comes from deciding within yourself that you have the guts to put themselves out there, fully focused, and say that today is the only day that they have and that this is the most important match of their lives."

The Minutewomen clearly know what they have to in order to have a successful spring season. They return to action on February 4 in a dual match against the University of Albany.

Watson brothers square off

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Deep into the third period on Saturday night, Massachusetts hockey team freshman Brett Watson hunched over to take the face off in the UMass (4-1-1, 3-1 Hockey East) zone. His opponent was none other than his older brother Chase, who is a senior on the Providence squad.

UMass Hockey

When the puck dropped, Chase kicked it out to a teammate – effectively defeating his little brother. But it was a small victory as Brett and the Minutemen's 3-2 victory secured them a sweep of the Friars.

"It was fun," the younger Watson said of facing his brother. "It was the first time we've ever faced off against each other – literally on the face off. I lost [that one], but I won a couple too, it evened out and I did alright."

Despite the close quarters, Brett said there was no brotherly banter between the two Watsons on Saturday night.

"No we didn't say anything, it was all business on the ice," he said. "I'm sure we'll talk about it tomorrow. That's all that matters, getting the 'W.'"

Games between children on opposing teams are never easy for parents. After the game against this brother, Watson gave a prediction of what it must have been like for Jim and Susan Watson watching from the stands.

"I'm sure my mom was a wreck," Brett said. "I'm sure my dad was a little bit calmer about it. He just wants to watch us play. But I'm sure my mom and grandparents and my sisters – they were probably all a mess."

The younger Watson gets one more chance to win a face off against Chase before he graduates from Providence. The Minutemen and Friars will meet at least one more time on Feb. 10 at the Mullins Center.

MINI-RINK

Schneider Arena on the campus of Providence College boasts one of the smallest rinks in Hockey East.

It is actually tied with UMass-Lowell's Tsongas Arena and Maine's Alfond Arena as the smallest ice sheet in the conference. Although it measures 200 feet by 85 feet, the close quarters of Schneider Redshirt senior Matt Anderson has two assists on the season. He registered one against Sacred Heart and the other came against Clarkson.

Atlantic City: new A-10 Tourney site

BY KEVIN DOOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For the first time in 14 years, the Atlantic 10 Conference Tournament will not be held in a conference-member city. The tournament will instead be held in Atlantic City, 90 miles away from the closest conference-member city.

A-10 M. Hoops

The defending A-10 champion Xavier Musketeers are hoping the tournament's move to the city of slot machines and pressing your luck will bode well in preserving their luck from last season.

The Musketeers plodded their way to the A-10 Tournament, finishing with just an 8-8 conference record during the regular season before running the table in the conference tournament held in Cincinnati last March.

Xavier clinched an automatic bid to the NCAA Tournament along with at large bid George Washington Colonials, the only two teams representing the A-10 in last season's tournament. The Musketeers bowed out to the Gonzaga Bulldogs in the first round of the tournament while George Washington advanced to the second round of the tournament before falling to Duke.

College basketball prognosticators are picking Xavier to duplicate last year's success and for good reason. The Musketeers return to their squad Stanley Burrell (14 points per game last year), Justin Doellman (11), Justin Cage (10.3) and Josh Duncan (9.1). The addition of McDonald's All-American and Oklahoma transfer Drew Lavender won't hurt either. Lavender had just less than 10 points a contest and 3.2 assists in the 2004-2005 season.

According to a poll of the Atlantic 10's head coaches and media members, the Musketeers are an overwhelming favorite to repeat as Atlantic 10 champs.

LIFE WITHOUT CHENEY

It's not every day that an incoming head coach has the daunting task of replacing the face of the program and maybe the entire conference. But that is what former Pennsylvania head coach Fran Dunphy will be asked to do as he replaces 24-year head coach of the Temple Owls, John Cheney. Fans may miss the familiar sight of Cheney bringing the Owls into battle and some of his infamous off-the-court antics, but the pain of losing Cheney may be eased if the team is able to say goodbye to its NCAA Tournament drought. The Owls have not advanced to the Field of 64 since the 2001 season when they made a run to the Elite Eight.

BIG SIGH OF RELIEF

After losing 60 percent of their team to graduation and/or the NBA draft, the George Washington Colonials were more than relieved when point guard Carl Elliot decided to forego a pay day and withdraw his name from the NBA draft. Elliot recorded 11.5 points and totaled 3.9 rebounds and assists for the Colonials last season as a junior.

St. Louis senior Ian Vouyoukas will also wear the Billikens colors for one more season. Vouyoukas averaged almost 14 points a year, 7.4 rebounds, and 1.9 blocks.

Dixon says offseason is critical for tennis

BY MICHAEL KING
COLLEGIAN STAFF

To most, the word "offseason" has connotations of rest and relaxation. In fact, many athletes use the time between seasons to focus on pursuits other than sports.

However, for the Massachusetts women's tennis team, nothing could be further from the truth. UMass coach Judy Dixon and her players intend to use the three months between the fall and spring seasons to become a radically different and improved team.

"The offseason is very critical for this particular team," Dixon said. "The fall season was not what I wanted it to be. The offseason needs to emphasize individual attention. I'm going to ask them, 'What are you going to do to take care of your piece to make the team better?'"

Dixon feels that the team is where it should be in terms of technique and physical conditioning. But she believes that the mental side of the game for many of the players needs to improve.

"I feel that there is a lot of work to be done," Dixon said. "And the work to be done is not physical – it's mental. I feel like right now we are a team that needs to be more mature in terms of how to compete. Our competitors do what is necessary to win on the court. I think that we don't go out there and decide that we are willing to do anything necessary to win. I think that shows a lack of maturity – but that's not just with the freshmen. The mental side of the game has to improve by 70 percent, before I would be able to feel that we could reach our potential."

The Minutewomen had varying success on the court during the fall season. The team won its only dual match of the season against Connecticut on Sept. 27. They also had good showings at the Eastern Collegiate and Cissy Leary Invitationals to open up the fall season.

However, the Maroon and White struggled at the both the Brown and Big Green Invitationals. It also split matches at the Cornell Blind Duals, narrowly beating Binghamton while losing to Cornell by a significant margin.

But the emphasis of the fall season is on individual play. Senior Michelle Spiess, the Minutewomen's No. 1 singles player and co-captain, was inconsistent on the court. Spiess did not fare well in the prestigious ITA Regionals on Oct. 20-24. Despite earning a bye into the second round, the senior lost her the first singles match she played.

Since the ITA Regionals is an invitational tournament that pits the best players in the Northeast against each other, most entrants put a lot of pressure on themselves to do well.

"Michelle was sorely disappointed," Dixon said. "She was seeded No. 20 and lost in the second round."

The other captain, junior Masha Pozar, faired better in the ITA tournament. She played her way into the field of 64 by winning two qualifying matches. Pozar then won her first-round match before being eliminated in round two.

The Maroon and White also have four new players on the roster this season, including three freshmen. Out of those four, three will play in the starting six come the spring.

Freshman Ellen de Jong had a good fall season. She played her way into the quarterfinals of the Big Green Invitational, winning two matches.

But Dixon places the burden of taking the team to a higher level on her two captains.

"Michelle and Masha need to grab hold of this team," Dixon said. "From one to six, we have not exhibited the maturity at any of those positions that I would expect – even at one and two."

During the offseason, the Minutewomen practice and train at the Bay Road Tennis Club at Hampshire College. The players are only allowed to be on the court with coaches for two hours a week, due to NCAA regulations. In addition to expanding and refining their technique, the team spends significant time doing conditioning and weight training exercises.

Dixon knows that ultimately the level of success of her team will be

Minutewomen earn conference honors

BY JOE MELLINI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The tough season for 2006 Massachusetts field hockey team was not without its bright spots. The Atlantic 10 named three Minutewomen first-team All-Conference, and two players to its All-Rookie side.

Defender Erin O'Brien received her first bid to the All-Conference team as a junior. The captain's presence in the team's backfield certainly could not go unnoticed for much longer. Described by former UMass coach Patty Shea as the team's "field general," O'Brien did whatever the coaching staff asked her to do for the Minutewomen – including a late-season shift to midfield to augment UMass' offensive production.

She scored three goals this season for the Maroon and White – all of them coming in the matchup with Siena.

Her senior season should prove quite successful for the native Virginian.

The team's leading goal-scorer Lauren Gillespie also snatched a bid from the A-10 to its All-Conference team.

The sophomore scored 13 goals for the Minutewomen while handing out two assists. Gillespie came off the bench for UMass this season – a role she thrived in. Her ability to assess a game at its outset and make things happen upon her entry made her the ultimate offensive asset off the bench for the Maroon and White.

She posted the first hat trick of her young career at Fairfield this season. The Minutewomen erased a late deficit to win the early-season contest.

Two honors came the way of freshman midfielder Cher King for her sensational rookie campaign.

It is rare for a freshman to receive first-team All-Conference honors. For King, it was just another of the accolades the A-10 sent her way this season. The conference named her Rookie of the Week twice. Her seven goals and four assists put her second on the team with 18 points.

King scored two game-winning-goals for UMass as well – both in conference games. The first was the only goal scored in a 1-0 slugfest with Saint Louis. The other came in overtime against La Salle. The tally was the finishing touch to an epic comeback. The Minutewomen were behind 3-0 at the half only to win 4-3.

The conference also listed King amongst its All-Rookie Team. King's development this season bodes well for the future of the Minutewomen – especially their offensive attack.

King was not the only UMass freshman named to the A-10's All-Rookie squad. Goalkeeper Sarah Williams name appeared on the list. When the freshman took over as the team's starter midway through the season, UMass' record was 2-6. In the final 12 games, all started by Williams, the Minutewomen posted a 5-7 record.

She held her opponents scoreless twice. On September 26, Williams notched her first-career shutout against Siena. Although it was her first win as a starter, it was not the first victory of her career – that came against Fairfield when she came on as a replacement.

The second of her two shutouts came at home against Saint Louis. The Minutewomen defense stifled a tough Saint Louis team and Williams turned away all four shots she faced for the teams first conference win of the season.

Williams' 2.48 goals-against average and .744 save percentage both led the team and were amongst the best of any A-10 freshman net minder. Her performance this season is outdone only by her potential to be one of the conference's best in net.

Rams to appear in NCAA Tournament

On Sun Rhode Island defeated St. Louis, 2-0, for the Atlantic 10 Championship. The Rams (13-4-4, 8-2-0 A-10) have won back-to-back A-10 Championships and three in the last four years. With the victory, Rhode Island received an automatic bid for the NCAA Tournament and will play Rutgers in the first round.

The Rams jumped out in front with a first-half goal from senior forward Jeffery Gonsalves. Rhode Island didn't look back, in the second half junior Lukasz Tumicz scored on a pass from junior midfielder Danleigh Borman in the 51st minute to put the Rams up for good.

A-10 M. Soccer

Borman was named the Most Outstanding Player for the tournament. He scored the only goal in a 1-0 victory over Richmond in the semifinal round.

Prior to the game, St. Louis (12-4-2, 8-1-1 A-10) had not lost a game since Sept. 22. St. Louis received a first-round bye in the NCCA tournament with an at-large bid.

ATLANTIC 10 SEASON AWARDS

Rhode Island senior forward Jeffery Gonsalves is the A-10 Offensive Player of the Year. Gonsalves led the Rams to a birth in the NCAA tournament scoring a goal in the championship game. He leads the Atlantic 10 in almost every offensive category including goals (17), points (38), shots (78) and game-winning goals with five. He also ranks nationally, he is ninth in points per game (1.89) and eighth in goals per game (0.84).

Gonsalves ranks fifth all-time in Rams history with 104 points (41 goals, 22 assist). He is a three-time All-Conference performer and has earned Player of the Week honors twice this season.

Richmond junior goalkeeper Eric Sciocchetti earned the A-10 Defensive Player of the Year. Sciocchetti is the key to the stingy Richmond defense. He leads the A-10 in save percentage with an 86.3 percent and tallied six shutouts. He played even better in conference play only allowing four goals. He also led the league with a 0.53 goals-against average in A-10 play. Sciocchetti was named to the 2006 All-Tournament team after notching 14 saves and a shutout in tournament play.

Saint Louis wins Atlantic 10 Championship

COLLEGIAN STAFF

After experiencing many ups and downs during the regular season, the Saint Louis (14-3-2, 7-2-0 Atlantic 10) Billikens ended the season where they were predicted to finish: No. 1 in the Atlantic 10.

The Billikens rose to as high as No. 17 in the nation, according the rankings produced by Soccer Buzz Magazine. However, conference losses to Fordham (14-7-0, 6-3-0) and Xavier (7-10-2, 2-5-2) forced Saint Louis permanently out of the polls.

In Sunday's final, second-seeded SLU defeated No. 5 seed Fordham, 2-1, to win the Atlantic 10 Championship on their home field in Saint Louis.

A-10 W. Soccer

The Billikens dominated play in the first half, earning a 13-1 shot advantage. However, Fordham struck first when midfielder Alexis Ribadeneyra scored from 40-yards away.

In the 36th minute, Saint Louis tied the score 1-1. Freshman forward Maggie Farrell knocked in the rebound of a shot from senior forward Dee Guempel that banged off the crossbar.

Fordham came close to tying the game with less than a minute remaining, but Saint Louis was able to maintain its one-goal edge.

Freshman superstar Julia Bradenberg put the Billikens up for good with her goal early in the second half. Bradenberg collected a pass from the right side, avoided a defender, and put the ball in the left side of the net.

Incredibly, freshman goalkeeper Hannah Koesterer finished the match with zero saves. She allowed one goal on the only shot she faced.

Senior midfielder Maureen Hughes collected the Most

HARDWOOD HYSTERIA

The Minutemen embark on the highly anticipated 2006 season

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

This is Travis Ford's second year at the helm of Massachusetts basketball. His team went 13-15 last season and suffered a first-round defeat to Xavier in the Atlantic 10 tournament.

Ford's team hit some early speed bumps in the form of departed players (Maurice Maxwell, Artie Bulgrin) and spent the entirety of the 2005-06 season with one true point guard – Chris Lowe, playing over 30 minutes per game.

His team was new. Juniors Rashaun Freeman and Stephane Lasme had to get acclimated to the new coach stomping the hardwood. Baskets came few and far between, and James Life – Ford's resident trigger-happy three-point shooter – took some bad shots that Ford surely would have restricted if his team wasn't so short on offense.

One year removed from a brand new start, the UMass basketball program starts over again with four transfers who will get significant playing time this season.

Gary Forbes, Tiki Mayben, Etienne Bonner and Luke Bonner transferred to UMass last year and, because of NCAA regulations, sat out the obligatory year. They watched from the sidelines during the games and practiced with the team throughout the year.

On Saturday, they will be in their first regular season game in over a year and a half, and this year's squad will need some time to adjust to game situations with the new guys.

"I was a transfer. I was a young man who sat out for a year," Ford said. "Anyone who transfers will tell you that it takes a half a year at least to get back to your whole potential and to be 100 percent. That doesn't mean it still can't win. But when you're dealing with four guys who were in that situation, it's just like we're going to come out and knock the world out at the beginning of the season."

"When you're telling out you have to take advantage of the time and get better as an individual first while you're learning the system," he added. "The biggest thing when you sit out is that some guys lose their skill or their ability. If you do what you're supposed to do and improve a little bit, then it gives you that competitive edge. If you practice with the same guys for an entire year, it takes a lot to get back into the flow. They have to be patient and push themselves to where they want to be without getting discouraged."

Ford has spent a lot of time in the preseason working on offense – something that the Minutemen lacked last year. Further, the transfer from Virginia was averaged over nine points per game as a sophomore, is the most prolific addition to the offense this season.

Forbes led the team with 21 points in last weekend's exhibition against Bridgeport and went an efficient 8-for-12 from the field. Forbes has a big body and can handle the ball well. Ford will use him at the point at times this season, and he will play at power forward as well because of his size.

Tiki Mayben wasn't with the team last season because of academic issues, but will see significant playing time this year because of his athleticism and his offensive skills. Mayben, like Lowe did last year, has had trouble controlling the ball on a consistent basis in the preseason, and might see time at the off guard when Lowe comes back from a team suspension.

"Tiki gives us a great presence," Ford said. "When you bring Tiki on the court, he's very much in control of the game because he has the ball in his hands a lot. The positive part of that is that he is very gifted and he sees plays a lot in advance. He makes everyone around him better."

Mayben will start on Saturday for the opening game because of Lowe's team suspension after the police arrested Lowe and teammate Nana Ampim outside of the Amherst Starbucks with charges of disorderly conduct. While the suspension won't affect Lowe's playing time this season, Mayben should see significant minutes while Lowe is running the point.

"[Mayben's] minutes will depend on his play," Ford said. "If he's playing great I'll play him 40 minutes right now. But he won't be able to do that because as much as I want him to I can't see him being able to play for that long. I think depending on how he's running the offense, where his turnovers are at, the foul situation and conditioning-wise will dictate his playing time."

Senior Rashaun Freeman, in his final campaign, will benefit greatly from Mayben and Forbes. The senior from Schenectady has been double-teamed for the bulk of his career because he represented the majority of UMass' offense. And though Freeman has had some talented athletes with him in the past, no one in particular could make defenses pay for sending an extra guy Freeman's way.

Offense

UMass ranked ninth in the Atlantic 10 in scoring last season. The Minutemen averaged 64.9 points per game, behind bottom feeders like Saint Bonaventure and Duquesne. The Minutemen ranked eighth in scoring margin (plus 1.4 points per game) and ranked 12th in three-point percentage, finishing at just over 30 percent.

This season, Ford admitted that he has focused on offense so much in the preseason that the defensive work is behind.

"I've not been real happy with our defense the last couple of weeks, which is unusual because the defense is usually way ahead of the offense," Ford said. "I think we've focused so much on offense because we were so bad at it last year, which has probably put us behind a little bit defensively."

Turnover trouble

Turnovers were a tremendous problem for the Minutemen last season. Most of that responsibility fell on Lowe, who came in as a freshman played a prodigious amount of minutes for a newcomer. His inexperienced showed.

Lowe was susceptible to half-court traps and full court-pressure from opposing teams because he kept his head down and dribbled into them. This year, if the Minutemen are to become a post-season team, Lowe will have to take better care of the ball. Last season, UMass ranked dead last in the Atlantic 10 in assist-to-turnover ratio.

"Turnovers have been way too high, Ford said. "We're giving up way too many layups in transition. We have point guards that are penetrating so deep that they have trouble getting back deep. We have some drills that we're trying to work on that."

Preseason expectations

Ford's main concern in this preseason has been the overall attitude of his team. UMass ranked second in a preseason poll among Atlantic 10 coaches and media, and Ford believes that his players haven't reacted well to the early praise.

"I don't worry too much about the talent or the players," Ford offered. "I'm just concerned if they can handle getting to where they want to be and not think that they've already gotten there. I hope our guys don't read into this, and I think that they did to an extent, that they've already achieved something.

"We need to become a team that's blue collar, a team that's tough, a team that wants to earn what everybody's saying. We've done nothing. I mean zero, to be a second-place team."

The Minutemen, according to Ford, also need some direction from an upperclassman. He believes that Lasme has the respect of the players on the team and will lead UMass through the turbulence this season.

"We want [Lasme] to do it more, grab a hold of guys," Ford said. "Rashaun does it by example because he plays so hard every day. Stephane would be the main guy that could step up and I think that everybody knows it. If there was one guy who brings it every single day I think it would be him. He's the one guy who I think has the capability. I just need him to do it more and hold people accountable."

Accountability is big deal for Ford right now, and his early displeasure with his team's intensity and focus is evident. Ford was not happy with his team's effort in the exhibition against Bridgeport, and consistency was a significant problem last season, especially on the road.

Productive trip to the Bahamas

The Minutemen might struggle in the early going, simply because the transfers haven't played a real game in a long time. Getting in practice time was essential for Ford and he scheduled an offseason trip to the Bahamas to play some games. Every Division I program is allowed one of those out-of-the-country trips every four years, and because UMass had only one freshman on the team this season – Ricky Harris – Ford decided it would be a good year to go.

The real prize, however, was the 10 days of practice that the NCAA allots for scheduling that kind of trip. Ford used that time to put in his offensive and defensive sets, and used the games to try out some different combinations of players. Finding out who plays well together will be essential for the team's success this season, and Ford has had relatively little time to do it. It may me five or 10 games into the season before the transfers get into a rhythm with the regulars.

"[The Bahamas trip] gave us a jump on the system as far as we had plays in and defenses in," Ford said. "It brought the team together a little bit and it gave the guys who sat out last year a chance to play in some games with real referees and real competition.

"Maybe we thought we were pretty good after the Bahamas trip because we had beaten some guys who I wouldn't say is the greatest competition," he added. "We have to come back to reality a little bit in that area. But we've moved along very quickly as far as having the system in."

Defense

Ford played under Rick Pitino and his up-tempo style that involved pressuring the ball for 94 feet. Ford wanted to play that style last season but with a limited bench he needed to preserve legs for the end of the season. With new and fresh bodies this season, Ford thought that he would have a pressing team. Now, he isn't so sure.

In the exhibition game against Bridgeport last Saturday, the Minutemen flashed a couple of different defensive sets, including a diamond full court press. Dante Milligan went up front with a combination of Life, Mayben, Harris, Forbes, and Thomas on the wings. Bonner, Freeman and Lasme played all the way back. Lasme's presence helps in the pressing system because the guards up front are willing to take more chances knowing that Lasme is behind them. Bridgeport broke the press with the dribble most of the time.

Ford has a long and athletic team, but not a super quick one. Guys like Milligan, Brower, Forbes, Thomas and Lasme are all big and athletic, but are not quick enough to contain quick opposing guards off of the dribble. With that type of team, Ford might be able to utilize a half-court trap effectively because his guys take up so much space and can shut down passing lanes in the half-court.

"I don't know if we're going to press that much this year," Ford said. "I thought we were. You can't force a team to press. We will at different times and we will be up tempo offensively. We can do that. But we'll change defenses a lot."

"That's us," Freeman said. "That's the way he wanted to play last year and that's the way he wants to play this year. That's us. That is what people think when they play against us: that they will have to deal with the pressure that we give them."

UMass showed a 2-3 zone as a half-court defense last Saturday. Against the quicker opponents, the Minutemen could have a tough time matching up man to man. Ford is banking on a 2-3 zone because of his team's length. Because Milligan, Brower, Lasme, Forbes and Thomas all have big wingspans, they will be able to contest shots and shut down dribble penetration at the same time. The usual trouble with playing a zone is defensive rebounding, but with Lasme, Freeman and Bonner roaming the middle, rebounding shouldn't be a problem this season.

"We are doing a lot of different type defenses, and I think we're average at all of them. We are changing defenses a lot and doing a lot of different things, which is the reason why we were not being good at them yet."

The Minutemen's defense was one of the best in the conference last season, thanks in large part to Lasme, who led the A-10 with 3.86 blocks per game. His numbers put UMass at the top of the conferences' team-blocks list. UMass averaged 7.21 blocks per game last year, over 2.25 blocks more per game than second-place Xavier.

While UMass' perimeter defense last season left something to be desired, when opponents got into the paint their shots were sure to be contested. The Minutemen want to be an up-tempo team this season, and you can't do that without defense and pressure on the ball. Mayben, Lowe, Harris and James Life (who struggled defensively last season and worked on it during the offseason) will need to contain the dribble and make sure that no perimeter slashers get into the paint and break down the defense.

Virginia transfer Gary Forbes averaged over nine points during his sophomore season in the Atlantic Coast Conference. The redshirt junior will add a much-needed scoring presence to the UMass squad.

Senior captain Rashaun Freeman floats a soft hook shot over a Bridgeport defender last Saturday in the Minutemen's exhibition game at the Mullins Center. Freeman averaged 14 points per game last season and was named to the Atlantic 10's Preseason First Team.

Rumsfeld resigns; Gates nominated

Rumsfeld resigns hours after Democratic sweep

By Michelle Osorio
Collegian Staff

Yesterday morning, one day after exit polls showed public discontent with the handling of the Iraq war in the midterm elections, Defense Secretary Donald Rumsfeld stepped down as defense secretary.

"The timing is right for new leadership at the Pentagon," Bush said to the press at the White House Wednesday. "I recognize that many Americans voted last night to register their displeasure with the lack of progress being made."

The Republican Party experienced strong losses this past election, much of which Bush believes has to do with the Iraq conflict. According to CNN, 57 percent of voters are dissatisfied with the leadership in the defense sector.

Rumsfeld, who also served under President Ford, has been defense secretary and the head of the Pentagon since the beginning of President Bush's first term, almost six years ago.

With the abrupt change in leadership in the middle of a political and military conflict, President Bush assured the public yesterday that Rumsfeld's experience and judgment have not been put up to scrutiny, yet the time has come for new leadership.

"Don Rumsfeld has been a superb leader during a time of change," Bush said Wednesday. "Yet he also appreciates the value of bringing in a fresh perspective during a critical period in this war."

Indoor tanning proved harmful

By Emily Reynolds
Collegian Staff

While many people looking to gain their "beach glow" would rather visit the tanning salon rather then visit the sandy beaches, new research may indicate that a tan in a box may actually be worse than one from the sun.

People who use tanning booths instead of going out into the sun have many misconceptions about what they are actually doing. Sixty-five percent of people think that they look healthier with a tan, but less than half of them realize that tanning booths are just as dangerous as direct sunlight.

Some people believe that a base tan will prevent sunburn later, but it does not stop harmful UVA and UVB rays from getting through the skin and causing serious damage. Others believe that they are not getting as many harmful rays if they are not directly in the sun.

UVA rays cause premature aging of the skin, and researchers are starting to connect it to skin cancer and some genetic damage to skin, according to the University of Iowa's Health Care Web site. UVB rays are linked to sunburn and skin cancer.

There are three types of skin cancer: melanoma, squamous cell carcinoma and basal cell carcinoma. According to the American Cancer Society, squamous cell carcinoma and basal cell carcinoma are less likely to be fatal, although melanoma is almost always curable if it is caught in its early stages.

According to the U.S. National Institutes of Health, every year, 1.3 million people will develop some form of skin cancer, and there are only 111,900

The real skinny on the infamous 'freshman 15'

By Emily Reynolds
Collegian Staff

One of the most feared urban legends for college freshmen is the "Freshman 15," the idea that college freshman gain up to 15 pounds during their first year. But now, according to a recent study conducted by researchers of Brown University and Purdue University, students' fears may soon be extinct.

The study shows that students are heeding the warnings of gaining a few extra pounds once they get to college. Instead of packing on 15 pounds, they are gaining less than half of that — 7.8 pounds at Purdue University, and only 5.6 pounds at Brown University.

Some admit the reason that freshman are gaining less weight now than they did a few years ago is the idea of the "Freshman 15."

"I try to keep in mind the horrors of the 'Freshman 15,' and I try to eat healthier," said Keely Kwok, a freshman at the University of Massachusetts.

There are also other reasons that many students are not gaining the full 15 pounds during their freshman year.

"I lost a lot of weight. I did a lot of high school sports, but none here, so I lost about ten pounds, in muscle," says sophomore Mariel Schottenfeld.

"I also don't drink, which is kind of where a lot of freshmen gain the weight."

Freshmen students gain a lot of weight the first semester of the school year because of many factors.

"The typical explanations for freshmen weight gain are increased alcohol consumption, stress from all the changes in their lives due to living away from home and going to school, eating more, late nights, cafeteria foods, snacking in dorms and decreased activity," said Patricia Heffa-Negrini, a research associate professor in the Department of Nutrition at UMass.

"Eating may be more erratic and spread out through the day versus three meals. Snacking in between classes, order-

UM named 'most vegetarian friendly college'

When it comes to choosing a college, some students base their decision on whether vegetarian food options are available. At the University of Massachusetts, Dining Services works hard to cater to the needs of its vegetarians. Recently, students have nominated UMass for peta2's "Most Vegetarian-Friendly Colleges in America."

Ken Toong, the director of Dining Services, focuses on making sure that the vegetarians of UMass are given a variety of vegan and vegetarian foods.

"We were a bit surprised but delighted to hear the news. We love to hear good news about UMass," said Toong.

For the past 16 years, UMass has been working to become more proactive with its vegetarian selections. According to Toong, last semester, 12 percent of students on campus meal plans were vegetarians.

Last year, Toong started to purchase more local produce. Dining Services now offers more soy products, such as soy milk, tofu and whole grain items. Daily items offered at the Dining Commons include vegetarian soup, vegetarian or vegan lunch, international cuisine such as Vietnamese pho noodle, dim sum, salad bar, vegetarian pizza and pasta, vegan and low-fat stir-fry, whole grain, vegetarian burger and hot dogs, soy milk, rice milk, 100 percent Lactaid milk and vegan dessert.

High coffee intake may lower Type 2 Diabetes

By Meghan Murphy

Coffee drinkers have a 60 percent lower risk of developing Type 2 diabetes than people who don't drink coffee, according a recent study conducted by researchers at the University of California San Diego.

Results of the study, printed in the November issue of Diabetes Care, confirmed that caffeinated coffee has "a striking protective effect" against the disease, but the average number of cups participants consumed per day did not affect the risk.

Researchers are still working to find the exact reason for the trend, but since decaffeinated coffee had similar effects, caffeine does not appear to be the explanation.

"The relationship between diabetes and coffee does not seem to be due to caffeine, but [rather to] chlorogenic acid, [which is] another substance in coffee," said Laura Hutchinson, a graduate student in nutrition at the University of Massachusetts.

The body uses a hormone called insulin to take sugar from the bloodstream into cells, which use sugar for fuel, according to the American Diabetes Association's Web site, www.diabetes.org. But for people with Type 2 diabetes, "either the body does not produce enough insulin or the cells ignore the insulin."

Some researchers suggest that "foods that take longer to digest and for blood sugar to rise [are] beneficial for prevention and treatment of type 2 diabetes," said Hutchinson, since these foods cause "less shock to the blood stream with super high glucose levels," requiring a lot of insulin at once.

She said that chlorogenic acid is likely to delay the body's absorption of sugar, which may explain the decline in cases of Type 2 diabetes in adults who drink coffee, but added that the theory "is just speculation from preliminary research findings in small studies ... the mechanism is really unknown."

Chlorogenic acid is only found in brewed coffee, as opposed to espresso-type beverages such as lattes and cappuccinos, so brewed coffee may be more beneficial and less expensive than espresso, said Hutchinson.

This information doesn't mean that people should necessarily start drinking more coffee, though.

"Much more research needs to be done on the exact effects on diabetes risk before any recommendations are made to the public," said Hutchinson.

"The cream and sugar people load their coffee with may counteract any diabetes prevention effects of coffee and result in other detrimental health effects," she explained. "For instance, drinking four large Dunkin' Donuts coffees with cream and sugar per day will provide so many empty calories that an individual will be at risk for taking in excess energy and/or becoming deficient in nutrients that he or she is missing out on from healthier foods the coffee is taking the place of."

"In addition, high caffeine is associated with other risks, such as high blood pressure," she said.

"The studies so far simply suggest that we need to explain the relationship between coffee and decreased diabetes risk through further research."

Some students said they may not change their coffee consumption habits even if it was recommended to the public in the future after further studies.

"If I knew about possible benefits, I probably wouldn't change my habits because I already drink it pretty regularly," said UMass freshman Christina Alfonso.

"I don't like coffee enough to drink more of it even if it were beneficial," said Candice LaValley, a junior nursing major.

Type 2 is the most common kind of diabetes and is more common in older people. People who are diagnosed with the disease "can live long, healthy, happy, lives," according to the ADA's Web site, but it can also be associated with heart disease, blindness, liver damage and kidney damage.

Amherst Police log:

PVTA bus attacked

4:41 PM: Kenan Ali Atmaca, 22, of Chicopee, Mass., was summoned for assault and battery. Atmaca and another male party were witnessed attacking the victim, a 20-year-old male from West Springfield, at a Halloween party on Main Street in Amherst. The victim suffered a fractured ankle and required medical attention.

7:27 PM: Rocks were thrown at the side of a passing PVTA bus on North Pleasant Street. Bus driver Mike Tranor, 23, reported the vandalism to the police and noted that the rock throwers yelled, "You're going to die."

10:28 PM: Police investigated a suspicious incident with an unidentified male party wearing a ski mask looking into the window of a house on North Pleasant Street. The residents, two females, called the police, but the male party had fled.

Wednesday

2:28 AM: Police reported a breaking and entering in the Brandywine apartments on Brandywine Drive. A golf club driver and a TV were missing from the unlocked apartment. Police have no suspects.

ian alternatives, but there is still room for improvement. Sometimes it is the same thing all the time. They have definitely improved from previous years, especially with the new Dining Commons in Southwest," said Awilda Acaron, a senior at UMass.

Former vegetarian Alex Peterkin, a full-time worker at the Dining Commons and former student at UMass, was a bit surprised to hear that UMass had been nominated. He felt that in the past, the selections were a bit repetitive. Peterkin thought there was too much of lo mein and fried rice, although he admits he has noticed some improvements.

"When I was a student, vegetarians weren't happy. But Ken Toong is good at responding to the student's concerns and in helping to provide a satisfactory Dining Commons experience for everyone," said Peterkin.

At each Dining Commons, there is one station dedicated to vegetarian dishes. Each day, a minimum of three hot entrees and three cold items are offered. Most of the items are made from scratch. They also incorporate some international cuisine into the menu.

Food from India has also become available to the students. Last year, Dining Services hired a student's parent to teach UMass chefs how to prepare authentic Indian cooking.

In September, Joanne Weir of Napa Valley visited UMass to train the staff on Mediterranean cuisine.

Dan Cipollone, a sophomore at UMass, agrees that the University does a good job in catering to the needs of vegetarians, but feels that the options are limited. Cipollone, who lives in Orchard Hill and eats at Franklin dining hall, feels that the overall quality and selection of the food is poor.

"I think UMass is a vegetarian-friendly college; however, their actual vegetarian options are very sub-par," said Cipollone.

With 13,000 students on the meal plan, Toong explains that they take the needs of vegetarians seriously. There are plenty of choices daily and it is growing. They work with the vegetarian population regularly to see how we can better meet their needs.

"I think our students enjoy healthy and tasty food selections even though they are not vegetarian. For the vegetarians and vegans, they have taken notice of our efforts. This year, we received much positive feedback on our

Democrats complete election sweep of Congress

By Liz Sidoti
Associated Press

WASHINGTON – Democrats completed an improbable double-barreled election sweep of Congress on Wednesday, taking control of the Senate with a victory in Virginia as they padded their day-old majority in the House.

"The days of the do-nothing Congress are over," declared Democratic Sen. Harry Reid (news, bio, voting record) of Nevada, in line to become majority leader, adding that Americans spoke "clearly and decisively in favor of Democrats leading this country in a new direction."

Jim Webb's victory over Sen. George Allen (news, bio, voting record) in Virginia assured Democrats of 51 seats when the Senate convenes in January. That marked a gain of six in midterm elections in which the war in Iraq and President Bush were major issues.

Earlier, State Sen Jon Tester triumphed over Republican Sen. Conrad Burns (news, bio, voting record) in a long, late court in Montana.

With a handful of House races too close to call, Democrats had gained 28 seats, enough to regain the majority after 12 years of Republican rule and place Rep. Nancy Pelosi (news, bio, voting record) of California in line to become the first female speaker in history.

"It was a thumping," Bush conceded at the White House. "It's clear the Democrat Party had a good night."

Allen's campaign issued a statement noting that state officials are conducting a canvass of the votes cast in Tuesday's balloting.

"At the conclusion of those efforts, Senator George Allen plans to make a statement regarding the outcome," it said.

The Senate had teetered at 50 Democrats, 49 Republicans for most of Wednesday, with Virginia hanging in the balance. Webb's victory ended Republican hopes of eking out a 50-50 split, with Vice President Dick Cheney wielding tie-breaking authority.

The Associated Press contacted election officials in all 134 localities in Virginia where voting occurred, obtaining updated numbers Wednesday. About half the localities said they had completed their postelection canvassing and nearly all had counted outstanding absentees. Most were expected to be finished by Friday.

The new AP count showed Webb with 1,172,538 votes and Allen with 1,165,302, a difference of 7,236. Virginia has had two statewide vote recounts in modern history, but both resulted in vote changes of no more than a few hundred votes.

It had been clear for weeks leading up to the election that Democrats were strongly positioned to challenge Republicans for House control.

But Democrats began the year with fewer seats than at any time since Herbert Hoover occupied the White House. Even Reid, the party leader, mused aloud at one point that it might take a miracle to capture Senate control.

"From changing course in Iraq to raising the minimum wage to fixing the health care crisis to making this country energy independent, we're ready to get to work," he said in a statement late Wednesday.

Earlier, Sen. Mitch McConnell (news, bio, voting record), R-Ky., in line to become the next minority leader, said: "In the Senate, the minority is never irrelevant unless it falls down into the very small numbers. I don't think, as a practical matter, it's going to make a whole lot of difference in the Representative Nancy Pelosi (D-CA), soon to be Speaker of the House in the aftermath of the midterm elections, speaks to the media the day after Democrats took control of the House for the first time in 12 years, on Capitol Hill, yesterday.

Rumsfeld's exit brings cheers, sadness

U.S. Secretary of Defense Donald Rumsfeld departs the White House after the announcement of his resignation by President Bush, yesterday.

The fresh face President Bush spoke of is former CIA chief Robert Gates, who is the current president of Texas A&M University in College Station, Texas.

However, despite President Bush's claims to the contrary, Stanford University professor Joshua Cohen, who holds a doctorate in political science, believes this move was strictly political and well planned out to answer the displeasure of the voter demographics as evidence in the results of the mid-term elections.

"I thought it was, uncharacteristically, an extremely smart move politically on Bush's part," Cohen said.

Cohen said he perceived the recent election results as the American people's way of acting out against the war.

"People voted against the war and against the architects of the war. [Voters] were basically saying Bush should get rid of Rumsfeld," said Cohen.

Cohen isn't alone in his theories. Dale Singapuri, who stations herself in the Campus Center every Wednesday with free information covering subjects from nuclear power to the United States' occupation of Iraq, also believes the sudden resignation of Rumsfeld is the result of the midterm catalyst of last Tuesday.

"Had the Republicans maintained a lead, even by one, he would not have resigned," said Singapuri. "I think that had [the Republicans] retained the House they would have considered that a go-ahead. We know of the pressure that's been on Rumsfeld for days. The generals are unhappy with him."

Rumsfeld's leadership has undergone strict scrutiny by the media and the public these past few months as the death toll in Iraq rises and the sectarian violence ruins attempts of peace in the region. His leadership of the Department of Defense was described as "incompetent strategically, operationally and tactically" by retired Maj. Gen. Paul Eaton.

"Mr. Rumsfeld and his immediate team must be replaced or we will see two more years of extraordinarily bad decision-making," Eaton said in a forum set up by Senate Democrats in September.

During Tuesday's elections, ballots in 84 towns in Western Massachusetts included a question on withdrawal from Iraq, and the majority of voters supported removal of troops, according to the Daily Hampshire Gazette. The referendum was sponsored by the American Friends Service Committee (AFSC). According to the AFSC Web site, 655,000 soldiers have died in Iraq so far.

"This is the voters saying enough with the war, enough with the bloodshed," Barbara L. Chalfonte, director for the group's local campaign in East Hampton told The Republican.

The Department of Defense is now at a standstill as Gates awaits confirmation.

It is still unclear, however, what the Senate's response to Gates will be and whether or not President Bush will utilize his constitutional power of recess appointment since the Senate is out of session. Gates served on the National Security Council and was director of the CIA under President George H. W. Bush.

Gates was also part of the Iraq Study Group known as the Baker Commission that delivered an independent assessment of Iraq on March 15, 2006.

Study reveals dangers of indoor tanning people diagnosed with melanoma as opposed to the nonmelanoma forms.

According to the American Academy of Dermatology, there are over one million people using tanning salons every day. Overall, there are 30 million people who use tanning salons in the United States, and 2.3 million of those users are teenagers.

By visiting a tanning booth to keep a "healthy" glow, people are actually doubling their chances of getting nonmelanoma skin cancers, according to research done at Dartmouth Medical Center.

The truth is that a tanning booth not only has the same amount of harmful rays for your skin, but it is actually worse for your eyes.

"Studies indicated that the ultraviolet radiation levels to the eye could be over 100 times greater in the tanning booth than with outside sunlight. Corneal burns, cataracts, and occasionally retinal damage can occur," said the University of Iowa Health Care Web site.

Many health organizations as well as tanning salons now urge users to bring eye protection to cut down on the risk of harm.

There are over 700 emergency room visits every year after tanning, caused by sunburns, infections, and eye damage from tanning beds, according to the AAD. Fifty-nine percent of tanners will experience some type of injury, and 44 percent of users will experience increased erythema, which is abnormal redness of skin from dilatation and congestion of the capillaries, which is a sign of inflammation or infection.

Tanning also has some other side effects that are not as obvious. According to the AAD Web site, tanners have a greater chance of getting addictive disorders, becoming dependent on products such as tobacco and other substances and also to tanning itself.

Recent research done by the AAD has suggested that UV rays seem to relax tanners, which makes them want to tan more often, eventually causing addiction.

Forty-seven percent of college students use indoor tanning beds, according to the AAD, and although winter has arrived and many students want to keep that tan that they got over the summer, indoor tanning can be dangerous. More information can be found on the AAD Web site at www.aad.org.

According to the American Academy of Dermatology over one million people use tanning salons every day.

'Freshman 15' loses seven pounds

ing a pizza or some other takeout during late night studying is the norm," said Elena Carbone, an associate professor in the Department of Nutrition. "These takeout food selections tend to be high in fat, sodium and calories."

Students, on average, seem to be gaining less weight because of healthier foods offered. Many restaurants offer smaller portion sizes, and fast food chains have healthier selections. Students may have also noticed labels on dining hall countertops displaying nutrition facts about the food options.

"At UMass, Dianne Sutherland, the food service dietitian, has done a great deal of work to make food selections healthier on this campus," said Carbone.

With all of the diet trends and changing food pyramids, students are also more informed about what constitutes a healthy diet.

"There may be more education available to students about healthy lifestyles and the importance of good dietary and physical activity habits when in college," said Carbone. "Groups like the UMass Nutrition Association are often called upon to do educational talks in dorms and other areas."

Some freshmen have been putting the healthy diet into practice to make sure that they do not gain the extra weight their first semester away from home.

"Rather than going for ice cream or dessert, I try to eat a piece of fruit," said Kwok. "Also, since I live up in O-Hill, I think that has helped."

There are also more opportunities to exercise on campus besides walking from one class to another and up the hill to the dorms.

"We are offering programs to students in an effort to aid them in adopting healthy habits now, at the onset of adulthood," said Abbs Lane, assistant director of campus recreation.

"Drop-in workout classes are a new offering this semester, allowing students the ability to attend an instructor-led workout class for only $1," said Lane.

"I think there are a variety of reasons our patrons find [the classes] motivating. Certainly weight control and improving appearance appeal to college students, but enhancing athletic performance, the social fun aspect of an exercise class, and the sense of doing something that's good for you are definitely added incentives," said Lane.

While all of these new programs offered to keep the extra pounds off are a great explanation for the lower weight gain, there is also some questioning of the accuracy of the study.

These new studies look at freshman weight gain in males as well as females and it looks at this weight gain over time, not just in the first semester.

"If you are already overweight when you arrive on campus, it's less likely that you will put on more weight that quickly. You can only eat so much in one day," Bella-Segrini added, commenting on the increasing amount of obesity in this country.

With all of the extra recreational activities being offered at school and the increase in health conscious restaurants, it is much easier to keep the weight gain down from 15 to eight pounds, which is good news for freshmen.

What's in the closet is out of style

Chris Reardon

Compared to 20 or even 10 years ago, now being gay in the United States is extremely easy. It is estimated about 10 percent of the population is homosexual, but can we ever be sure if that is accurate? Until staying "in-the-closet" becomes a thing of the past, we may never know how many people are actually gay.

That said, you would think it would be far more common for people to come out on their own these days instead of having their secrets revealed to the world against their will. Yet it seems like every other day another famous person has been "outed" by a jilted ex-lover or a harassed underling (see Mark Foley scandal).

Since the middle of October, at least three famous people have been famously outed in the national spotlight. First came actor T.R. Knight (Dr. George O'Malley of "Grey's Anatomy"), who was allegedly the subject of a gay slur from fellow Anatomy star Isaiah Washington (Dr. Preston Burke) just days before publicly admitting his sexuality to People Magazine. Then there was evangelical leader Ted Haggard, who, after years of preaching against homosexuality, was outed by a long-time lover. He has since stepped down from his position, which gave him direct contact with the White House and a lot of sway in the political-religious world, and is embarking on a personal quest to cleanse himself of his "vices."

Most recently out of the closet was Neil Patrick Harris, formerly of "Doogie Howser, M.D." After having his sexuality revealed by a Web site claiming he helped his boyfriend's acting career by getting him a part on the sitcom "How I Met Your Mother," Harris' publicist attempted to quell the rumors. This was before Harris himself told People Magazine he is gay and perfectly happy being that way.

It is a shame these people felt they couldn't be publicly out of the closet before now. While I'm sure being in the national spotlight is a lot different from being in college — especially at a liberal school like UMass — it's clear to most people that being gay is no longer something to be ashamed of. It's also blatantly obvious to those of us who are out of the closet that being open about your sexuality is lot more gratifying than lying to everyone about it.

This type of forced outing is not exclusive to Hollywood. Some people feel more comfortable keeping their sexuality private, but many do not, and relationships between these two types of people often lead to dramatic revelations of surprise love affairs. I know something that is bound to happen to people who insist on keeping their orientation a secret.

Since the middle of October, at least three famous people have been famously outed in the national spotlight.

Look, I know how hard it is to come out of the closet, but isn't it better to tell people about it yourself than to wait until someone else tells all of your secrets for you? The dignity involved is worth the potential awkwardness, trust me. It also prevents you from having to worry too much about angering your lovers and causing them to out you.

College is the perfect time to come out of the closet. I did so my freshmen year, and people who have been forced out of the closet and let me tell you, it's not a pretty picture. Yet it's something I can't imagine what my school experience would have been like if I hadn't. There's no reason to keep lying to yourself and the people you love when you're in this environment, because being gay is very accepted here. I can imagine that some guys on the football team wouldn't feel as comfortable about it compared to people like me (read: un-athletic and friends with mostly women), but in truth, I think sports and entertainment are as ready to accept homosexuality in their ranks as they'll ever be.

Religion, however, may not be so accepting. Poor Ted Haggard is going to have an interesting time recovering his career after this revelation. But what stopped Haggard from preaching instead in an accepting church and spreading the moral word in a setting of equality? Did he preach, in essence, against himself just so he could rise to the top of evangelism? That leads me to believe there are many others in Washington and in the church (what's the difference between the two, really?) who have some serious skeletons just waiting to burst out of the closet.

Releasing the olive branch

Adam McGillen

It's almost here. Many young gamers are packing their bags and pitching their tents outside of their nearest software and videogame store. They'll bear all the elements patiently waiting for the doors to open on the 17th of November. That day will mark the third coming of gamers' paradise on Earth.

In the middle of this month, just over a week away, Sony will finally release its revolutionary gaming system, the PlayStation 3, and the world will change forever. Children will disappear for months into their rooms to immerse themselves in various high-definition fantasy worlds that will tickle all of their senses in a way that real life could never hope to do.

Relationships will crumble at the hands of this super-computer: no one with a PS3 will have time to converse or interact with other living beings unless it is through the high-speed Internet games soon to be funneled through the sleek system.

News, education, physical activity and even eating will go largely ignored in favor of letting one's eyes play over the intensely realistic graphics. Passerby will be drawn to the kiosks at Best Buy, where they will watch whatever game is being played until the drool puddles at their feet. Many may not survive the weeks and months following Sony's most anticipated console release, but though the system may shatter society as we know it, there is much good that can come out of this super-computer of entertainment.

Once enthralled in their gaming universe of choice, their senses will be bombarded in a way only high powered, American-driven gaming consoles can deliver.

The best example of this will be the PS3's effect with the War on Terror. This is a war that will continue indefinitely if we persist in using conventional weapons. Fighting a war against an idea inevitably fails because frequently the missiles we send to take out radical idealists end up becoming the very seeds that sprout into more radical idealists. When one cruise missile takes out a terrorist leader and 10 innocent bystanders, that's one terrorist down and 10 new families that have reason to hate America.

Thus, we cannot fight the War on Terror as if it were a traditional war. Instead, we must sell our American way of life to the terrorists. If we prove to our terrorist foes that we're not all about exploiting the weak and doing anything for economic gains, perhaps they will feel their hatred cooled and their hearts warmed. Here's where Sony comes into play.

The PlayStation 3 will be our most valuable weapon in this new front. Just imagine what this machine could achieve single-handedly. It will hum quietly with the unprecedented power of an 8-core processor (take 8 standard processors and cram them onto one micro-chip) as it serenades any enemy of America and soothes them into a relaxed state of digital bliss.

Once enthralled in their gaming universe of choice, their senses will be bombarded in a way only high powered, American-driven gaming consoles can deliver. Anyone with a terrorist mindset will be quickly swayed to loving the PlayStation 3 and all the imaginative possibilities it offers. People of any ideology will question their own reality in the face of the stunning images playing over their eyes, and any hatred they once felt will slowly fade into the back of their minds, soon to be forgotten.

In a world where everyone has a PS3, there will be no conflict except the virtual kind. Political debate will cease to exist, as the only relevant conversation will be that of how sweet the last level you played was. Freedom will expand and exist everywhere, because PS3 comes with free access to all of its online features. And finally, when reality is no longer our main plane of existence, we will all enjoy much more peaceful lives within the world created for us by Sony.

Congress has shifted, at least in the House, and so it is time for a new approach to this War on Terror. Right now, according to nationalpriorities.org, the war in Iraq will cost American taxpayers a total of $315 billion. If we, as a nation, take all of that money and put it towards PS3's, we should be able to get at least … one. And maybe, with a little help from the international community, we could pool together funds for a decent game to go with it.

It may be small, but it would be a start on the new road to victory in the War on Terror.

A look at hypocrisy

S.P. Sullivan

I had a friend in high school who had to take a drug test because she fell asleep in class.

A little excessive? I think most people would say so. But that's the sort of thing one would expect from high school administrations, people who are so terrified of substance abuse that they'll go to great lengths to prevent it — from D.A.R.E. propaganda to campy '80s after-school specials in health class. How relieved I was when I came to UMass, where Orwellian drug-and-alcohol-abuse prevention policies wouldn't be tolerated, and where we would be treated as adults, with all the rights afforded to us in the Constitution.

Fat chance. Now that we live where we learn, these policies are allowed to permeate our personal space. High school protected us, however misguidedly, from the dangers of drug and alcohol abuse — and they got away with it because we weren't legal adults. I'm in college now, thanks, and I'll make my own decisions.

What's troubling about the drug and alcohol policy on campus isn't merely that it's patronizing, but that it's alarmingly intrusive.

What's troubling about the drug and alcohol policy on campus isn't merely that it's patronizing, but that it's alarmingly intrusive. I'm no libertarian, so I understand not all of the rights afforded to legal adults in our nation's constitution can be protected on campus, but the housing policy can at least pretend that it's trying.

The constitution tells me I have the right to freedom of expression, but section II.D.10.f. (Possession of alcohol paraphernalia) of the campus Alcohol & Drug policy tells me that "the possession and/or use of drinking paraphernalia or products that promote the abuse of alcohol … is prohibited." This, of course, has even been interpreted to include posters that depict alcoholic beverages; so much for freedom of expression.

The Fifth Amendment to the constitution provides the right to due process, which is to say that an individual is innocent until proven guilty. A young lady down the hall from me was written up because the hallway in her general vicinity "smelled" like marijuana. Try proving what something "smelled" like in a court of law.

Two other young women on my floor were written up for possession of alcohol and engaging in drinking games when they were discovered in a dorm in which people were playing Beirut. They claimed they were in the room for literally 40 seconds, which isn't exactly enough time to get hammered and play a couple of rounds of 'Ruit. Nevertheless, while the constitution dictates that the burden of proof is on the state, they had to go before an ARD and prove their innocence. When they were found guilty of these infractions (and not by a jury of their peers, mind you) they appealed them.

Unfortunately, they were told that the University was not accepting appeals for level one offenses this semester. Imagine the kind of uproar that would result if the U.S. Court of Appeals put a sign on its doors that read "Temporarily Closed"; the ACLU would have a conniption fit.

This sort of hypocrisy also hit pretty close to home. My roommate, among several of our friends, was written up because the RAs on duty were investigating a noise violation and saw shot glasses on a table in the room. What gives this anecdote a twist of irony that would make author O. Henry foam at the mouth is that the "alcohol paraphernalia" in question were UMass shot glasses purchased from the Campus Center Store.

Talk about mixed messages.

This isn't a criticism of the Residence Life Staff, however. My peer mentor has always been helpful, and my RA is a very reasonable guy. They just happen to be sensible human beings whose job it is to enforce ridiculous policy. The RAs never do anything that hasn't been dictated by the Housing Agreement and Code of Student Conduct. However, printing ludicrous policies in black ink doesn't lend any them any more legitimacy than scribbling them on the bathroom wall.

It could also be argued that students have no right to complain about campus policies. We did sign the Residence Hall Contract, in which every one of us pledged to follow the rules and regulations dictated by the Code of Student Conduct. Every student on campus is encouraged to read the Code of Student Conduct and to know their rights; however, they aren't exactly afforded the liberty of picking and choosing which rules to agree to — it's take it or leave it.

Taking it means subjecting oneself to the ever-vigilant eye of the Resident Life Staff and Campus Police. Leaving it means living off campus — an option that isn't always plausible for broke college students.

Do I expect any change in administrative policy anytime soon? Of course not, I'm a realistic guy. What I propose is not a change in policy, but in phraseology. If UMass students are going to be governed under a Code of Student Conduct to which they agreed because they had no other option, then let's call a spade a spade, out with the Residence Hall Contract.

Next year, be on the lookout for the Residence Hall Ultimatum.

II.D.10.f. Possession of alcohol paraphernalia:

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

TAKING THE MIDDLE GROUND

In response to Jason Robert Mizula's article "Let's put the 'united' back in United States," I was thrilled to read a non-partisan political editorial on Election Day.

There was a mix of humor and reality in his article that really hit home on such an important day to so many citizens and students at UMass.

As a republican who also leans closer to the center, it is possible to be politically aware and active, yet not completely agree with everything that a party offers.

I'm glad to see that there are people out there who want to see more strength between citizens rather than detachment due to partisan politics.

New winter trends

Kelly McGuire

It's about that time again ladies. We are starting to wake up in the morning and shiver at the thought of getting out of bed and into something warm enough to block us from the wind and cold that will hit our faces as soon as we step outside. The goal is simple: staying warm. However, there's a way to stay warm and keep those heads turning with your look too.

In order to stay warm for the winter, many of us have to put on layer upon layer in order to keep from freezing in these Massachusetts winters. Before this winter, there wasn't too much out in stores (or even deep in your closets) that would keep you warm and keep you looking cute. Have no fear — this season's fashion is all about the cute winter clothes — while keeping cozy from head to toe.

THE ESSENTIALS: everyone needs a few good pair of pants to keep you bundled up. However, we all know jeans are the typical pant selection and most of the time they don't do their job with warming your legs. You can still wear the jeans, but just throw a pair of heavy tights underneath them to secure the hair from sprouting back up on your legs. You can get some heavy tights at any department store. My personal favorites are from Calvin Klein. They can be found at any Macys around the country and, more often than not, the prices are very affordable.

Have some cute winter skirts, but year after year they sit in your closet every year because your legs are too cold to wear them? Well, guess what? Heavy tights are back. Stick them on with a cute wool skirt and some high boots for the winter and not only do you look adorable, but the combination of the wool skirt, boots and tights will keep your bottom half protected from the cold.

Now for tops. Let's save our sweatshirts for comfy days inside the house and be a bit more daring this winter season. Oversized sweaters are back with a vengeance this season and it looks as if everyone is welcoming them back. On your next shopping trip venture to the nearest Express, Forever 21 or The Limited and take your pick on the cutest sweaters of the season; long V-neck sweaters or some oversized cardigans. Solid colors work the best with this look; namely, black, beige, deep purples or blues, and even browns.

Grab one or two of these sweaters for the fast approaching winter season. Pair one of them with some jeans or leggings and you'll be good to go. The best part about these funky frocks is that they are normally made of some pretty heavy material, especially the ones from Express, Limited and New York & Co. So they keep you extremely comfortable while being in for the fashion season.

Winter shoes are trikey because students at UMass have to truck around in some pretty severe weather conditions. So, when you're knee-deep in snow, heels are definitely out of the question. As mentioned in last weeks article, UGGs are great, because they are still trendy on campus and they do the best job of keeping your toes from freezing off.

If you're sick of the UGG look and want an alternative, try a flat leather boot. They just recently exploded on the fashion scene this season (many people call them the pirate boot) and they can be found everywhere. If your budget is tight — and for college students, it normally is — you can find them at Payless and Target for anywhere from $24.99 to $49.99. If you're looking to get a slightly better quality boot, Nine West has a great variety for footwear, with boots generally ranging from $69.99 to $199.99.

Well, that's it for the week, ladies. Always remember to be confident in what you wear. You wear the clothes, they don't wear you. Rock your style.

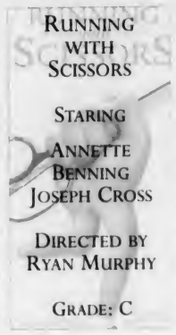
'Running with Scissors' does not cut it

By Kate Bauer
Collegian Staff

The film adaption of Augusten Burroughs memoir lacks the details of his life that the book goes in great detail to describe.

Back in 2003 a seemingly unknown writer named Augusten Burroughs released his memoir, "Running With Scissors." In the book, Burroughs invites readers into his life and introduces them to a family more freaky than the fictional Adams family. TriStar Pictures later bought the film rights to the book.

The film version was released back in October, and it attempts to bring the wacky Finch family to the big screen with the help of first-time feature director Ryan Murphy. Murphy is famous for his role as director and main writer for the FX show "Nip Tuck."



Meet the family: there's Dr. Finch (Brian Cox), who has a masturbatorium and hands out prescription pills like candy. His wife Agnes (Jill Clayburgh) spends her days on the couch watching old black and white horror flicks while enjoying snacks of dog kibble. Hope (Gwyneth Paltrow), the alleged favorite of the two daughters, claims that her cat speaks to her. And Natalie (Evan Rachel Wood) struts around in skimpy clothing, angry at the world. Natalie is probably the sanest of the group, wanting to go to college and find a way out of the family.

Ever had a wacky cousin, or that weird neighbor you think is doing experiments in the basement, a la "The Burbs?" Well, multiply their weirdo-ness by 10 and you've got a better understanding of just how crazy the Finches are. The problem? I'm referring to the book family, not the movie one.

The creativeness and the shock factor that was so well executed in the book is surprisingly mundane in the movie. This comes to a shock for many since Murphy does the very opposite in "Nip Tuck." At times, the film drifts too far away from the book, focusing more on the lives of both Augusten (Joseph Cross) and the mother (Annette Bening), whereas the book focused more on Augusten's experience growing up with the Finches. Perhaps they wanted to make sure Bening got enough screen time — good thing she uses the time well.

While the performances are implemented well, they lack the depth read in Burroughs' memoir. Murphy also uses the Finch house and overall décor of the film as a sort of secondary character, which draws away from the more important elements of the film and the primary characters themselves.

Oddly compiled, the film moves along at too slow of a pace to keep the viewer's attention through all of the film. The performances, though short on screen time, are what keep the audience from starting to snore. Bening is a delight to watch as a stripped-down woman on the edge of completely losing it. Cox's Dr. Finch walks throughout the film in a continued dream-like stance, as it everything is normal in his own personal la la land. And though Cross works well as a young Burroughs, he lacks that coming-of-age ingredient needed at the end of the film.

If you plan on reading the book or seeing the film, keep in mind: the book is a memoir, not a biography. The real-life Finches do not acknowledge the material in the book or film as fact, and have unsuccessfully attempted to sue Burroughs.

Decemberists performance a real treat

By Allie Ruth
Collegian Staff

It's true: Halloween was more than a week ago. Whether it remains a distant memory or forgettable experience, this Halloween was a remarkable one for those who filled up the Calvin Theater in Northampton in anticipation of treat like none other.

As the stage lights lowered, red Japanese lanterns illuminated like glowing spheres. The dim lights revealed the background, which was an ivory cloth decorated with the Asian-inspired illustrations found in their newest albums "Crane Wife" liner notes. Resounding applause and cheers resonated from the audience as to recognize that something exciting was about to occur. Suddenly, gothic entrance music cued up and five bodies dressed in ninja costumes appeared on stage, taking up the space that had been vacated.

The five mysterious ninjas scattered across the stage, each armed with musical instruments and ninja sticks. The entrance music slowly blended into the opening chords of song familiar to most audience members, "Crane Wife #1." As the introduction of the song wore on, the main ninja stripped off his mask to expose that he was none other than The Decemberists' lead-singer, Colin Meloy. He found his vocalist skills impeded by the constricting nature of the mask and opted to remove it. Then, following Meloy's action, Chris Funk, Jenny Conlee and John Moen shed their masks as well.

The only band member to stay in his ninja costume fully was bassist Nate Query, who throughout the show was "living out his 8th grade dream — being a ninja and playing in a rock band," according to Meloy.

The atmosphere of the show was more like a performance of a play than a typical rock show. Most of the songs played were from the latest release, "The Crane Wife." Mixed in, however, were "We Both Go Down Together," "The Gymnast, High Above the Ground," "Here I Dreamt I Was An Architect" and "16 Military Wives."

When the first part of the set was over, the ninjas returned to stage for "Red Right Ankle" and "O! Cadaverous Song." Without warning, the Decemberists morphed into what Meloy called "R.E.M. Ninjas." This transformation was seemingly odd, but sort of understandable and humorous.

The justification lies in Meloy's transition from carefully sipping a wine glass at the beginning of the evening to chugging a bottle of red wine by the end of the show.

Some of the songs played from the latest release were "The Island," "Shankhill Butchers" and "The Crane Wife 3." Other songs played were "The Mariner's Revenge Song," "The Bagman's Gambit" and "The Engine Driver."

The encore began with "The Chimbley Sweep" and "Sons and Daughters." The Decemberists then left the stage, only to return for a second encore. The band played "Leslie Anne Levine" and "The Tain," which was a 12-minute epic song that included a drum solo by Moen.

Traveling through space with MSMW

By Dave Master

John Scofield joined up with legendary trio Medeski, Scofield and Martin for the album 'Out Louder.' The jazz super group is now on tour promoting the album.

Better bring your moon boots to the Calvin Theatre in Northampton this Saturday night. If you don't, your feet will surely get stuck in cosmic dust.

Medeski, Scofield, Martin & Wood is a futuristic, progressive jazz group who teamed up with freak guitarist John Scofield this year to create the scariest conglomeration of music since Miles Davis' Bitches Brew. The modern, spacey project can be heard on their new album "Out Louder," which was released this past September.

Why Medeski, Scofield, Martin & Wood? Why not Scofield, Medeski, Martin & Wood? It literally sounds like Scofield is getting in the middle of the group. In fact, he is, and that's the intended idea.

The formal group is taking off in a new musical direction, not knowing their interstellar destination. For now, they are just seeing where the ship lands, like they've always done since their humble beginnings.

"Out Louder," consisting of mostly musical fusion, bursts with energy right from its opening track, titled "Little Walter Rides Again." Lift-off is commenced when drummer Billy Martin explodes into a hip-hop/funk groove. Scofield starts off with staccato strumming as the flames beneath the ship begin to burn. John Medeski, keyboard player, gracefully chimes his Hammond b3 organ, settling the groove into a more legato feel — a layer of smoke is released. Bass player Chris Wood bursts into a funky, syncopated rhythm, officially launching the song into space. Throughout the song, Scofield, Wood, and Medeski take turns soloing as they pleasantly glide through a background of stars.

The fourth track of the album, "Tequila and Chocolate," is a tasty mix of bossa nova and MSMW signature styles, creating something more like a super-nova. The band uses this song to further explore the infinite possibilities of space travel.

Scofield begins the song with a musical soliloquy; a black hole of musical tones as Medeski plays the organ reminiscent of "Toccata in Fugue." They ease into the groove as Scofield becomes more methodical with his choice of notes, eventually playing the melody of the song. Wood thumps away on the bass, playing funk more than a steady bossa nova feel. Scofield takes the first solo, sounding like he is going backwards in time. As this track progresses, MSMW becomes a swelling supernova, releasing energy that is full of distinctive musical nuances.

John Scofield is a boiling-pot of musical styles. He brings distinct musical utensils to the table, resulting in endless possibility and direction. His membership to MMW is nothing short of his past endeavors. Scofield is at the leading forefront of jazz — an unstoppable talent that seems almost impossible to obtain. Scofield is known to play with Billy Stewart, Steve Swallow, Marc Johnson, and Joe Lovano, to name a few.

This current musical joining is somewhat of a surprise. Scofield has redefined the jazz guitar sound, causing many other musicians to keep up or subject themselves to an evolutional flaw. In music, only the strong survive. MMW hasn't quite redefined music, but created — and still recreates — their own, unique sound. With the new membership of Scofield — it isn't clear yet if this is a permanent addition — MMW may be trying to further extend their sound as they are known to do so. A keyboardist, drummer, and bass player can only take music so far. But MMW have stretched and expanded their music bubble to the point of explosion. Now, they are in a new intergalactic bubble, navigating their way through outer space together, along with the Captain Kirk of music, Mr. Scofield. They use their songs as space vessels.

This current collaboration is a stretch for both Scofield and MMW. The joining of these two forces is like the joining of Luke Skywalker and Han Solo; they both are specialists in what they do, but Han doesn't believe in "the force." Who is Han and who is Luke in this case? It is hard to decipher and in this case, it doesn't matter. More importantly, Luke and Han worked together to save the world.

MSMW will set their calculations for hyperspace, because ultimately, that is there interstellar destination; the future. Just wait for Medeski's cue as he fiddles behind his operation board of keyed instruments before traveling through the vacuum of light speed.

And good luck Saturday night. Hopefully the band won't leave a trail of burning stellar dust behind. On second thought, better bring your spacesuit instead of just rain boots for protection.

Noho film festival now underway

By Morgan-Ann Rousseau
Collegian Staff

The 2006 Northampton Independent Film Festival got up and running last night with an opening night reception and its first screening. The NIFF will run through Sunday, Nov. 12, and will offer a variety of short, feature, experimental and documentary films.

The first film screened at this year's NIFF was "Disappearances," a prohibition-era tale of whiskey smuggling, a family's mysterious past and a teenage boy's rite of passage.

Today at 2 p.m. screenings begin at the Academy of Music with short film documentaries "Caught in Paint," "The Rhythm of Youth," "Unicorn Pride," "My Eyes Were Fresh" and "Birdstate."

After a 7 p.m. screening of the feature film "Cathedral Pines" at the Academy of Music, filmmaker and other crew will be present for a question and answer panel.

On Friday the filmic fun starts at 11:30 a.m. at the Academy of Music with "Greasy Rider," "Cartomeros" filmmaker Ernesto Lyon-Grossman be present to answer questions after the screening.

At 8:30 p.m. the screenings will get creatively colorful with the "Experimental Animation" category of short films to be held at Graham Hall on the Smith College campus. Some of these shorts include "Farber's Nerve," "Never Live Above A Psychic," "Orange Boy," and "Saul Goodman," which will be followed by a question and answer session with director Jim Connell.

Friday's screenings also include a 9:15 p.m. showing of the 94-minute film "Johnny Slade's Greatest Hits," winner of the Best Comedy award at the Woods Hole Film Festival.

The film, which will be shown at Smith College's Steddard Hall, is about a has-been lounge singer who is hired by a mystery man to open a hot new club, but the catch is that he's given a new — and terrible — song to sing each night. Johnny gradually realizes something disturbing about his secret benefactor. Late night action will begin at 10 p.m. on Friday, when The Academy of Music will show the fourth session of short film screenings, entitled "Controlled Chaos: Selections From 10-11-'06." Leave the little cousin at home — it's adults only. Eleven short films of a risque nature will be screened at this showing.

Some special screening events on Saturday will include a screening of seven child-aged films at the Academy of Music entitled "Children's Program" which takes off at 10:30 a.m.

There are also a few intriguing options for people interested in the filmmaking process. At 11:30 a.m. Graham Hall will host a free screenwriters Panel, called "From Script to Screen." The panel will address both the elements of a good screenplay and the avenues a script can wander to make it to the screen.

Later on there is a free "producer's panel" to be held at 3 p.m. in Neilsen Hall. This promises to be a lively and informative panel as it features independent producers Laura Bernero, Michael Maller Gorman Bechard and Donnie Moorhouse. Each will discuss the essential elements of producing an independent feature film.

Saturday livens up at 9:30 with the Academy of Music's screening of "We Like to Drink, We Like to Play, Rock and Roll." The 75-minute film follows The Unband, a local hard rock band, as they rise, fall and try to get back up again. A special twist, besides that the filmmakers will attend this screening and answer questions, is that there is an after party with a performance by The Unband. The party is sponsored by The Advocate, and will be held at The Elevens.

Sunday features 22 screenings of both short and feature films, as well as a special panel on documentary filmmaking to be held at Graham ging from a wine bottle as the encore came to a close. Meloy put his guitar down and grabbed the microphone as he staggered across the stage singing R.E.M. songs "Begin the Begin," "Cuyahoga" and "Superman," before covering "Wooden Ships" (Crosby, Stills, Nash, and Young) and "What Goes On" (Velvet Underground).

As to keep with the theme of a Halloween show, the Decemberists conducted a costume contest that one could argue was unfair, biased and undemocratic. Conlee and Moen combed the audience looking for the best and most creatively dressed individuals. These individuals were then invited on stage for the voting process via an applause-o-meter (a.k.a. Conlee's sword). Some finalists were dressed in costumes related to various Decemberists songs: a butcher ("Shankill Butchers"), a chimney sweeper ("The Chimbley Sweep" song) and a crane ("The Crane Wife"). True fandom was alive that Halloween night.

Following last week's Halloween performance, Decemberists bassist Nate Query answered a few questions for the Daily Collegian. He talked about influences, methods of songwriting, other musicians, and the nourishing Northwestern environment in which the Decemberists were able to find their niche.

Daily Collegian: First, explain where the name The Decemberists comes from?

Nate Query: The band originally was going to use the name The December Brides, but due to discouraging comments from friends, decided to change the name to the Decemberists at the last minute. Like many band names, it was coined at the first show.

DC: Which bands or musicians were influential for you while while growing up? What bands are influential now?

NQ: I grew up listening to classic rock and jazz, and only later on got turned on to hip hop and indie rock. As cliché as it might be, I would say that some of my biggest influences were John Paul Jones, Paul McCartney, and a long list of jazz bassists. As far as the rest of the band, our influences range far and wide- from folk to classical to metal to college rock.

DC: Do you feel your location in the Northwest of the United States has had an effect on the type of music you record?

NQ: I think that we have all been active in the Northwest music scene before and since forming the Decemberists, so it follows that the musicians we are friends with and work with would influence our work. Besides that, I think that the Northwest maintains a spirit of independence from the rest of the country, and we have certainly tried to set ourselves apart from current trends in music and culture. Perhaps Oregonians are provincial, but I appreciate the sense of value that people in the Northwest place on their local communities.

During the encore of the Decemberists concert this past Halloween the band played three R.E.M songs and one Velvet Underground song.

DC: Has the prospering music community of this region and such bands like Death Cab for Cutie and the Long Winters made it easier to foster and come into your own?

NQ: Because music is such a fickle and difficult business, it's common to have peers who are either much greater or much less successful than you. Despite or maybe because of that, we depend a lot on other members of the music community for information and guidance. And likewise, we are now in a position to be helpful to our peers who are on a lower rung of the ladder.

DC: Can you explain the band's song writing process? Especially in reference to the new album and epic songs like "The Island" and "Crane Wife 1 & 2."

NQ: Colin brings songs to the band finished and usually has ideas for arrangement. At that point, we get together and start fleshing out the songs and deciding on instrumentation. Sometimes, as with the Island, this can lead to whole new sections, but often, it's pretty clear the direction the song will take and it's more simply a matter of adding parts.

DC: What bands do you think people should know about?

NQ: Michael Zapruder's Rain of Frogs from San Francisco and The Citizens from New York. In the spirit of full disclosure, both are friends of mine. Both released records this year that are really great.

DC: How do you feel about the comparisons to Neutral Milk Hotel? Do you believe this is accurate?

NQ: I find them a bit tiresome, honestly. A lot of Neutral Milk Hotel fans got excited about the first Decemberists album, but that doesn't mean the comparisons are valid. It's really only bothersome because it was so overdone. No offense to NMH, I just think many of those early reviews were a bit reductive.

DC: And finally, what is "the perfect crime?"

NQ: No such thing, I would say. I suppo se it's the illusion of impossible success.

Get the hint: they're not that into you

Jasmine Monteiro

Have you ever wondered why that boy you're seeing is so forgetful? Or why the girl you started seeing doesn't have much time to go out? I think it's time for everyone to get a rude awakening.

If you start realizing that someone isn't doing things for you that you would do for them in return, they're just not feeling you. For anyone who just started seeing someone and doesn't comprehend how they can say one thing and do another, it's okay — I don't get it either. But in reality, one thing is for sure: you're not an essential part of their routine.

No one wants to admit that the person they're pursuing is no longer pursuing them, but sometimes it's necessary. At the first sign of a problem, don't ignore it — learn to recognize it. As long as you take the time to realize what's really going on, what you do with it is all up to you.

The fact of the matter is everyone has priorities, especially in college life. We have school work, family, friends and parties to think about, which may not be an easy task. However, if you meet someone you really like, how easy is it to you find a way to fit them in your schedule? You want to see them and get to know them; you're anxious to create a connection with them. If you know you'd put off another school paper to go get some coffee with them, and that they wouldn't do the same, you need to get your mind right.

Both guys and girls would be willing to sacrifice a little time to get to know someone. Use your better judgment, though. Sometimes it is difficult for someone to juggle their time accordingly, and they do really want to get to know you.

However, you have to think about if that's what you really want. If you're interested in being in a relationship, how will that play a role later on? If they don't have time for you in the beginning, think about how much that'll interfere when you're comfortable with you. No, it won't change — stop lying to yourself.

However, if someone is constantly reiterating how attractive you are and how much they like you, it's okay to blush a little, but make them prove it. If they don't do enough in reciprocation to what you do, let them go. If he would rather go out drinking with his friends time and time again, give it up. If she's always coming up with a different reason to deny your invitation to dinner, get the hint. I know everyone likes a challenge but if you put more time into someone, you're bound to get disappointed, and ultimately hurt more than you realize.

If you really want to get to know someone and possibly form a relationship with them you shouldn't heave to compromise your needs. If someone is into you as much as you are into them, you should get out of it just as much as you put in. That doesn't mean you should expect them to throw themselves at you every chance they get. But they'll want to see you just as much as you want to see them, and you'll know it. Don't try to convince yourself that it's something that it's not. Realizing what you have (or don't have) is a lot easier when you're not oblivious to the fact. So stop being naïve, they're just not into you.

Sedaris is on her way to fame with new book

By John Tanasychuk
South Florida Sun-Sentinel

Is Amy Sedaris a party expert?

"No. I do the same thing over and over again," says the comedian, actress, little sister of best-selling storyteller David Sedaris and author of a kooky new book, "I Like You: Hospitality Under the Influence" (Warner, $27.99). "The only reason my book is in chapters is because I just thought those would be challenging situations for a hostess."

Each chapter — "A Rich Uncle Comes to Visit," "Grieving," "The Out of Town Guest" — comes with tips, recipes and Sedaris-style suggestions for successful entertaining.

Those attending a wake, for example, should not ask if the deceased smoked or was drinking at the time of death.

Out-of-town guests should not only offer to set the table but also rake leaves, wash windows and paint baseboards.

Sedaris is not quite famous, not quite nobody. She starred in "Strangers With Candy" as the freaky Jerri Blank, the oddly sympathetic former drug addict who returns to high school in middle age. She was in "Elf" and "School of Rock" and played Carrie Bradshaw's publisher on "Sex and the City." She sells cheese balls and cupcakes that she makes in her West Village kitchen. She's a regular on David Letterman's show.

"I don't think of myself as a famous person," she says. "I don't get stopped on the street. I don't endorse products. The telephone's not ringing off the hook. It's great, but I don't know if I'd attach the word famous to it."

Her book is filled with not-so-subtle references to pot smoking. Thus, the "under the influence" portion of its title. Designer Todd Oldham took many of the photos, and other friends helped put the book together over 18 months. It's loaded with visuals reminiscent of a vintage cookbook, a kitsch-filled thrift store and your college party pics. It was photographed in Sedaris' apartment.

Buy this book for instructions on making a plant hanger out of pantyhose.

Buy this book if you like the sound of the following pumpkin pie recipe: "Directions are on back of can of pumpkin."

"I want them to know what it takes to throw a party," Sedaris says when asked why she wrote the book. "So if you don't entertain, next time you go to someone's house, you know how to be a good guest. You don't show up empty handed, three times in a row."

Do not, however, show up at any of her book signings with gifts. She's received artwork, pocketbooks, pills, books and treats for her pet rabbit, Dusty.

"What are they thinking? Someone gave me a huge pillow, the size of a steering wheel. It just amazes me. How am I supposed to get this home?"

Urban discuses his past habbits

Keith Urban, who entered a rehabilitation center for alcohol abuse last month, has some advice for people struggling with addiction and sobriety: Communicate.

Best Life, a men's magazine, interviewed Urban in Nashville, Tenn., 2 1/2 weeks before he entered rehab. The Grammy-winning singer, who has publicly acknowledged a former addiction to cocaine, says his advice for "souls at sea" is to "start communicating with the people around you."

"Everyone gets overwhelmed at points, but it's when you think you can handle it yourself and you don't reach out for help. That's when the end is near," Urban says in the December issue, on newsstands Nov. 17. "Recognize that you are about the tire, that drowning is looming."

He adds: "I've definitely been that drowning guy, and in the midst of drowning, I thought, 'I wonder if I should put my hand up?' ... I'm just really grateful to be present and doing what I can. And if it overwhelms me, I speak out and say, 'There is too much going on.'"

Urban won male vocalist of the year for the second year in a row at the Country Music Association Awards, presented in Nashville on Monday night.

His award was accepted by Ronnie Dunn, who read a letter from Urban in which he thanked his friends and family and his wife, Nicole Kidman. The couple were married in June.

"I'm looking forward to coming home and seeing you all soon," Urban said in the letter.

His new CD, "Love, Pain, & the whole crazy thing," was released Tuesday as scheduled, but it was announced last month that he would postpone all upcoming promotional appearances.

Urban won a Grammy this year for best male country vocal performance for "You'll Think of Me."

Reed looks to future

By Shay Quillen
San Jose Mercury News, Calif.

Lou Reed isn't one to focus on the past.

The music he created in the 1960s and '70s remains a touchstone for the hippest rock bands. But Reed would rather talk about his new Moog Voyager synthesizer "the Stradivarius of electronics," he calls it and the possibilities of today.

"There couldn't be a better time to be a musician than right now with all these astonishing instruments available," says Reed, 64. "I mean, someone's gonna put this stuff together in a different way, somebody really smart, and just bust it open."

That's exactly what Reed and his bandmates did with the Velvet Underground in the 1960s, bringing pop art, hard-boiled literature and avant-garde musical techniques into rock 'n' roll to create something that flopped commercially at the time but still is reverberating 40 years later.

After leaving the band in 1970, Reed received as much attention throughout the '70s for his provocative public image as for his wildly inconsistent recorded output, which included his only hit single, "Walk on the Wild Side."

At the end of the decade he got married and sobered up, and for the past 25 years, he more or less has settled into his status as a serious writer and musician and respected elder statesman of rock. For the past decade he has shared a home in New York City with his partner, performance artist Laurie Anderson.

Although Reed's commercial impact has been moderate, his influence particularly from the work with the VU has shown no signs of going away.

In the '70s, Reed's androgynous image and aggressive attitude inspired glam and punk rockers. In the '80s, such college-rock bands as R.E.M. responded to Reed's melodic pop songs and tender ballads. In the '90s, it was the British "shoegazer" movement, with feedback-drenched music from such bands as My Bloody Valentine and the Jesus and Mary Chain.

Reed's influence popped up again in the new millennium with the emergence of the New York garage rock scene: the Strokes, the Yeah Yeah Yeahs and Interpol, as well as like-minded bands from other regions, including Detroit's White Stripes.

Reed has made a couple of high-profile appearances this year with his younger admirers, playing with the Strokes at the Rolling Stone 1,000th-issue party in May, then fronting the Raconteurs for a thrilling version of the VU's "White Light/White Heat" at the MTV Video Music Awards show in August.

"Oh, they were awesome," Reed says of the Raconteurs, a side project for White Stripes frontman Jack White. "I wish they would back me for the next year, but everybody would just stare at Jack."

His latest project is a stage version of his concept album "Berlin" from 1973, to be performed in upcoming months in New York and Australia. A profoundly dark song cycle, lavishly produced by Bob Ezrin (Pink Floyd's "The Wall"), the album was savaged by many critics upon its release. Now notables such as Ezrin, producer Hal Willner, visual artist Julian Schnabel and singer Antony are lending their talents to bring it to the stage for the first time.

"I wasn't delighted that it was called the worst record ever recorded," Reed says. "On the other hand, as my friend [famous songwriter] Doc Pomus used to say, 'Lou, look at the source.' I know me and Ezrin aren't stupid. We loved that. We put every last drop of blood in that thing ... I never and Bobby never doubted that we had done something incredibly wonderful."

come walking through the clubhouse door every day.

Too much attention is being focused on A-Rod as the sole reason why the Yankees haven't paraded a 27th World Series title around the Bronx. Could it be that all this trade talk is a result of pure disappointment and frustration on the Yankees' part, realizing A-Rod has the ability to come through for them when it matters most, but for whatever reason isn't doing it?

Why is there no talk of shipping Jason Giambi out of town, one of the most one-dimensional players in the game today? How about Hideki Matsui, who is a mess defensively in the outfield?

What about the inability of Yankee pitching to get anyone out on a mediocre Tigers' offense at best this past postseason? Through four games, Yankees pitchers had a 5.56 ERA. Is A-Rod supposed to put up six runs by himself?

Alright, I know what you're all saying. The Yankees could easily find a team willing to trade pitching for A-Rod's services. Problem solved.

But it may be the debate doesn't center on the question of whether they should or shouldn't trade A-Rod, but instead centers on whether they can or can't trade their gold glove third baseman.

The 252 million dollar man has a no-trade clause written into his contract and agent Scott Boras has said on multiple occasions that his most lucrative client would not be hesitant to waive it if he was asked to be traded. Done deal right there.

It really boggles my mind that the so called experts in the New York media and across the country have decided A-Rod can't handle the pressure of New York and would much rather be playing on a mediocre team than a winning team.

They couldn't be more wrong. This guy will be hungrier than ever after last postseason's performance to win a championship for New York. Do we all forget that this guy was willing to take a pay cut in order to be part of winning team in Boston during the 2003 off-season?

Do you really think A-Rod is going to accept a trade to a perennial loser like Lou Pinella's Cubs who have no shot of winning in the foreseeable future, just so he can amass hall of fame numbers in front of Jim Belushi and Bernie Mac leading the Cubs faithful in "Take Me Out to the Ball Game?"

When it comes to playing in obscurity and in front of fans who could care less about winning, A-Rod has been there, done that. The guy played in Texas for three seasons where the Cowboys receive more attention in June than the Rangers do.

And how many teams are going to be able to take on A-Rod's salary for the next five years? Not even the Boston Red Sox, who are usually second in payroll to the Yankees, could afford him in 2003 without asking him to take a pay cut.

But most importantly, what team out there will not only have the money to pay him and also have the quality pitchers the Yankees will want in return? Very few, if any, teams exist which meet the A-Rod trade criteria. So if you're not going to get equal value for one of your most valuable assets, why bother going through the whole trade process?

I understand if Steinbrenner and Cashman don't get the opportunity to read this column right away since they're probably very busy right now getting ready to overpay free agent pitcher Barry Zito. But if you want to win in '07, make sure to leave room in your batting order for maybe the best player of all time. Focus on the guys who throw the balls to home plate, not the ones who are hitting the balls out of the park and putting runs on the board on a regular basis.

We always want to stress the importance of the team over the individual when a team is successful, so how about doing the same thing when a team isn't successful?

Holyfield should get out now

By Tim Dahlberg
Associated Press

On the wall in my office is a poster of a fight that never was. Evander Holyfield and Mike Tyson were supposed to meet outdoors at Caesars Palace on Nov. 8, 1991, for the heavyweight title, but it would be five more years before they actually fought.

I couldn't help but look at the poster the other day as I listened on the phone to the ramblings of a fighter who once was.

On the wall is a young Holyfield glaring at an even younger Tyson. On the phone was an aging warrior who can't seem to figure out what time it is.

Time to get out. Time to enjoy life without getting hit in the head.

Time to quit before the brain turns to mush.

The guy on the poster might have listened. The former champ on the phone doesn't because he's living in a land of make believe.

In that land, he's the same fighter who stopped Tyson and was on his way to doing it again when he lost a chunk of his ear. In that land, it's been injuries and not age that has caused his sad but inevitable decline.

"I'm a lot better than what people have seen of me in about four or five years," Holyfield insists. "It's a rebirth."

His answers are all the same, mostly because Holyfield believes they are true. Those who have told him he's foolish to risk his life and mental health by continuing to fight are no longer around, replaced by yes men hoping to cash in on a name.

He's even got a goofy promoter whose idea of humor is to tell people that Holyfield is not just 44 but $44.95, the cost to buy his latest comeback on television.

But there's nothing humorous about this at all.

Sorry, Evander, but here's something those still trying to make a buck off of you won't tell you: Fighters don't get reborn.

Not at the age of 44. Not after taking the kind of punishment you've taken in the ring.

You've got no business fighting Friday night in Texas even if you really do believe the ultimate fantasy that someday you will become the undisputed heavyweight champion of the world.

That kind of talk is delusional, even given the sorry state of the heavyweight division today. Your reflexes are shot and your last real fight was so bad that the state of New York banned you from fighting within its borders ever again.

In Texas, apparently they'll let anyone fight. Either that or the people who license boxers didn't notice that you had won only once in your last six fights and that you don't speak quite as clearly as you used to.

OK, so you beat up an insurance salesman a few months ago in your return to the ring. My insurance salesman isn't so tough, either.

And, yes, George Foreman did win the heavyweight title at the age of 45. But Foreman spent 10 years preaching instead of fighting and, when he did return, he did so against a collection of stiffs who would pose no threat of injury to him.

You, on the other hand, have been getting hit in the head now pretty steadily for 36 years, ever since a coach at the youth center in Atlanta told you that you could someday become the heavyweight champion of the world.

You fulfilled that promise. Became the heavyweight champion four different times, beating everybody but Lennox Lewis along the way.

Made a heck of a lot of money along the way, too. The two fights with Tyson alone put $40 million into your bank account, plenty enough to pay the mortgage and light bill at your Atlanta mansion.

People stood in line to buy tickets for those fights. They invited the neighborhood over to watch on pay-per-view. And now you're reduced to this, trying to get fans to reach into their pockets and spend $44.95 for to watch you fight someone named Fres Oquendo.

My guess is, not many will. You can fool yourself, but with every fight it gets a little harder to fool the public.

Meanwhile, the clock keeps ticking, and you're not listening.

On the phone the other day, you said you wouldn't quit until achieving your goal of winning the undisputed heavyweight title once again. That's four titles in all, a formidable task for a fighter half your age.

"If I have to stay here to [the age of] 50, I will stay to 50," you said. "I will become the undisputed heavyweight champion of the world."

Sorry, Evander, but you won't. It's long past time you faced up to that reality.

If you do, maybe you won't end up like Muhammad Ali, who was destroyed by too many punches to the head. Maybe you won't follow the path of Jerry Quarry and his brother, Mike, who both died from dementia caused by blows to the head.

Maybe you won't become a ringside oddity, like Joe Louis was as he sat drooling in his wheelchair at fights in Las Vegas in his later years.

Because boxers aren't reborn at the age of 44.

But they can die trying.

Tim Dahlberg is a national sports columnist for The Associated Press

Minutemen are home free

UM win will clinch A-10 North Division

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

After a big 28-20 win over conference rival New Hampshire on the road last weekend, the Massachusetts football team returns to McGuirk Stadium for a matchup with the Maine Black Bears on Saturday.

Maine (6-3, 5-1 Atlantic 10) enters Saturday's game not having allowed more than 10 points in each of its last three games. On the road on Oct. 7 against Towson, the Black Bears beat the No. 17 team 28-7, then beat Villanova the next weekend at home, 20-7.

After losing to Rhode Island 3-0 on Oct. 28, Maine smashed Northeastern in a 30-3 rout at home. UMass coach Don Brown attributes Maine's defensive excellence to its defensive line.

"[Maine] is dynamic up front," he said. "They can rush the passer. They're big and physical. They can [put pressure on the quarterback], and they do."

UMass running back Steve Baylark will be put to the test on Saturday against a defense that is allowing just over 12 points per game on the season.

Arel Gordon, Maine's primary running back, is averaging 87.6 yards per game on the ground and will be a stiff test for the UMass defense, which will make the switch from defending a pass-heavy offense (UNH) to Maine's solid running attack.

"I think [Gordon] is really good," Brown said. "He's fast as hell. He can hurt you. Last week he did damage from the wide receiver position. He went down the middle of the field for a touch. And on the next play he lined up in split ends, and caught a post [route] for a touch. So not only can he hurt you in the run game, he can hurt you in the throw game."

Last week's New Hampshire win was the closest game the Minutemen played since they suffered a one-point loss to Navy on Sept. 9. The game was decided by the last play, when UNH quarterback Ricky Santos – on 4th-and-goal with 23 seconds remaining in the game and his team down by eight – threw an incomplete pass to turn the ball over and end the game.

Brown knows that there is the possibility of a letdown after a defining win, but he's convinced that his guys have been immune to that this week.

"We practiced too well last night for that to be an issue," Brown said. "We're not doing much on Sundays but we practiced yesterday fast and furious. It was one of the best practices of the year. Usually that's a telltale sign."

The Minutemen will conclude the regular season against Hofstra on Nov. 18 at home. UMass will finish the season at McGuirk Stadium with two straight home games. If the Minutemen win the next two games, they are assured at least two home playoff games, the first of which will be during Thanksgiving weekend.

Brown has preached the one-game-at-a-time mentality this season, but he does not deny that his players know the importance of these last two games.

"Our guys know what's at stake," he said.

Saturday is Fan Appreciation Day and Pop Warner Day at McGuirk Stadium, and the Minutemen will surely appreciate the home crowd, putting road trips like Towson and Navy in the rearview mirror.

The Minutemen have a chance to clinch the Atlantic 10 North outright on Saturday if they defeat Maine. The Black Bears came strongly out of the gates in conference play this year, defeating William & Mary in the second game of its season, then beating Villanova, Hofstra and Towson before losing 3-0 to Rhode Island on the road.

Maine averages 171.1 yards per game in the air and averaged 3.9 yards per play in total offense. Black Bears quarterback Ron Whitcomb enters Saturday's game having thrown for 1,267 yards, good for an average of 140.8 passing yards per game.

Senior running back Steve Baylark had 89 rushing yards and two touchdowns in Saturday's 28–20 win over New Hampshire. It marked his 12th career game with two scores. Baylark now has 1,133 rushing yards and 10 rushing touchdowns on 200 carries this season.

Perfect time to be at McGuirk

Sophomore defensive back Courtney Robinson is second on UMass in kick return yards with 394 on 15 returns. He averages 26.3 yards per return, and his longest kick return of the year is for 57 yards. Robinson also has one interception on the year.

Even though every game counts the same, those that come in November without a doubt carry more importance. The difficulty of those games is compounded when they happen to be on the road. But the Massachusetts football team need not worry about that anymore.

Its 28-20 win over UNH last Saturday was UMass' final road game of the season. From here on out it doesn't have to leave the Pioneer Valley until at least playoff time. Even then they might not — with wins in their final two games, the Minutemen have a good chance of securing home-field advantage.

"That's a great question, you already know the answer," said UMass coach Don Brown when asked about the perks of finishing the season at home. "It's nice when you don't have to worry about getting on the road and going.

"We've had four home games and now we have two more. It's the first time in three years that we've had six home games. It's kind of a good way to finish."

Sophomore quarterback Liam Coen agrees.

"It's so much better than playing those games [last year] – one at Army and one at Hofstra," he said. "That Hofstra game, we were at their place and they were all pumped up."

Last season at this time, the Minutemen were in prime position to make the playoffs when they went on the road for their final two games. They ultimately lost both and missed the postseason. That is something Coen says the Maroon and White will try and change this year.

"We looked ahead last year and we got ahead of ourselves. We didn't get the job done," he said. "So, we're really trying to focus on these next two, but we're not stupid. We know that if we win we'll put ourselves in great position for the playoffs. We know what we're playing for."

Playing at McGuirk the next two weeks could give the Minutemen an edge over their opponents. Over the past three years, UMass has had good success playing in Amherst. Since 2004 it is 11-3 at home.

Being at home can also change the feeling of games, Coen said. Playing in front of the home crowd gives a team a boost on the playing field.

"It's definitely a better feeling for the guys. We like playing at our place. We play great at home," Coen said. "We play faster at home, and with a little more confidence. We're just psyched we don't have to travel right now. Going on the road right now isn't fun. We'd much rather be at our apartments hanging out and be able to just go through our normal routine."

Knowing they don't have to go on the road again anytime soon, the Minutemen have a relaxed but focused attitude about their upcoming contests.

"We're having a good time with it. We're just trying not to let it get too habitual," Coen said. "We have to keep having fun with it, keep going out to practice and having a good time. Our prize is that we get to play on Saturday. We'll put ourselves in good position if we can get this one."

With the addition of fieldturf this offseason, the advantage of playing at McGuirk has increased this year. Gone are the days when autumn rains ruin the playing field.

The scene of the playing field after last year's game against James Madison is still well known in Amherst. There was no grass on the field, just a lake of mud.

"You don't even know what it would have been like last year or what we'd be doing right now," Brown said of the rains that have come through the area this week. "We'd be [saying] can we go here, can we go here, go out there or do we have to wait until eight o'clock and go out on Garber."

Trading Rodriguez would be bad move

Kevin Dooley

Wait a minute, am I about to give advice that will help the New York Yankees in 2007? Please forgive me, Red Sox Nation. I'll have to remember to hide under my desk so Coco Crisp and his dad don't come in with a pair of scissors and cut my official Red Sox Nation membership card to pieces.

George Steinbrenner and the brain trust in Tampa Bay already made one rational, clear-headed decision early in the offseason by keeping Joe Torre at the helm as manger. Now it's time to make another one.

If Steinbrenner and Brian Cashman still have any common sense left, they won't waste their time trading "Mickey Mouse Gloves," aka their third baseman, Alex Rodriguez.

The source igniting the whole trade hoopla in New York and across the country is A-Rod's "off year" this past season, in which he committed 24 errors at third base and had a horrible postseason average, hitting .079.

Couple Rodriguez's dismal postseason with the fact that the Yankees are heading into their sixth consecutive offseason without a World Series title and you have the media circus surrounding A-Rod's future in the Big Apple.

Somehow, the experts in New York believe Rodriguez's sub-par season directly correlates with the Yankees not parading around a World Series trophy through the Bronx.

His "off year" in 2006, by the way, consisted of hitting close to .290, hitting 35 home runs, and driving in 121 RBI. There isn't one player in baseball who wouldn't take those numbers.

A-Rod is one year removed from an AL MVP in which he beat out Boston's own David Ortiz, hitting 48 home runs, 130 RBI, and hit over .300 with 194 hits.

The guy has 464 home runs to his credit at age 31 and he's well on his way to becoming the youngest player in the history of baseball to reach the 500 home run mark. Just to throw some more numbers at you, A-Rod is one of only three players in baseball history to have compiled 35 home runs, 100 RBI and 100 runs scored in seven consecutive seasons.

The guy has proven he can get it done defensively as well, winning two consecutive Gold Glove Awards at shortstop while playing for the Texas Rangers, before making a remarkably smooth transition to third base his first year donning the pinstripes in 2004.

What I'm getting at is players of Rodriguez's caliber don't

SPORTS FACT OF THE DAY

Larry Bird is one of just three players in NBA history to earn three straight regular season MVP awards. He accomplished that feat from 1984 to 1986. The Boston Celtics won their 15th and 16th world championships during that stretch.

Stronger than ever

Dante Milligan, a year removed from his brother's tragic death, enters 2006 with renewed focus

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

"Enjoy life today. Yesterday is gone. Tomorrow may never come."

That is the tattoo on the arm of UMass junior forward Dante Milligan. Below the phrase is a picture of his late brother, Alonzo Milligan, who was shot and killed in a random shooting in East Harlem in June of 2005.

Over a year later, the death that was once so very hard on Dante, has turned into more than just a tragedy. It has become motivation.

"It has definitely inspired me a lot more," Milligan says about his brother's death. "At times last year it affected me too much. I wanted to do so much and I had so many things going on in my mind that things just kind of clashed. That's why I wasn't that productive last year because I was doing too much thinking out there. This year I'm more focused and I'm just trying to have a better season."

Dante had transferred to UMass just five months before his brother's tragic death. He began his collegiate basketball career at the University of Pittsburgh, where, after sitting out his first year as a redshirt and riding the bench during the Panthers' run to the Sweet 16, Milligan totaled seven points and six rebounds in five games in 2004-05.

Milligan was dealing with a nagging thumb injury throughout the beginning of the season, and had a difference of opinion with his coach, Jamie Dixon.

"Coach didn't want me to get surgery, which I knew I needed to get," Milligan recalls. "But yet, he didn't want to play me during the games, and he wanted me to just practice. So I decided that wasn't the best situation for me, and I decided to move on."

When he came to UMass in January of 2005, Milligan was forced to sit out that spring semester, and the first half of last season under the NCAA transfer guidelines.

Milligan wasn't on the move quite as much as his coaches were, however. He struggled to get accustomed to his new coaches that seemed to change everywhere he went. Ben Howland was the coach at Pittsburgh who recruited Dante, but right after he committed to the Panthers, Howland left to coach at UCLA.

Not long after his move to Amherst, a similar situation came about. Milligan was recruited by Steve Lappas, who was then fired by UMass Athletic Director John McCutcheon, and replaced with Travis Ford at the end of the 2004-05 season.

Milligan played in 22 games last year for the Minutemen, averaging 3.3 points per game and grabbing four rebounds per game, which ranked third on the team. He had nine games with five or more rebounds, while playing an average of 13.8 minutes per contest.

Since last season, Milligan has grown into a new man. Dealing with the loss of his younger brother has turned Dante into not only a stronger individual, but a better basketball player as well.

"Dante has been terrific," Ford says on his progression as a player. "He's probably been one of the most consistent players we've had so far in preseason. You know what you're going to get. Dante brings a great energy to the game. But I've seen a big improvement in him from last year to this year, and that's what we want to see. He goes at it hard everyday, and he's scoring around the basket. I like where Dante's at right now."

The Minutemen look for Milligan to play an active role in the low-post game this year, as the improvement in his game makes UMass' front line just as good as anybody's.

"Dante came a long way from last year," senior Rashaun Freeman says. "So we're looking at him to be a spark coming off the bench for us.

"I can't imagine what he went through when he lost his brother," he adds. "But I definitely know because of that, it has made him a stronger individual. I think that everything he does in life, he does it for his brother, for his family and for his mom. You have to respect somebody like that because a lot of people don't bounce back from those types of situations."

Dante did more than just bounce back. He keeps his brother in his mind at all times, and instead of sulking about the loss, he remains strong and celebrates Alonzo's life through personal memorials that can be seen on his sneakers, under his jersey, on his arm, and in his backpack.

Milligan has the words "R.I.P. Zo Millz" on his sneakers, and he wears a T-shirt with a picture of Alonzo under his game jersey. However, his most prized possession is his brother's obituary card.

"I have one in my book bag, in my room, and at all times, just to keep him with me," Milligan says. "It's priceless."

Dante was just 22 months older than Alonzo. The two were extremely close, and whether it was playing basketball together in the neighborhood park in East Harlem, or meeting up at the train station when Dante came home from school, the memories will always be special.

"Growing up, it was just me, him, my mom and my dad," Milligan says. "He was the only person I really had, just two little brothers always hanging with each other, always enjoying each other's company. He's someone that I truly miss, and I always keep him by my side."

"They had a good time practicing together," Dante's mother Ruby says. "Late at night, they would go across the street to the schoolyard and shoot some hoops, and just spend time together. That memory will always be with Dante anytime he steps out on the court. He will always think about his brother being the sixth man."

"That memory will always be with Dante anytime he steps out on the court. He will always think about his brother being the sixth man."

-Ruby Milligan

Alonzo may be his sixth man, but Dante's mom and his little cousin have been his biggest influence during these tough times.

His mom, Ruby, was the one that called Dante to tell him that his brother was shot the night that it happened. He tried to calm her down over the phone from his home in New York by telling her that Alonzo would be just fine. Alonzo later died from a loss of blood.

Dante has been much closer with his mother since the shooting. And as a result, Dante has become a role model to his family.

"Everything I do, I do for them now," Milligan says. "I always have my brother in the back of my mind, but back at home I have my mom who's counting on me and looking up at me to be something positive and that positive energy in their lives. So I'm just focused on doing that for them."

This December, Dante and his mom will team up once again with the Boys Club of New York and Dan Schoenberg of MSG Sports to hand out the second annual Alonzo Milligan Mentorship Award. The scholarship is given in remembrance of Alonzo's constant leadership as a counselor for the Boys Club of Manhattan.

"They were so much a part of that boys club from age six," Ruby says. "We keeping them involved in the boys club, I just watched them grow, as far as academically, into young men. Dante and Alonzo were well known throughout the boys club for what they had accomplished and what they were giving back to the community."

The scholarship is given to a New York City area student who has done well in high school and would benefit from the money in order to help go to college.

Dan Schoenberg, the Vice President of Publicity for MSG Sports, was Alonzo's "Big Brother" in New York's Big Brothers & Big Sisters program. He has helped the family create this scholarship that will be given out at this year's Cancer Classic college basketball tournament at Madison Square Garden.

Alonzo's death has greatly affected the lives of the Milligan family. It took plenty of strength and courage to get through the tough times of losing their loved one, but they never would have been able to do it without the help of others.

"I also appreciate the coaching staff and his teammates for giving Dante a lot of support," Ruby says. "I was up at UMass a lot and the parents and kids really helped relieve our pain."

Ruby traveled with the team to the Bahamas in August, showing her strength, and comforting her son in the process.

"Everybody was real supportive," Milligan says about his teammates and coaches. "I couldn't have asked for a better supporting cast."

Dante received plenty of support from his teammates. He has grown into a mature, young adult since the unexpected death of his brother, and it's a great source of pride for his mother.

"I was really impressed," Ruby says. "And I see that he's really growing into a wonderful young man. Nobody knows when their time is up, and I'm looking at the fact that, one day, whenever my time is up, that he'll be even more prepared."

"I don't know if I've coached too many better people than Dante," Ford says. "It hurts him. I know he thinks about it. It's a devastating loss because they were close [Dante and his mom] are very, very close, and they deal with it together. But they're strong. His mom's a strong, powerful woman, and it shows in Dante."

"I've definitely matured a lot more," Milligan says. "I'm starting to realize that, yeah, basketball is important, but there are more important things in life besides basketball. You can't rely heavily on basketball because once the game is done, you have to focus on your education so you can get a solid job when you're done playing basketball."

Dante isn't close to being done playing basketball. He still has two years of eligibility left, including this year.

With that said, the Dante Milligan legacy lives on at UMass, with a new chapter beginning Saturday night against Dartmouth. And while you won't be hearing his name announced over the loud speaker at the Mullins Center, Alonzo Milligan will always be UMass' sixth man.

Alonzo Milligan, Dante's brother, died in a random shooting in East Harlem in June of 2005. Dante struggled on the court last season, but has come into the 2006-07 season focused on basketball. Over a year later, Dante (above) uses his brother's death as motivation on and off the court.

Given, not earned

Minutemen try to stay grounded in face of early praise

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Whether or not it is well deserved, the Massachusetts men's basketball team has been on the receiving end of some high-quality hype heading into the 2006-07 season. The Minutemen were picked to finish second in the Atlantic 10, according to a poll among coaches and media in the conference.

The Sporting News and CBS Sportsline.com predict that UMass will return to the NCAA Tournament for the first time since 1998.

UMass coach Travis Ford isn't buying into the hype just yet.

"I was concerned being ranked second [in the A-10 preseason poll]," Ford said. "I mean I love it, but like I said at Media Day in Atlantic City, I hope our guys don't read into this. And I think they did, to an extent, that they think they've already achieved something."

The only thing that has been achieved thus far is an 88-61 exhibition win over the University of Bridgeport last Saturday night, and a 5-0 record against professional club teams in the Bahamas in August.

While the spotlight may be shining a little bit brighter on the Minutemen this year than in recent history, Ford and his players know that they haven't accomplished anything yet.

"Hype needs to be a word that's foreign to this basketball team," Ford said at Media Day last Thursday. "Expectations need to be foreign to this basketball team because we are not a team that's ranked second or third in magazines and preseason polls. We are not that team right now. We've done nothing to earn it.

"This is a team that needs to earn anything that they receive, and we've not done that yet. These guys need to have that mentality, and we've had a little bit of a problem with that."

So what is the hype all about?

Ford now enters his second season with the Minutemen. This year he has four starters returning in seniors Rashaun Freeman, Stephane Lasme, James Life and sophomore Chris Lowe. UMass will also benefit from the arrival of juniors Gary Forbes, Etienne Brower, sophomore Luke Bonner and freshman Tiki Mayben. Forbes, Brower and Bonner each transferred to UMass, while Mayben comes in as a highly-touted point guard.

With so much talent, and a lot more depth than last year, it's hard not to get caught up in the thought of what could be. Ford's players are starting to realize that they just have to block it all out and play basketball.

"We're coming together good, but what's bugging us now is all the hype," Freeman said. "From afar, we started to believe in what they were saying, but we just have to take it day-by-day because once you believe that, it affects everything because you assume that you're already there.

"I think that we have to take a step back, and become hungrier. We have to start from scratch and play as hard as we can to get to that point that everybody thinks we can be."

Freeman has been given five preseason honors. CBS Sportsline and The Sporting News named him to the Atlantic 10 First Team, while Street and Smith's named him the A-10's best rebounder heading into the season. Also receiving preseason honors were Lowe (A-10's best passer), Lasme (A-10's best shot-blocker and defender) and Forbes (A-10 Newcomer of the Year).

Ford admits that he created some of the hype on his own last year because he knew their play wasn't going to gather a lot of excitement. But this year he's not worried about the talent level of his players. He just doesn't want it to go to their heads.

"I do get excited about the future, but the guys have to back it up, and now is the time to quit talking it," Ford said. "The change I'm going to make is I'm going to be tough on these guys. I'm not trying to create [hype] anymore because these guys have shown that they haven't handled it overly well."

Junior Dante Milligan understands the hype. He's been there before. Milligan was a redshirt freshman at Pittsburgh before coming to UMass. He practiced and traveled with the Panthers team that went all the way to the NCAA Sweet 16 in 2004. Since then, he's never listened to the preseason buildup.

"Truthfully, I'm not a big believer in hype," Milligan said. "I've never been. That's just something that has been instilled in me since at Pittsburgh. We have to stay humble and stay hungry because it's preseason hype. That's not saying that we have actually done anything yet, and it was evident last year. We went 13-15, and granted we have new guys that are going to come in and help us, that doesn't mean just those four guys are going to get us 20 to 25 wins."

Kentucky, Louisville, Pitt . . . Ford aims high with schedule

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

Scheduling can either make or break your season on the road to a national championship. And the Massachusetts men's basketball team is riding the high-risk, high-reward bus en route to Atlanta with the way UMass coach Travis Ford has picked his non-conference schedule this year.

Ok, so maybe planning a trip to the Final Four in April is thinking a little bit too far ahead right now. But by looking at UMass' non-conference schedule for the upcoming season, one would have to wonder if Ford knows something the rest of the country doesn't.

"First and foremost, I think it will be a great challenge for our team and prepare them for conference [play]," Ford said. "When you go play at places like that, it's going to hopefully make your team better."

The Minutemen will be more than just prepared by the time they reach the Atlantic 10 portion of the schedule. Three of the 14 non-conference opponents that Ford has matched his team up against are ranked in the nation's Top 25 coaches' poll to begin the college basketball season.

UMass travels to No. 5 Pittsburgh on Nov. 18, and then hosts No. 15 Boston College at the Mullins Center just two weeks later on Dec. 2. The Minutemen then travel to the state of Kentucky to face Rick Pitino's Louisville Cardinals on Dec. 13, and the No. 22 Kentucky Wildcats just three days before Christmas.

Ford says this year's schedule is the most challenging he has faced in his 10-year coaching career. It certainly is the toughest schedule UMass has faced in recent memory. Other than preparing his team for a tough A-10 schedule that starts in January, there are other reasons why one would pit his or her team up against some of the best team's in the nation. One of which is national recognition.

"Hopefully if we prove to be a decent team, then we might have an outside chance of maybe to get an at-large bid into the NCAA Tournament," Ford said. "Then the selection committee could be looking at us saying, 'Hey they played a very tough schedule.' And also I think the fans will enjoy playing a tough schedule like that as well."

The upside to a schedule that has nine playoffs teams from last year, and nine teams that have been ranked in the Top 25 at some point over the last three years, is that if UMass does upend one or more of those teams, the NCAA selection committee may be willing to give the Minutemen their first NCAA Tournament berth since 1998.

"We know it's tough. We might have made it a little bit too tough, but we're going to go out and play hard, and take the approach that it's going to make us a better team. But also, it's just a great big bonus if we can pull off a couple wins against those teams."

CBSSportsline.com has ranked UMass the No. 45 team in the nation, and has the Minutemen advancing to the NCAA Tournament as the No. 10 seed, facing Texas in the first round.

While that's pretty good news for UMass basketball fans, the Minutemen aren't any closer to March than they are to December, and whether or not the selection committee decides to burst their bubble, all could depend on how they fare against some of the top teams in the nation that Ford has put them up against.

"We got a long way to go right now with this basketball team," Ford said. "We've got a long way to go before we start thinking about trying to beat those type of teams. We've got to worry about Dartmouth. Right now, Dartmouth is a tough team for us the way we're playing. We're just not playing very good basketball right now."

All that matters right now to the Minutemen is that the season starts on Saturday night against Dartmouth. But if preseason rankings and scheduling are any indication as to what this team's expectations are behind the scenes, then pack your bags UMass, and don't forget to bring your dancing shoes.

The Massachusetts basketball team plays its first regular season game on Saturday at 5 p.m. against the Dartmouth Big Green at the Mullins Center.

A player-by-player breakdown

Chris Lowe: The speedy point guard averaged 31 minutes per game last season when guards Maurice Maxwell (academic reasons) and Artie Bowers left the Minutemen short at the guard positions. The season didn't get off to a good start for Lowe when he was arrested for disorderly conduct outside of the Amherst Starbucks in October. Athletic Director John McCutcheon and Ford suspended Lowe from the exhibition game on Nov. 4 and the first regular season game on Nov. 11. Lowe was going to see reduced minutes during the season anyway, so the suspension shouldn't affect his playing time that much.

While Lowe led the Atlantic 10 in assists last season, he had some gaping holes in his game that he used this off-season to try and fill. Lowe has inherent shooting difficulty and couldn't knock down open shots with consistency last season. This year, however, Lowe will be more comfortable playing his own pass-first game because of the scoring threats that Ford brought in. Ford will also ask Lowe to get into the paint with penetration and break down the defense more this season.

Tiki Mayben: The New York City guard will help Lowe at point guard this season, and will see time at the two-guard position because of his shooting ability. While Lowe ran the team last season and averaged over 30 minutes per game, Mayben has a chance to take over the position from Lowe this season. He has adequate handling ability, can explode with the vertical leap, and can shoot the basketball. One of Mayben's evident weaknesses has been his turnovers – a stat that plagued the Minutemen last season and something that Ford will surely work on with his new guard.

"[Mayben is] a true point guard," Ford said. "The guys have to be ready for the ball at all times. We have to find that fine line with him of when it's too much, when he just needs to run the offense. I don't want to pull him back too much because his greatest strength is creating and making things happen."

Ricky Harris: Harris graduated Calvert Hall College High School in Baltimore, Maryland and took a prep-ratory year at The Winchendon School in Winchendon, Massachusetts before coming to UMass. Ford announced his signing on April 12, 2006, during last year's season. Harris was a popular recruit last year. He averaged 17 points per game and shot 43 percent from three-point range at Winchendon. Ford tabbed him as a multi-talented guard and Harris earned the ranking of 27th-best fifth-year player in the country during his senior year.

Harris will be the third-string point guard this season, backing up Chris Lowe and Tiki Mayben. It looks like Ford will bring Harris along slowly to see how he acclimates to Division I basketball. With Lowe and Mayben in front of him, minutes might be scarce.

"He'll definitely back up the point guard position," Ford said. "It's a position that he's very comfortable with. He's going to be the third point guard once Chris Lowe comes back from his suspension."

Brandon Thomas: Thomas' versatile game was on display early last year. He can play multiple positions, has good ball-handling ability, and a decent shooting touch. Ford will use Thomas in multiple ways this season, including putting him in at power forward when the Minutemen want to go small with their lineup. Thomas ran into trouble last season when Ford tried him at point guard and he lost his confidence with the ball. Like Lowe, Thomas will benefit from the scorers around him because his selflessness and passing ability will help to set up his teammates.

Rashaun Freeman: The big man has waited a long time to have so many scorers around him. In his previous three years – especially last season – teams could afford to double team him on the block because of the lack of UMass shooters on the perimeter. This season, it will be different. Gary Forbes, Tiki Mayben, Ricky Harris, James Life and Brandon Thomas can all shoot the basketball. If Freeman does get doubled, he will need to learn how to pass out of double teams and find the open man. Because Freeman will relinquish some of his scoring load from last season, he will take advantage on the offensive boards because teams will turn their attention elsewhere. Freeman said that he is willing to do anything to win, including sharing the ball. This season will be a test of his selflessness.

Stephane Lasme: UMass' resident shot blocker returns with a new dedication to offense. Lasme was a defensive force last season, finishing third in the nation and first in the A-10 in blocked shots. Lasme garnered the most NBA attention because of his raw athletic ability, which helped him become one of the most dangerous defensive players around.

On the offensive end, however, Lasme was a liability. He struggled with his jumpshot and whenever he went outside of the paint, his defender simply stayed underneath the basket in help defense in essentially a one-man zone. During the offseason, Lasme worked on his post moves and his shooting, and we'll see if opponents will respect the big man when he ventures out of the paint.

Dante Milligan: Milligan has extreme size and athletic ability, and will come off of the bench to give either Lasme or Freeman a breather. Ford has encouraged Milligan to be more aggressive because he sometimes disappeared during games last season. In the preseason, Ford has used him at the front of his diamond press because of his arm length and athleticism.

Luke Bonner: A transfer from West Virginia, the 7-foot Bonner will make an immediate impact on the UMass squad. Bonner has a soft shot from the perimeter and will be allowed to shoot from beyond the arc this season. Opposing big men will have to come out and defend him on the perimeter, which will open up driving lanes for the UMass slashers. Bonner is also an extremely hard worker who will contribute to the rebounding effort. The Minutemen led the A-10 in rebounding last season, and Bonner's presence should only better UMass in this category. He will most likely come off of the bench to replace Lasme or Freeman on the interior.

James Life: The trigger-happy Life will have to tone it down this season. In last year's campaign, Ford gave Life the green light from downtown because the Minutemen needed scoring desperately. This season, however, Ford has added some shooters and slashers, and Life's leash will probably be a lot tighter. With so many options this season, it will be hard for Life to maintain his early-and-often shooting habits.

Life was also a defensive liability last season, and has made a concerted effort to improve in that arena.

Gary Forbes: Forbes transferred from Virginia to UMass last season. He is Ford's most talented recruit and will bring a much-needed offensive weapon to Ford's squad. Forbes is 6-foot-9 with great ball-handling ability and a solid shot. His game is not overly flashy, and in the exhibition game against Bridgeport on Saturday he seemed very unselfish with the basketball. Because he will attract so much attention with the ball, his passing ability and willingness to share the scoring load will greatly help his teammates. Ford might play Forbes at point guard a little bit this year if turnovers become a problem, but he will play at the power forward and small forward spots for the majority of his minutes. Because of his size and handle, Forbes will cause some size and speed mismatches with opponents, something that Ford wants to take advantage of.

Etienne Brower: Brower transferred from Boston University last year and sat out the 2005-06 season. He will play this season at the small forward position and maybe the power forward position if Ford wants to go small and quick with his lineup. Brower in injured right now and it will take him a couple of weeks to recover.

Brower is a 6-foot-7 athlete. He has a significant vertical jump and will help the Minutemen create some mismatch problems with opponents. Brower will also be used heavily in defensive trapping schemes because of his athleticism and his length. He can also shoot the ball efficiently and rebound well. Ford has praised Brower for his versatility and believes that the former Terrier will help the Minutemen in nearly every aspect of the game.

Matt Pennie: Last year, the 6-foot-7 Pennie served as the team manager for the Minutemen. He made the team this year and will dress for all of the games and travel with the team. Pennie played his high school ball at Whitman-Hanson High School in Hanson, Mass. He averaged 15 points, nine rebounds and five assists as a senior.

Tony Gaffney: The Boston University transfer will sit out this season because of NCAA regulations. Gaffney played for the Terriers for two seasons before coming to UMass. He averaged nearly 16 minutes per game during his freshman season at BU and played in 17 games last season for the Terriers. Gaffney is 6-foot-8 and will help the Minutemen as a practice player this year. His long arms and athleticism with help Ford simulate some of the better athletes in the conference in practice.

Nana Ampim: Ampim was arrested with Chris Lowe for disorderly conduct in October, and Ford suspended him for the exhibition game and the first regular season game on Saturday. Ampim is an able and strong defender, but will not see minutes this season because of the team's depth at the guard positions.

Freeman prepares for final season

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Teammates and friends know him as "Ray Ray." Fans know him as the hardest working big man around.

He has been a proud member of the Massachusetts men's basketball program for the last three-plus years, and has been the face of the franchise for every minute of it.

Rashaun Freeman is entering his last season as a Minuteman. Over the last three years he has been double- and triple-teamed by opposing defenses, the ultimate respect for an offensive player.

He has endured a coaching tenure, has beaten the No. 3 team in the country on his home floor, has captained the team for a year, and has enjoyed pretty much every award the Atlantic 10 hands out.

This season, however, is Freeman's last trip around the country in a UMass uniform – and he couldn't be more excited.

UMass coach Travis Ford has surrounded Freeman – for the first time in his career – with a steady balance of offensive weapons. Transfers Tiki Mayben and Gary Forbes give Freeman some needed reinforcements on the perimeter.

"It's definitely going to be different [this year] because the story on us was, 'Pack it in on Ray and let them shoot,'" Freeman said. "And that's no longer the story. I'm anxious to see how they play me. People are saying, 'Well, you won't score as much.' To be honest, I'm not looking to put up a lot of points this year. I'm looking to win."

He's never been the rah-rah type. He leads through his play, through his sweat and through his attitude. He is one of the only players in the country who has a work ethic that outdistances his talent.

Freeman isn't the most talented player around – not even in his own conference. He is a lefty, and uses a drop step to a lefty hook shot with mechanical consistency. Any defender who's done his homework knows that the move is coming. They just can't stop it.

The New York native trudges up and down the middle of the floor. You could draw lines from the edges of the paint down the whole length of the floor, and Freeman would stay between them. Some big men are soft because they are big. They fear the smaller players because of their size advantage.

Not this guy. Freeman will post hard even it's a middle school kid down there. And that's why he's been the most consistent player in the Atlantic 10 for the last three years. He averaged 15.4 points and 8.5 rebounds per game as a freshman and averaged 14 points and 9.3 rebounds last year.

Consistency. Down the line. No one has done it better than No. 1 in the maroon and white. And, in retrospect, he couldn't be happier about coming to UMass to play basketball.

"There are some players that have my talent that go to schools that are already winners, and they just go into the rotation," Freeman said. "I know it can become a winner and get this program back to where it was because that would be more of a story than if I were to just go to another school that already had a winning tradition. All I wanted to do was bring UMass back to where it was. That was my only mindset."

And he's closer now than he has ever been. Ford has hyped his program through the roof. The Atlantic 10's coaches and media ranked UMass second in their preseason poll, and Sporting News Magazine and USA Today's college basketball previews both pinned UMass as an NCAA committee choice to play on the biggest basketball stage on the planet.

For Freeman, this is new. He has experienced much over the last three years, but this is the only team he's played for that's been picked to go to the NCAA Tournament. His job, he says, is to make sure everyone stays on the straight and narrow.

"We listened to [the hype]. We read it," he said. "And I think that we started to think that things are going to come easy to us. Actually, they are going to be a lot harder. We have to get better in practice every day so we can reach the expectations. Just because someone has you ranked somewhere, it doesn't mean you are. I think we have the right mindset now because we know that nothing is going to come easy for us no matter what they say about us.

"It doesn't get any easier from here."

He knew that it wasn't going to be easy. But this might be the easiest offensive season for the big man. Freeman started with a different mental approach to the season last year and is continuing to develop a productive mentality as he enters his final season at UMass.

"I do realize that this is my last year and that's why I approach things so differently," he said. "When I was a freshman and a sophomore, I couldn't wait for practice to get over. Now, I never want it to end, because I know that this time next year it's going to be a business, and I'm not going to be where my friends are going to be.

"I'm definitely trying to approach the game differently and trying to get the most out of it. I'm willing to do anything to become a winner, because winners are remembered and losers just disappear."

Freeman won't be forgotten around the Pioneer Valley anytime soon. He has dedicated three years of hard work to UMass basketball, and he, along with the rest of the student body, is hoping something special will come out of this season.

"I don't want to leave any stones unturned," he said. "I've put too much into this program to not come out with something."

The fourth and final chapter of Rashaun Freeman's career starts on Saturday.

The Minutemen were predicted to finish seventh in the A-10 in last year's preseason coaches' poll, and they finished, well, in seventh. There was a four-way tie for that seventh-place spot, with all four teams posting an 8-8 conference record.

One of those teams was Xavier, which has been picked to finish first in the conference this season. The Musketeers defeated UMass in the first round of the Atlantic 10 Tournament last year, 75-66, and went on to win the A-10 Championship and advance to the NCAA Tournament.

Xavier and UMass have been slated as the teams to watch for in the conference this season. That being said, Ford does not want his players to read into the press clippings. He wants them to have the mentality of a team that knows it hasn't achieved anything yet to deserve this hype, and stop acting like what he calls, "a country club team."

"We need to come blue-collar," Ford said. "We need to become a team that's tough, a team that wants to earn what everybody's saying, and use that as motivation because we've done nothing, absolutely zero to be ranked second place. We are so far from a second place team right now, it's scary."

"We're so happy and we want to have that confidence, but it's a reality check and we have to realize that we still have a long way to go," Freeman said. "We can't expect that we're a tournament team the first time we step on the court. It's going to take some time."

Sure, there's a lot of hype surrounding the Maroon and White, but there's a lot of games to be played as well. If UMass keeps winning, the hype isn't going anywhere, but if it gets to their heads, it may be just that: hype.

"We have a lot of work to do with this basketball team," Ford said after Saturday's exhibition game. "We're an average team right now. Today, we're better than we were yesterday, I can say that. But we still have a lot of work to do.

"We'll get there, no question, we're going to get there. If they stay focused and understand what makes them a good team, then we possibly could be a pretty good team down the road."

UMass police take charge with new Dodge patrol car

By Hayden Marx
Collegian Staff

The Police Department of the University of Massachusetts recently purchased an unmarked Dodge Charger – a departure from the usual Ford patrol cars.

"The Fords do have a reputation, but we wanted to try something new," said Chief of Police Barbara O'Connor.

The Charger Police Package debuted at the 2005 New York Auto Show. It is less angular and more compact looking than a traditional police car. The seats are set low like a performance car and give the driver more room than what the view from outside may indicate.

It can be equipped with a Hemi engine, laptop, camera, automated external defibrillator (AED) and other crime scene equipment. The Hemi engines can be outfitted with a multi-displacement system (MDS), which allows the engine to run in a more fuel-efficient mode when its full power is not necessary.

As a first year production model as a police package, the design has not yet been finalized. This is most apparent on the inside, where the add-on features are not as polished or smoothly integrated as the more established police cars. The first change may be to exchange the backseat, which is currently the same as the one in the civilian model, for a hard bench like those in the back of most police cars.

Police Officer Allen Silva first saw the Charger at a police show outside of Boston. It proved popular there, and several area police stations bought cars.

Silva described the car as sturdy and said it works well as a police package. He said that the car cost them several thousand less than their Ford counterparts in part because of what comes standard.

He also said he found the MDS to be useful when on patrol. According to Silva, the other cars use one-fourth of a tank on a standard patrol, while the Charger only goes through one-sixth.

"It was a surprise to me to see

The UMass Police Department has purchased an unmarked Dodge Charger, similar to the one shown above, to patrol traffic on campus. According to Officer Jeff Skinner of UMPD, the unmarked cruiser will bring less attention when responding to noise and drug violations.

SGA may increase activities fee

By Samantha M. Fronteiro
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts vigorously debated and discussed two motions during the third general senate meeting... to increase student activities fee, which if passed would result in a raise of $6 per semester, and to appoint a new Chancellor of Elections.

The motion to raise student fees was tabled as President Mendez and senate members felt the need for more time to get student reactions.

President Mendez vowed to "do everything possible to find the best solution for the student body." He urged senators to table the motion.

"We cannot make this decision alone. Even if it's only $3, it's far too important," Mendez said.

In an attempt to gain student insight, the SGA will make an effort to hold a forum where students can voice their opinions on the issue.

"I would like more student involvement on this issue. I encourage students to attend meetings and do their best to find a solution," said Mendez.

"There were a couple of increases last year in club sports and other organizations that were kind of high – increases that typically don't happen from year to year," said Mendez. "If we want to continue to fund these organizations, we may have to raise the fees slightly."

"If you don't approve the fee increase what it really means is that we would be forced to cut programs and find other alternatives," stressed Allen Brainerd, finance director for the Center for Student development.

"The SGA was advised a year ago on this issue. Maybe you need to re-think your processes. It's unfortunate that you're getting this information now," Brainerd said.

In previous years, any proposal of a student fee increase was automatically directed to a campus-wide referendum to be voted on by the students. But due to a bylaw created years ago, any increases under 7.5 percent of the student fee budget could be brought directly to the Senate.

To prevent this crisis in the future, Mendez would like to reinstitute a treasurer who could work during the summer and have a proposal to present to the administration in the fall.

Heads shook and accusations flew as SGA officials deliberated and questioned Sean McNair who was not appointed as the new Chancellor of Elections when a vote was finally reached.

Last semester, SGA Attorney General Shaqullie Onikoro asked Senator Elizabeth Vargus to investigate McNair on charges that he was in violation of SGA bylaws. A petition filed on March 8 states that on March 5, many

FDA issues warning on decorative contact lenses

A warning issued by the FDA says that non-corrective contact lenses have adverse effects, such as pink-eye, corneal ulcers, and can lead to blindness.

By Holly Seabury
Collegian Staff

The United States Food and Drug Administration continues to warn consumers throughout the holiday season about the dangers of using non-corrective contact lenses without a prescription.

Although these lenses are regulated by FDA, they may lead to serious problems, including permanent eye injury that can result in blindness.

The lenses, also called decorative, Plano, or zero-powered contact lenses, do not correct vision and are only intended to change the color of the eye. Consumers should only purchase and use these contact lenses if they have seen an eye care professional and have attained correct lens fitting and instructions for use, said the FDA.

"Consumers should understand that decorative contact lenses, like contact lenses intended for correcting vision, present serious risks to eye health if they are distributed without the appropriate involvement of a qualified eye care professional," said Dr. Lester M. Crawford, Acting FDA Commissioner, in the report.

"FDA will aggressively use the full range of its statutory authorities to prevent the improper distribution of these potentially dangerous products."

Today, these contacts are becoming more popular. It's very simple to purchase purple eyes, cat eyes and all-white eyes, among other options.

The Web site OpticsFirst.com, whose slogan reads, "All your non-corrective needs," requires a simple mouse click on the preferred contacts and a credit card number. No eye health warning, prescription requirement, or lens fitting information is present.

When asked about the safety issues of decorative contacts, a customer service representative at OpticsFirst.com responded, "All of the contacts sold on the

Recall of pain killers underway

By Andrew Bridges
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Check your medicine cabinet: Millions of bottles of the widely used pain reliever acetaminophen — some sold as long as three years ago — are being recalled because they may contain metal fragments.

The recall affects 11 million bottles containing varying quantities of 500-milligram acetaminophen caplets made by the Perrigo Co. The pills were sold under store brands by Wal-Mart, CVS, Safeway and more than 120 other major retailers, the Food and Drug Administration said. At least two chains – CVS Corp. and SuperValu Inc. – started pulling the pills from store shelves Thursday.

There were no immediate reports of injuries or illness. The contaminated pills included metal fragments ranging in size from "microdots" to portions of wire one-third of an inch long, the FDA said. The FDA could not describe further the type of metal.

Perrigo discovered the metal bits during quality-control checks done after the company discovered its equipment was wearing down prematurely, the FDA said. Agency officials declined to say whether the metal found in the pills caused the damage or resulted from it.

A company investigation turned up metal in roughly 200 pills of the 70 million it passed through a metal detector, according to the FDA.

Consumers who take any of the contaminated pills could have minor stomach discomfort or possible cuts to the mouth and throat, the FDA said, adding that the risk of serious injury was remote.

Acetaminophen is best known as the drug in products sold under the Tylenol brand. But it is available in typically less expensive generic versions. The drug, along with aspirin and ibuprofen, is one of the most widely used pain relievers available without a doctor's note.

The recall does not affect Tylenol. Nor should the recall cause a shortage of acetaminophen, the FDA said.

The retail market for the pain relievers is worth more than $2 billion a year, according to Perrigo. The company says it is the world's largest manufacturer of store-brand nonprescription drugs.

Kevin Vincent, 44, of Arlington, Va., said his wife buys store brand acetaminophen and he wanted to find out more about the problem.

"If it's not something that has any chance of recurring, then I really wouldn't worry," he said.

The 129 retailers that could potentially be affected by the recall include Wal-Mart Stores Inc., CVS, Safeway Stores and SuperValu. They typically sell the Perrigo-made pills under their own or other private labels.

CVS will stop selling its own brand of 500-milligram acetaminophen caplets and pull bottles from store shelves nationwide, spokesman Mike DeAngelis said. SuperValu also began removing the pills from its Albertsons, Cub Foods and other stores, spokeswoman Haley Meyer said. Messages left Thursday with the other chains were not immediately returned.

Perrigo, based in Allegan, Mich., said the pills contained raw material purchased from a third-party supplier and affected 383 batches. Messages left Thursday with two company spokesmen were not immediately returned.

The FDA declined to identify the source of the raw materials. The agency does not suspect the contamination was deliberate, said Dr. Douglas Throckmorton, deputy director of the FDA's Center for Drug Evaluation and Research.

Molly Walsh, 21, a George Washington University student shopping at a CVS pharmacy in Washington, said she did not plan to toss any of the store-brand drugs at home. Nor did she plan to stop buying the generic products.

"It's still going to be cheaper and I'm still going to be broke after the recall," Walsh said.

The voluntary recall is considered a Class II recall since it covers products that might cause a temporary health problem or pose only a slight threat of a serious nature.

Consumers with questions can call Perrigo toll free at 877-546-0454.

The FDA did not know in which states the pills had been sold, but recommended that customers determine whether products they bought are being recalled by checking the store list on the FDA Web site, http://www.fda.gov/oc/po/firmrecalls/perrigo/perrigocustlist.html and the batch list, http://www.fda.gov/oc/po/firmrecalls/perrigo/perrigobatchlist.html.

The batch numbers appear on the container's label.

It wasn't immediately clear where Perrigo made the pills. Its main factories are in the United States and Israel, with secondary plants in the United Kingdom, Mexico, Germany and China.

Perrigo has carried out at least 32 other product recalls since 1993, according to FDA records. As recently as May, it recalled nearly 59,000 bottles of a 500-milligram combination pain-reliever and sleep aid that contains acetaminophen because of contamination with acrylic mirror particles.

A major manufacturer of acetaminophen sold by WalMart, CVS, Safeway and other retailers recalled 11 million bottles of widely-used pain killers yesterday after discovering some were contaminated with metal fragments.

SGA meets to appoint Chancellor of Elections

witnesses, including former SGA president Pavel Payano, saw Sean McNair, former senator Jenn Kennedy and former Area Governor John Williams placing materials on bulletin boards in the Student Union.

McNair was also involved in the creation of changesga.com, a Web site that criticized the lack of results within the former administration.

The posting and publicizing of those materials were thought to go directly against the SGA constitution and bylaws, however, McNair has since been found not guilty.

Many SGA officials remain skeptical of his ability to properly run and uphold the position of Chancellor of Elections.

"It would be like asking a lawyer who was debarred to represent you," said Matthew Provencher, chair of statewide student organizing. McNair told senators that he has had a lot of administrative experience in the past.

"I know Title 8 really well, and I do feel that being involved in violations does show loopholes within the bylaws. Title 8 needs to be re-written," said McNair about campaign work he did last year.

McNair presented SGA officials with ideas for how to improve student elections. The main change McNair spoke of was outsourcing, having a separate outside committee such as the League of Woman Voters to count ballots. McNair felt that this would put less pressure on the Elections committee, which has had numerous conflicts involving the counting of ballots.

"If we, the student body, could not even run the elections on our own, then what's the point?" Senator Caleb Gallus asked.

"The numbers show that students are not getting involved, and we need to change that," responded McNair. "The people who criticized me tonight never brought up bias towards friends of theirs who were appointed a chancellor position or a commission position."

In reaction to the final outcome of the vote, McNair said that charges will be filed. He claims that there was a violation of the bylaws.

FDA: colored contacts unsafe

site are non-corrective and are to be used for cosmetics only."

The FDA will also confiscate the contact lenses currently on the market in violation of federal law. Furthermore, in order to completely evaluate the risks associated with the contacts, the FDA requests that all healthcare professionals continue to report adverse effects associated with decorative lenses sold without a prescription.

Such adverse effects that are connected with non-corrective lenses are conjunctivitis, also known as pink eye; corneal ulcers, sores in the cornea, which is the eye's outermost layer; corneal abrasion, scraped spots on the cornea; and vision impairment or blindness. Minor yet still harmful effects include infections and allergic reactions.

The FDA is aware that consumers without legitimate prescriptions have purchased decorative lenses from a range of places like beauty salons, the Internet or convenience stores. In turn, it has taken several actions to prevent consumers from purchasing these products at risky establishments.

In addition to communicating the dangers to the public and the healthcare community, the FDA has issued an alert instructing personnel and officials of the U.S. Customs Service to routinely restrain all decorative contact lenses presented at U.S. ports of entry.

The FDA recommends several tips for considering decorative contacts. The first is to get an eye exam from a licensed eye care professional. Also, it advises getting a valid prescription and buying the contacts from an eye care professional. The last tip is to follow directions for cleaning, disinfecting and wearing the lenses.

With these tips, FDA is helping to prevent serious risks for consumers unaware of the health risks involved with purchasing decorative contact lenses. For more information or to report a problem, visit the FDA Web site at www.fda.gov.

that much fuel," said Silva.

UMass police is currently using the Charger for traffic work as well as other work that benefits from some discretion. Silva says the car has also been used for drug and noise violations. According to Officer Jeff Skinner, the car can be useful for these calls because it sometimes helps to have something that isn't obviously a patrol car.

"It's nice because certain types of calls you're going to want to go to without calling a lot of attention," said Skinner.

The car's durability is still being studied. Police work puts a lot of stress on vehicles and their equipment. O'Connor described the modern police car as a moving office because of the amount of equipment carried in them.

How well the equipment holds up is very important because the UMass Police Department does in-house repairs and self-insures.

"Fortunately, we don't have a lot of cruiser accidents," said O'Connor. "We've been very fortunate over the years."

This may be why the Ford Motor Company, once synonymous with law enforcement vehicles, has begun to lose sales to other companies. Ford has come under attack because of the location of fuel tank in its Panther line of cars. In these cars, which include the Crown Victoria, the fuel tank is located in the car's rear crumple zone.

In a car crash these areas are designed to compact to reduce the severity of crash impact. This design has been faulted with fuel tank explosions and fires. Although Ford has come out with a shield designed to protect the fuel tank, it is unknown whether or not they will fully regain the trust they once held.

National Student Exchange sends new faces to UMass

Exchange program provides new experiences for students

BY MELISSA D'AMICO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Each year, students from all over the United States come to Massachusetts to have the opportunity to study at the University of Massachusetts Amherst. From Guam to Kansas to Oregon, students from 180 participating colleges and universities are able to come to Amherst for a semester, or an academic year, for a unique academic experience.

UMass Amherst is a member of the National Student Exchange Program (NSE), a program for undergraduate exchange within the United States and Canada.

"NSE was established in 1968 with three universities in Alabama, Illinois, and Montana exchanging seven students among their institutions," according to the NSE Web site.

"Administrators on those campuses wanted to help students who would not or could not take advantage of studying abroad by providing them with living and learning opportunities within their own country."

Since then, NSE has expanded to include 48 states, Puerto Rico, Guam and the Virgin Islands, and sponsors more than 85,000 students.

"With close to 200 colleges and universities from which to choose, you should be able to find a university with just the right combination of courses, facilities, and environment to meet your academic and personal needs and interests," according to the Web site.

UMass Amherst has been a member of the National Student Exchange Program since the late 1970s, and it is the largest domestic exchange program available to UMass students, said UMass Domestic Exchange Coordinator Sheila Brennan.

"Each year we have approximately 80 to 100 students from other states come to UMass on exchange. We are one of the most popular schools to come to on the National Student Exchange, which in turn allows us to send out many students. During the course of my time here at UMass we have certainly received students from all the states that participate," said Brennan.

Students have a variety of different reasons for selecting UMass as their exchange location. From wanting to live in a different region of the United States and experience cultural diversity, to its variety of academic and extra-curricular activities, UMass Amherst provides students with a seemingly endless variety of cultural and academic opportunities.

"I chose UMass because it was located in the five-college area, and I had previously seriously considered going to Mount Holyoke for college," said sophomore exchange student Molly Maguire-Marshall.

"I was also excited about the travel possibilities of Boston and New York City, both of which I've been to twice now," she added. Maguire-Marshall is originally from Gallup, N.M., and attends the University of New Mexico.

The large resident student population at UMass, combined with the variety of activities available on campus, is another feature that attracts many students to the University.

"I was really excited about the fact that the on-campus student population is so large. My home university has about the same student body but only 2,000 live on campus at University of New Mexico. At UMass, I've found campus life to be more exciting, with a lot more organized activities and RSOs for students," said Maguire-Marshall.

While the National Student Exchange Program creates new and exciting opportunities for many students, there are some restrictions these students face while attending their exchange school. One of the most significant restrictions is one enforced by the National Collegiate Athletic Association (NCAA) regarding exchange students and athletic competitions.

The NCAA regulations bar exchange students from competition while enrolled at their exchange school. As a Division I school, UMass Amherst athletics attracts many students. However, for those students who are on exchange, they are unable to completely experience the life of a UMass student-athlete.

"My favorite part of coming to UMass was joining the Women's Rowing Team. Rowing is something I've seriously wanted to pursue for about five years, and was a major factor in me choosing UMass as an exchange school. It is a sport that is basically unheard of in New Mexico. In New Mexico, we joke that our biggest body of water is a puddle after it has rained," said Maguire-Marshall.

"It is unfortunate that as an exchange student I'm barred from competition by the NCAA, but it is still an incredible experience and opportunity to be a part of the team and athletics program here at UMass. I love waking up early and watching the sun rise over the Connecticut River. It is something that many people, even other UMass students, do not get to experience."

The various differences between the academic curriculum of other schools and UMass can create either a positive or negative experience for exchange students. While some exchange students enjoy taking part in new aspects of their learning experience, others find the differences less enjoyable than they initially anticipated.

"Something really different about UMass and University of New Mexico is how UMass requires discussion groups for large lectures. Initially, I thought this sounded like a great idea, and a way to get focused attention from a teaching assistant or professor outside of a lecture. However, I have found that the discussions are an inefficient use of time, and many TAs are unsure of how to use their time," said Maguire-Marshall.

In attending an exchange school, many exchange students find they are losing out on the academic programs they enjoyed at their home universities, which are sometimes unavailable or not entirely the same at UMass.

"One of my favorite things about my home university academically is the honors program. University of New Mexico is also a large public university, much like UMass. However, the honors program there is designed to give students a liberal arts education within a public university. The classes are much smaller, limited to a 16-student max, and totally discussion focused. The honors classes are also very autonomous, sometimes having purely student directed study," said Maguire-Marshall.

"The most recent honors class that I took at UNM was on censorship and banned literature, and as a class, we choose and voted on four novels ourselves, and then led the class discussions and activities ourselves, with outside reading assignments, research, and inviting guest speakers as part of our self-directed curriculum. Our professor acted as a moderator and grader.

"I've found the honors program at UMass to be fairly rigid and structural, not allowing for much creativity or even exciting class topics," she said.

Most exchange students who have participated in the National Exchange program have found it to be a very rewarding and beneficial experience.

"The exchange program as a whole is great, and I would definitely recommend it to anyone looking for a new, exciting experience. You can take classes within your major that will transfer home, which you might not be able to do while on international exchange. The minimum credits required for domestic exchange are also lower than those for international exchange, so sophomores can take advantage of this opportunity, instead of having to wait until their junior year to do an exchange," said Maguire-Marshall.

"I would recommend coming out to the other side of the country, especially the Southwest, if you are looking for a change within the United States," she added.

For more information on the National Student Exchange Program, information sessions are held on Wednesdays and Thursdays at 4:45 p.m. in the Domestic Exchange Office, located at 614 Goodell Hall. These sessions enable students to get applications and more information on these programs. The deadline for students who want to go on exchange for both the fall 2007 and spring 2008 semesters is March 1.

Female facts all guys should know

Debra Capellari

OK, I have to admit there are a few secrets that us ladies like to keep to ourselves. I like the fact that we can eat more pizza and drink more beer than our boyfriends, and our feelings about how we'd much rather burn around in sweatpants than get dressed up.

We'd also like to hide the way we look when we wake up in the mornings (this rings even more true the morning after we've spent all night partying). But lately, this sweatpants clad, beer drinking gal with her previous night's eyeliner smudged on her face is a little tired of keeping all of the secrets on the down low.

Here's something you'll rarely catch me saying out loud: "Wow, guys are right about women." I use this phrase only in extreme circumstances, and frankly, I passed extreme a week ago. Desperate times call for desperate measures.

More than usual, I happen to be hearing the phrase "girls are crazy" coming from the mouths of the guys I choose to spend my time with. Shooting apologetic looks in my direction, the boys proceed to make a laundry list of evidence to support their claims.

You want the scary truth? The apologetic looks are completely unnecessary because I'm laughing along with them. Women are crazy. It's about time men got used to it. And it's an even better time for us ladies to start admitting it.

Here's something you'll rarely catch me saying out loud: "Wow, guys are right about women."

Girls have crazy habits. We're ridiculously emotional. Combine the two and you have a recipe for nearly out of control. Ladies, it's time to come clean. None of us are perfect, so we might as well ditch the façade.

Let's get serious. It's no use pretending to have it all together when it's clearly obvious we're falling apart. Maybe if our guys knew what bothered us, they could understand and empathize with our behavior. Then again, maybe not. But, it's worth a try.

OK, fellas, pay attention. Girls are crazy for a few specific reasons. Some of those are within your control, and some of some are just life. Sorry to be the bearer of bad news on that one, but there are certain things men should never do if you want to live a crazy girl-free lifestyle.

For starters (and this is a big one), don't tell a girl you'll call her and then flake out on it. If you tell her you'll call her, call her. Ideally, the call would be within a few days, but it should happen in a timely fashion.

Let me give you the breakdown of what happens in a girl's mind when you blatantly don't call her. Her brain processes the fact that one man has not called her and immediately believes there must be something wrong with her, forcing her to pick apart all of the flaws she has ever found in herself. And trust me, if a girl says she doesn't do this, she's probably lying. We can't help ourselves. We're train wrecks when it comes to rejection.

Guys, never take a girl out and spend the whole night talking about yourself. Sure, we're interested, but we're hoping you're interested in us too. Honestly, we're hoping you want to hear all about us, but we try to rein it in and answer only the questions you ask.

For that to happen, you actually have to show an interest in our lives. If you're not interested in at least hearing a little bit about us, we'd much rather sit at home with our girlfriends eating "Ben and Jerry's" "Cherry Garcia," if you were wondering, and, yes, we can eat a whole pint.

If you do end up taking a girl out, and you have a so-so time, don't lead us on. If you're really not interested, it's better if you're at least honest about it in the beginning. If you let it go too long, we start getting attached.

It's a female thing, something scientific I'm sure. It's easier for us if you're true from the start. That way, when we analyze exactly what happened, we won't have to wonder if you were lying about the way you felt. Instead, we'll analyze all of your behaviors and our behaviors and come up with some solution that makes us feel better.

Finally, understand that most girls have weird bonds with their best friends. A best friend in a girl's life is one of the most important people, second only to siblings, in certain circumstances. If you don't like the best friend, forget about even having a chance with the girl.

If the best friend doesn't like you, run the other direction. Girls are great bodyguards, and the best friend is never afraid to say exactly what he/she thinks. To get in with the girl, get in with her best friend. You're golden if you manage that.

It's hard to accept, guys, but you're stuck with us and all of our crazy, mysterious and downright questionable behavior. If worse comes to worse, you can always buy us chocolate and flowers. We like that.

But remember, flowers say "I'm sorry," and chocolate says, "I love you." Don't mess it up, because you know we'll be spending hours analyzing why you gave us the one you did.

Observations of a freshman

Andy Smith

I was walking out of Thompson after my 5:30 class had ended. The sun was setting over the Mullins Center, but it was not yet gone for the day. The sky was a faint shade of pink, yet dark enough for the passing cars to have to use their headlights to maximize their visibility. Off in the distance, illuminating the sky, was my home away from home, the John Quincy Adams Tower. It didn't start out this way. However, over time, it became like home to me.

I'll admit, when I moved in on Sept. 3 to begin my first college semester, I didn't know what to expect from the University of Massachusetts. I was assigned to the Southwest Towers, which has been billed as Party Central on campus. I expected to see people scaling the buildings like monkeys, riots and fights being started on a regular basis and kids throwing things out of windows all the time. I can honestly say, after living on campus for two full months, that I have never once seen those things happen.

One of the first things that people tell you as you are preparing to go off to college is how bad the Dining Commons' food is. To me, that's a myth, at least here at UMass. Whether it's Berkshire, Hampshire, Franklin or Worcester, the food I have had has always been above average. What other campuses serve stir fries like Berkshire does or have as many pizza choices as Hampshire? Mmmm, delicious.

Remember, I'm a freshman. The largest class I had ever been a part of, until this September, had 30 students in it. These days, my smallest lecture has almost five times that many people.

I do like lectures, though. The idea that I can bring my laptop to class and take notes in something other than a notebook is amazing to me. It allows for a break in the monotony of a lecture too, because we all know that no one brings their laptop to class just to take notes. I mean, c'mon, you can't take history notes while writing a column at the same time in high school.

I expected to see people scaling the buildings like monkeys, riots and fights being started on a regular basis and kids throwing things out of windows all the time.

Also, you have to ask to go to the bathroom in high school. Not in college. At any point in time, you have the ability to leave class, whether it be an emergency or out of pure boredom. No questions asked about where you're going or where you were, no detentions for talking, no suspensions for fighting in the hallway, nothing.

This might sound crazy, but I don't think UMass is as big as people think it is. I used to dread the walk from Southwest to Lederle every Wednesday morning. It seemed as though I was making an endless walk to nowhere.

Now, I am proud to say that I can make it there in 15 minutes. It's like the first time you get your license. Before that, you think the bus ride to your school is so long that it's bound to make you late for your class. Then you get your first car, and can make the same drive in five minutes. You learn the best roads to take and the best time to leave. Suddenly, that ride doesn't seem all that bad.

My favorite thing about college is the freedom of not having to go to class on a daily basis. Granted, I have gone to every one of my classes (hi mom), but it is always good to know that you have the freedom, if you are sick or studying for a test you have later that day, to miss a lecture.

This isn't like high school where the secretary calls your house and grills your parents with questions wondering if you are actually sick. Most college professors don't even take attendance. The majority couldn't care less whether you are in lecture or not, just as long as you show up for the test.

Needless to say, many things are different in college. I came from a small town in Eastern Massachusetts and didn't know how much I'd like UMass at first. There were 2,000 students in my entire school, but there are more than that in Southwest alone.

I had never lived away from home for any amount of time longer than five days. Now, I live away from home nine months out of the year. I thought there would be a time when I missed my friends and would want to leave here. I can honestly say it hasn't happened, and I don't think it ever will. I love UMass, and I am happy to call it my home away from home.

Prequels, sequels and remakes

Alex Silber

It is a period of creative stagnation. Film audiences everywhere, striking from their home theaters, have won their first victory against the Hollywood film industry.

During the battle, audiences managed to get the same high quality picture and sound with added comfort at a lower price, resulting in stage one of Hollywood's self-destruction.

The industry, backed by its army of loyal directors, set forth a new weapon against the rebellion, the regurgitation of storylines. With this new weapon, the industry merely needs to mention an all-star cast attached to a previously successful film name to make home theater audiences think twice before waiting for a DVD release.

Pursued by the film industry's sinister marketing campaigns, audiences race back to the theaters, slaves to the Hollywood moguls and their plans to save the motion picture industry.

According to Internet Movie Database's box office records, 15 of the top 20 highest grossing films in the United States are sequels, prequels or remakes. As Americans, we pride ourselves on our freedom to innovate and create anything our hearts desire, and that emotion, that ability to do such a thing, is art.

I am beginning to see our society demeaning itself through cookie-cutter art where everything different is strange, and everything basic is unique. To have to see that 15 out of the top 20 highest grossing films are sequels, prequels or remakes is just flat out disgusting.

Is it Hollywood's fault that our society is beginning to view mediocrity as greatness, because they continue to spew out movie after movie with the same general system of ideas and structure? Yes, but only partially. The fault also belongs to film audiences, because they generally allow themselves to judge films by likeability, rather than what they bring to the table.

The industry, backed by its army of loyal directors, set forth a new weapon against the rebellion, the regurgitation of storylines.

"Why are we beginning to see things that are mediocre as being great?" you might be asking yourself. Well, Little Timmy, while it is good for you to take responsibility for the wrongs you have done, there are times when you should not be the one to take responsibility. This is one of those times.

We as a society allow mediocrity to be labeled as greatness, but the fault also lies with the Hollywood motion picture industry. Over the years, Hollywood has promoted blockbuster after blockbuster so intensively that as a society we now confuse hype for substance.

"Come see Robin Williams in his funniest movie EVER," the typical ad might read. "Godzilla the Movie: How can it be anything other than fantastic?" commercial announcers might ask. Hollywood continues to release star-studded, special effect-ridden films because it knows it can get away with it.

Society as a whole, however, has begun to walk away from these blockbusters, and Hollywood has tried to adapt by releasing lower budget films based off of previously successful franchises. People hope the extra storylines and situations entertain them as much as what happened in the first edition of the film. This causes them to go and see another "Saw" film, even though they know the characters will be tortured and will ultimately die.

The sad thing is that we will still go and see these countless sequels, prequels and remakes despite the fact that we know the films are inferior. Hollywood knows very well that it is failing itself and its audience, but still trudges on sinisterly with the same goal in mind, to make money.

Now, if you are still reading this, you may be wondering what you can do to turn this state of mediocrity around. Well, to tell you the truth, I don't have the ultimate answer to that question. When we stopped going to see the blockbuster films, Hollywood came back with the plague of sequels, prequels and remakes. When we began to skip out on the theater experience by watching films at home, we got bombarded with the crappy films that were in theaters on DVD faster.

There is no guaranteed way to escape Hollywood's wrath. I can only suggest you keep in mind what I have said the next time you judge, or plan on viewing, a film. I am definitely not forcing you to ignore the big blockbusters or sequels, prequels and remakes, but I want you to realize that they are probably not cinematic masterpieces.

If you decide not to see a film in theaters because it looks like tripe, stick with that mindset when it comes out on DVD. It's a lot less likely Hollywood will keep releasing such atrocious films if no one will watch them. The only way to defeat your enemy is to know your enemy. We know how the current corrupt Hollywood system works, so we can defeat it.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

NEWSPAPERS SHOULD NOT TELL LIES

As Director of this UMass Certificate Program of Native American Indian Studies, I would like to inform you about Amherst and the original peoples of this valley.

Connecticut River Valley Indians lived here, farming, managing the forest, fishing and gathering for thousands of years before Anglo colonists settled here. The early Anglo settlers petitioned the colonial government in Boston to be a town named Nonotuck (the Algonquian place name for the area).

They were not incorporated until after the American Revolution. The new colonial government named the town Amherst after Lord Amherst, an English officer during the French and Indian War in the 1750s (Seven Year War in Europe), not because he distributed diseased blankets to hundreds of Indians, possibly killing thousands, but because Amherst was asked by the English government to command the English forces during the American Revolution, and refused to fight against the soldiers he had fought with just a few years before.

I recommend Howard Zinn's "People's History of the US" if you're interested in accurately describing events. For example, the extermination of millions of buffalo was c..ne by Euro-Americans riding the then new transcontinental railroad, shooting and killing millions of animals with the new repeating rifles.

All of this is documented by Zinn and many other historians who make it a point to describe history accurately. Next time you feel compelled to print as many untruths as you recently printed (Gregory Klecak, Oct. 27), perhaps you should make use of a very scholarly history department here at UMass. I recommend Prof. Alice Nash's course on Indian history in the USA in particular.

Cuban instrumentalist Paquito D'Rivera performed last night at the Fine Arts Center with the Assad Brothers.

D'Rivera blows away the FAC

BY JAEQWON JACKSON
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

It's called jazz. Dig?

On Thursday, Nov. 9, the jazz, in all its flaming glory, came to the Fine Arts Center on the UMass campus. Paquito D'Rivera, the world renowned composer and instrumentalist, along with the Assad brothers Sergio and Odair, absolute virtuosos in the realm of classical guitar, treated the most appreciative crowd to nothing short of an absolute gem of a performance. Not one person left dissatisfied with the dynamic and versatile performance, which fused elements of classical composition, jazz spontaneity and, last but not least, the distinct touch of Latin that simply cannot be forged.

Most probably haven't heard of Paquito D'Rivera, nor of the Assad brothers. Paquito D'Rivera is a Cuban expatriate who has been there and back, an old but very energetic and lively man who has a list of musical honors to shame anyone but the greats. He has won four Grammy awards, both composing and performing every sort of music, ranging in styles from classical, modern jazz, Latin jazz, traditional Cuban music and every style in between.

In 1981, he sought asylum from Cuba in the United States, and has toured the world since then. He has released over 30 albums, played with such greats as Dizzy Gillespie, and is generally recognized as one of the great living Latin American musicians.

The Assad brothers, Sergio and Odair, hail from the Brazilian-style school of guitar, combining the most intense technical elements with absolute tonal sensibility, crafting beautiful and articulate landscapes of classical guitar. They, too, are living legends in their respective instrument, a seamless yet distinct duo of guitar mastery.

The Assad brothers have released a number of albums and compositions, which have also been recognized by the world music community as instrumental masterpieces, combining elements of classical sensibility and structure with elements of Latin, folk, jazz, each putting their own unique identity to these styles.

So comes "Dances from the New World," a double set of charts played by the trio, including compositions by Paquito D'Rivera and the Assad brothers, as well as other Latin and jazz pieces from throughout the Americas.

The trio skillfully navigated through sonorous chord changes, beautiful light guitars working in and out of harmonies topped with smooth and sensual clarinet melodies. Here was music alive with energy, showing minds still very active and fingers still very adept in these veteran aging musicians, showing absolutely no signs of old age beyond the physical.

They were undoubtedly enjoying the music they played as much as everyone in the audience, excitement and innovation on their parts still evident throughout the performance. It was at times heavenly, serene and peaceful, strains played straight from pearly gates, and at other times frantic, wild, and explosive, capturing every element in between.

Versatility is the word; they were able to capture and convey any and every emotion possible while weaving very distinct classical styles infused with the styles of their individual backgrounds, paying careful attention and consideration, especially, to each individual accent and phrase, truly making the music come alive.

They truly played "Dances from the New World." Somewhere, on some distant shore in the Caribbean, people were no doubt listening to some of the same sounds heard in the Fine Arts Center last night, simply dancing the night away.

MHC film festival

Mount Holyoke College's International Club presents "Cine sans frontiers," a film festival showcasing women from around the world this weekend. Seven award-winning films will be shown Friday through Sunday featuring women and the roles they carry in cinema and in general.

The films feature women from India, Georgia, Senegal, America, France, Korea and Egypt. After each screening, students from the respective regions will give a speech about the movie and its portrayal of women from the region.

The festival started last night, with the screening of "Since Otar Left," a French film depicting three generations of Georgian women. After an unexpected death, two women have to devise a plan to break the heartbreaking news to the victim's grandmother.

Over the weekend, the International Club plans to two daily movie screenings. The afternoon showings, featuring "Moolade," "Water," and "Take Care of my Cat," start at 1 p.m. Evening showings of "The Hours," "8 Women" and "Four Women of Egypt," start at 7 p.m.

Cine Sans Frontiers will be shown in Dwight Hall on the Mount Holyoke campus in room 101. The festival is free and open to the public.

No problem for The Walkmen

BY ANDREW DAMBECK
THE DAILY CARDINAL (U. WISCONSIN)

MADISON, Wis. — While putting the finishing touches on their summer release, "A Hundred Miles Off," and with the eventual demise of their recording studio only weeks away, The Walkmen decided to put together a last hurrah for Marcata Records – the result being a note-by-note remake of Henry Nilsson's "Pussy Cats," an album produced by John Lennon.

Back in 1974, during an extensive separation period between Lennon and Yoko Ono called the "Lost Weekend" when binge drinking and excessive drug use was an everyday affair, Nilsson, Lennon and others stumbled their way into a recording studio and put together the original "Pussy Cats." The album did not do so well at the time of its release, yet over the years has gained a strong cult following of the musical brilliance of both Nilsson and Lennon – even while twisted with substance abuse.

The Walkmen's lead singer, Hamilton Leithauser, plays the part of Nilsson perfectly with his trademark raspy voice, for Nilsson had ruptured his vocal chords prior to the original recording of "Pussy Cats" original recording. In "Many Rivers to Cross", Leithauser embodies the painful shrieks of Nilsson perfectly. "Subterranean Homesick Blues," a Bob Dylan song that was covered by Nilsson, provides an upbeat rendition of either version, including a shrilling saxophone solo that would certainly cause the likes of Charlie Parker to spin in his grave.

The tracks "Don't Forget Me" and "Old Forgotten Soldier" have the makings of a Lennon influence, relaying a sleazy-slow dance quality into them as if solely created for Leithauser's mournful vocals. "All My Life" proves an amazing yet messy rendition of the original, garnering plenty of random quips and goofiness in the background by Marcata's finest. Next is "Save The Last Dance," which very much like "Don't Forget Me," depicts depressing last-call bar moans, but is absolutely nailed by The Walkmen, who characteristically portray this inebriated, love-sick motif in plenty of their tracks.

The warm, congenial "Mucho Mongo Mt. Elga" generates a sense of napping poolside with an umbrella in your drink – either that or a drug-induced hallucination. Of any of the other songs, "Black Sails" is most like something The Walkmen would release on their own; incorporating eerie reverberating guitars and dooming Hammond B3 use that elicits a "Phantom of the Opera"-like shroud on this dark corner of the album.

"Loop de Loop" and "Rock Around the Clock" can be both described in one word – chaos. Included on these tracks is the aptly titled "Saturday Night Marcata 'BBQ' Chorus," which is a conglomeration of musicians, personal friends, and other liquored up encounters who join the band in the studio to party the place right into the ground.

Certainly this amazing recapitulation of a misunderstood album will send many casual listeners to record stores in search of the Nilsson/Lennon gem, but more importantly for The Walkmen, it's a perfect send off to their Marcata recording studio in Harlem and all the great times they had spent in that hole in the wall. The essence of "Pussy Cats" is what has made The Walkmen who they are – it's only fitting they make it back in return.

The Walkmen's rendition of John Lennon and Henry Nilsson's "Pussy Cats" captures the same essence as the original.

We're told day in and day out that beauty is only skin deep, but this only goes so far when the media is still constantly barraged with billboards, magazines and movies featuring girls matching a perfect 10. These beauties seem to pop up out of nowhere. But how much of it is really makeup? How fake is it?

That's where Dove's Campaign For Real Beauty comes in. This Web site features "Evolution," a video where a woman is magically transformed in little over a minute to the likes of a supermodel. The makeup and digitalization is a false representation of what a real woman is. The Web site welcomes people to take a look in the mirror and to question the real definition of beauty.

Ed Bradley dies

Legendary journalist and news correspondent Ed Bradley passed away yesterday morning at the age of 65.

ZAP2IT.COM NEWSPAPER

"60 Minutes" correspondent Ed Bradley, who won 19 Emmys over the course of his career, has died at the age of 65.

The newsman died Thursday morning of leukemia at New York's Mount Sinai Hospital, reports CBS.

Bradley was with the critically acclaimed "60 Minutes" for 26 years and won his most recent Emmy for covering the reopening of the 50-year-old racially motivated murder case of Emmett Till.

Ed Bradley was born June 22, 1941, in Philadelphia and grew up in a single-parent household. He graduated with a B.S. in education from Cheyney State College. During his first job as an elementary school teacher, he moonlighted at WDAS in Philadelphia where he programmed music, read news, and covered basketball games.

In the '60s, he began news reporting during the riots in Philadelphia and landed a full-time job at the CBS-owned New York radio station WCBS. In the '70s, he became a stringer for CBS News when he moved to Paris and covered the Paris Peace Talks. That stint was followed by coverage of the Vietnam War in Saigon, the war in Cambodia (where he was wounded by shrapnel) and then back to the states to cover politics and become CBS News' White House correspondent and then the principal correspondent for "CBS Reports."

He joined up with "60 Minutes" in 1981 when Dan Rather left to anchor the "CBS Evening News." Highlights of his Emmy-winning stories for the newsmagazine included: "In the Belly of the Beast," an interview with convicted murderer Jack Henry Abbott; a profile of singer Lena Horne; a report on schizophrenia; "Made in China," a study of Chinese forced-labor camps; "Caitlin's Story," about the struggle between the parents of a deaf child and the deaf association; "A New Lease on Life," a report on brain cancer patients; "The Catholic Church on Trial," about the sexual abuse in the Church; the only TV interview with Oklahoma City bomber Timothy McVeigh; and a report on the effect so nuclear testing in a Kazakhstani town.

In his career, the respected broadcast journalist was recognized with the Lifetime Achievement award from the National Association of Black Journalists, the Radio/Television News Directors Association's Paul White Award, the Robert F. Kennedy Journalism Award, the Denver Press Club's 2003 Damon Runyon Award, the Peabody Award, an Overseas Press Club award, the Alfred I. duPont-Columbia University Award and numerous other journalistic honors.

Bradley also was the only male correspondent to regularly wear an earring on "60 Minutes." He said he was inspired to pierce his left ear in 1986 after an interview with Liza Minnelli in which she encouraged him to take the leap.

Toys gain an artistic edge

BLOOMINGDALE, N.J. — The scene at 15 Hamburg Turnpike in Bloomingdale, N.J., is somewhere between a chamber of horrors and a field of dreams.

Across the aisle, a dental pick jabs into Boston Red Sox slugger David Ortiz's hand.

That's a few feet from where the head of Marge Simpson is lying on a counter and a couple of yards from where Arizona Diamondback pitcher Brandon Webb is getting a new glove. Miniature legs, arms, heads and torsos litter the facility.

Each is part of a prototype figurine for McFarlane Toys, the New Jersey and Arizona-based maker of highly detailed and popular sports, entertainment and military characters.

The 12-year-old company was started by Todd McFarlane, a 45-year-old Canadian who first drew for Marvel Comics and then left to create a menagerie of scary comic-book characters around a superhero called Spawn.

Keen to turn the crew into toy figures, McFarlane found the response of the established toy companies lackluster.

"I didn't get a sense that they understood the products, or were going to do the art styles I wanted," he said. "They were just going to put it in their status quo marketing."

So McFarlane produced his own line. Since then, "Spawn" has been turned into an Emmy-award-winning HBO series and movie. And McFarlane has harnessed his toy-making savvy to produce an increasingly diverse array of cultural icons.

The company's administration, sales and marketing is done in Tempe, Ariz., and the figures are produced in three Chinese factories. But it's McFarlane's Bloomingdale facility – and the 60 or so designers, sculptors, painters and other artisans who work there – that inject the artistry into the business, and help fight major competitors like Mattel and Hasbro.

"We can't compete with their marketing dollars. I can't compete with their distribution system," McFarlane said. "First and foremost, we build a better mousetrap than everybody."

This year the company's line numbers about 350 different figures, and includes football, hockey, baseball and basketball stars. Other figures are based on music icons such as Jimi Hendrix and KISS, cartoon personas such as Yogi Bear and characters from movies like "The Matrix," "The Terminator" and "Shrek."

On Monday, McFarlane will launch a set of characters from the television series "Lost," including Mr. Eko, at Toys 'R' Us in Times Square. Earlier this year, the company even announced plans to make a model Jon Bon Jovi.

So far, the formula has been successful, albeit with a glitch or two. McFarlane says his toy company has revenue of about $60 million a year. And with 200 employees, it calls itself the "fifth-largest U.S. action figure manufacturer."

McFarlane boosted his profile in 1999 when he paid $3 million for former baseball slugger Mark McGwire's 70th home run baseball. Though some observers said he overpaid, the entrepreneur said he easily earned the money back.

"There's a lot of ways of attracting attention to yourself. But other than shooting people naked at the top of a tower, they cost money," he said. "It's paid for itself in terms of attracting attention for the company."

Still, it hasn't all been smooth sailing. In December, a sister company – Todd McFarlane Productions Inc. – filed for bankruptcy after a court upheld a $15 million ruling against the business. The court found that McFarlane's use of the name Antonio "Tony Twist" Twistelli, infringed on the rights of former hockey player Tony Twist.

Yet little of the cut and thrust of commerce seems to pervade McFarlane's New Jersey operation, which is based in five Colonial-style buildings spread around a Y-junction at one end of Bloomingdale's main street.

The quiet facility is a veritable production line of creation. Each figure starts with the compilation of a one-inch binder full of pictures, clips and background information on the person.

A sketch of the required pose is then drawn and a sculptor carves out a three-dimensional version. The figure is cut into elements – arms, legs, head – and a mold is made for each.

It's then filled with urethane to create the final pieces, which are assembled and sent to China where steel molds are made, ready for mass production of the figures.

what type of preparation they've had, the quality of their practices, and the focus you give to specials teams."

Providence's upset of Boston College and the Minutemen's defeat of No. 8 New Hampshire show how even the field is this year in the HEA. In last place, Northeastern has pulled off an upset of its own already.

"Northeastern beat Michigan – at Michigan. That in itself can tell you [that] they're certainly capable of beating us or anyone else in this league," Cahoon said. "We just need to take care of our business and be prepared to play against a team that's going to be motivated and is going to compete at a pretty high level."

One of the biggest reasons for the early success of the Mass Attack is the improved play on special teams. The Maroon and White has scored at least once on the power play in every game this season, a huge step up from last year's struggles. Cahoon likes what he sees in that area of the game, but still wants to see more from his players.

"I'm satisfied in the sense that we've been productive in both the power play and the penalty kill, but we can get better and more consistent in both areas," Cahoon said. "The coaches will work to do that. The challenges that we face will be great as we play some more of the iron that have terrific special teams in their own right. I'm happy with the progress we've made, but I'm certainly not satisfied."

UMass has not only climbed the conference standings, it has earned national recognition as well. The Minutemen were nine votes shy of earning the No. 20 ranking in the USCHO/CSTV Division 1 men's poll.

With a 5-4-1 record, Colorado College won the 20th spot with 87 votes. UMass fell short with 78. Cahoon said earlier this week that it's hard to avoid the attention.

"We don't get to look by it," Cahoon said. "Every coach will tell you that there's one reason you want to be involved in the polls is because it means you're doing well. The second part to that is that it helps in the recruiting game."

A win this weekend will help UMass break into the national spotlight, but in the end, Cahoon and the Minutemen know that it's all about the wins.

"The truth of the matter is that the only poll that really matters is the final poll," Cahoon said. "So we're all working to that end."

Cory Quirk and UMass welcome Northeastern to the Mullins Center tonight. Quirk recorded one assist in three games against the Huskies last year.

P.J. Fenton (No. 14) and Chris Davis are two reasons why UMass is 3-1 in the conference. The two have combined for 10 points this season.

it was just him continuing to compete, and playing hard, and having good outings, and the productivity would come."

And it has this season.

Fenton had two points in the opening weekend against Sacred Heart and Clarkson. He recorded an assist against the Pioneers and his first goal of the season against the Golden Knights.

Then he added two more points this past weekend against Providence. Along with his goal on Saturday night, Fenton chipped in another goal on Friday night which was also assisted by Ortiz.

"I think what's happened thus far is a lot of guys have chipped in and played well," Cahoon said. "You've got [Matt] Anderson, [Chris] Capraro, Ortiz, [Cory] Quirk, [Chris] Davis and Fenton all doing these good things offensively, and you've got a corps of defensemen that are all chipping in, and then you get good goaltending and the next thing you know we're winning as truly a team and with a well balanced lineup."

Cahoon attributes Fenton's improved campaign this season to the advantage of having another year under his belt. He has embraced the magnified role given to him this year.

"I think P.J. is a little more comfortable with his own athletic skill right now," Cahoon said. "He's just making plays and being a hockey player and being a competitor."

had to take a little time off and catch our breath and give the kids some time to recover.

"We started working toward the end of last weekend and the workouts have gone great," he added.

The Minutewomen will look at this race as a stepping stone to become a better team. Last week, coach Julie LaFreniere acknowledged that the team is becoming better and said she would like to see it at full potential.

"I'm looking forward to the next two meets because I just feel like they have it now, they understand what they need to do and they're more than willing to do it," LaFreniere said.

Last season the Minutewomen finished 30th at the NCAA Regional.

Junior Christina DeRosa continues to run at a high level. At the A-10 Championships, she earned All-Conference honors and finished in 10th place. This weekend, she will pace herself against the best in the Northeast. Last season at the NCAA Regional she finished 34th out of 255 runners.

Notes: Junior Ryan Durkin and junior Christina DeRosa have been named to Atlantic 10 Academic All-Conference Team. This is the first time each runner has received this award.

Durkin is a finance and operations management major and is running his best season in his third year at UMass. He finished 23rd at the A-10 Championships and is consistently a top-five runner.

"Like any sport, to get better it takes time, and [Durkin] is starting to reap the rewards of the hard work he's put in," O'Brien said. "He's a great influence with anyone on the team and especially the younger guys."

DeRosa is a kinesiology major and has been the lead runner in the last 20 races for the Minutewomen cross country team. This season she earned A-10 All-Conference honors for the second-straight season and is a two-time A-10 Performer of the Week.

Junior Nils Fischer finished ninth overall for the Minutemen at the Atlantic 10 Championships on Oct. 28.

minutes per game. In her limited time, Young shot just 22.7 percent from the floor (5-22) and had more turnovers (23) than assists (17). Dacko knows that there will be growing pains, but is excited to have Young commandeer the offense.

Benton, a freshman from Springfield, Penn. will backup Young. The diminutive 5-foot-5 guard averaged over eight points and 5.6 assists per game her senior year in high school. Her abilities with the ball are praised by her coach.

"Kim is someone who can be a floor general for us," Dacko said. "She's a playmaker who can make things happen on the court. She sees the floor extremely well and commands the respect of her teammates. In addition to that, she's an outstanding shooter and can drain the three.

"Young and Benton give us two different looks, which is a real good thing for us."

THE SWINGWOMEN

At the off-guard spot, it will be partly up to sophomore Stefanie Gerardot to replace the perimeter threat UMass had last season with Katie Nelson.

"We're looking for her to be a scorer," Dacko said. "She needs to gain more confidence in her shot. She's one to stop shooting if her shot doesn't go down early. She shoots the ball extremely well and is someone we will depend on to keep the offense moving, as she always makes the extra pass."

Gerardot should help take some of the scoring load off of two-time leading scorer Pam Rosario. Last season, the junior's 12.5 scoring average was tops on the team and she also chipped in with 4.4 rebounds and 2.7 assists per game – ranking third and second on the team respectively. Her versatility earned her a second-team All-Conference (along with Katie Mills) selection last season and a third-team preseason pick.

"Pam is someone who will fill the lanes, push it up the floor and be the recipient of a lot of layups, provided the point guards get her the ball," Dacko said. "She's very unselfish and tries to get her teammates involved. She's a very confident player and gives us another dimension down low when she posts up smaller guards."

The two remaining guards battling for playing time are freshman Diatiema Hill and sophomore Erin Calipari. Despite their combined lack of experience at the Division 1 college level - Calipari only played in two games as a freshman – Dacko is confident they can contribute down the road this season for the Minutewomen.

"Diatiema has a terrific attitude and Erin is really tough," she said. "Hill just needs playing time to make our team better. She can be a defensive stopper for us. Erin is a scrappy player that I will put in there to give our team energy and excitement. I think she's earned that coming in thus far by battling in practice. She is a real competitor, has a nice shot and can be a nice motivating factor in a game."

ON THE BLOCKS

Expected to be the biggest strength of this year's team is the solid play down low. The starting trio of junior co-captains Kate Mills and Alisha Tatham, along with senior Tamara Tatham should provide the Minutewomen with some serious thunder and versatility in the paint.

Despite coming off the bench for much of last season, Mills was able to finish second on the team in both scoring (12.4) and rebounds (5.3) per game.

"Kate is our go-to player in the paint," Dacko said. "She's probably the best shooter we have on the team from the perimeter and from the inside. I don't need her to get a lot of blocks, but I certainly need her to be a force on the inside. She's a mobile post player who's very strong. We just need to keep the mental side of her game positive. I'd like her to take around 18 or 19 shots a game."

Tamara Tatham started all 28 games a season ago and led the Maroon and White in rebounds per game (6.9) and finished third in scoring at 10 points per contest.

"Tamara is extremely athletic and can run forever," Dacko said. "We're trying to keep things simple for her and have her follow in Kate's footsteps. Tamara is somebody that can get her hands on deflections and run the break and has an improving outside jump shot.

"Alisha is the lead defensive stopper, if I had to select one on our team," Dacko added. "You will often see Alisha matched up against our opponent's best player. She's a team leader on and off the floor, and that's indicative of why she was selected as one of the captains."

Coming off the bench to spell the forwards are juniors Whitney McDonald and transfer Debin Bell.

"Debin is still learning the game of basketball at the Division 1 level," Dacko said. "It will take time for her to adjust but she has the skill and talent to do so. Whitney should see a lot more playing time this year. Her mental game is much improved and she can be an anchor defensively."

MICHAEL PHILLIPS/COLLEGIAN

Junior Alisha Tatham looks to improve on her 3.9 points per game and 2.2 rebounds per game from last year. This season she enters her final season playing alongside her sister Tamara, who is a senior this year.

Dacko: Maturity and teamwork keys to Minutewomen success will look to improve on a stellar sophomore season when she led the team in blocked shots and field goals made per game.

"She can be very dominant inside," Dacko said. "She takes up a lot of space, and came into [this season] in really good shape. She has a good mental framework to lead by example both on and off the court."

Mills shares the frontcourt with the lone senior forward Tamara Tatham and junior center Whitney McDonald.

"I think our biggest strength [last season] was our inside game, and playing off the inside game to get outside shots" said Mills.

"On the perimeter you look for [junior forward Alisha Tatham to step up]," Dacko said. "She has done an exceptional job working at her game, and providing solid leadership off the court. [Junior guard] Pam Rosanio is another player who gets up the floor really well."

Rosanio was the leading scorer from last season, averaging 12.4 points per game, second on the team in assists, and third on the team in rebounding, pulling down 4.4 boards per game.

With the Minutewomen only carrying 11 players on the roster contribution from top to bottom will be a key for success.

"It's a small group so everybody's got to help one way or another," Dacko added.

With the departure of four-year starting point guard Katie Nelson, sophomore Sakera Young and freshman Kim Benton will need to step up and run the offense.

With the young backcourt, Rosanio will need to continue improving as a force both on and off the court.

For the Minutewomen to improve this season, they will need to be more consistent throughout the length of their schedule. Key areas to watch for will be valuing ball possession, defense and taking smart shots.

"Scoring droughts, poor shot selection and turnovers [were our weaknesses]," Dacko said.

Dacko pegged maturity and teamwork as key to the second half surge last season.

"I think maturation [was responsible], I think we grew," said Dacko. "We've been striving [to find] leaders, and working on leadership, working on kids being able to look to each other for support in the trenches, and getting prepared for games and practices at a different level."

With their leadership in place, the Minutewomen will try and get started on the right foot tonight against Vermont.

MICHAEL PHILLIPS/COLLEGIAN

Junior Kate Mills shot 77 percent from the field a season ago. She also ranked second on the Minutewomen with 5.3 rebounds per contest.

Upperco leads UMass to state capital

By Joe Mellona
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams head to the state's capital Saturday afternoon for a dual meet with the Boston University Terriers.

In 2005, the Minutemen (1-1) and Minutewomen (2-1) welcomed BU to Joseph R. Rodgers Jr. pool, but were anything but gracious hosts to the Terriers - the women defeated BU, 141-100, and the men prevailed, 141-97.

Boston University's program is one in transition. The athletic department brought in a new coach before the 2005 season and the team struggled last season. However, the UMass coaching staff feels that after a year under a new coaching staff, the Terriers will be prepared for revenge.

"[BU] has a second-year coach, so he really has things going his way," UMass coach Bob Newcomb said. "They're a much improved team, so we're expecting a tougher team than we swam last season."

Sophomore Karen Upperco recorded the 3rd-best three-meter dive in school history as a freshman. Her 272.77 total score on the three-meter dive and 260.92 in the one-meter event bested the competition.

In her action this season, Upperco is undefeated. However, a strong group of Terrier divers certainly hopes to unseat Upperco and the Minutewomen.

"This should be a really good week for us," UMass diving coach Mandy Hixon said. "BU has a group of really good divers. It should be a good test for us - I'm really looking forward to it."

The Terriers' best chance to defeat Upperco on the three-meter board comes in the form of sophomore Alex Crerar. Upperco's record in the three-meter dive last year defeated Crerar by just five points. She won this past weekend at Colgate by more than 28 points.

On the one-meter plank, senior Megan White could pose a threat. She defeated Crerar this past weekend at Colgate by more than 12 points. She finished 3rd behind Upperco and Crerar, at last year's meet with the Minutewomen.

Newcomb hopes that his top swimmers perform well again this weekend. Depth is one of the team's biggest strengths, but if the best swimmers perform as they should, victory will be all the easier to achieve.

"We're really looking for out frontliners to step up again," Newcomb said. "If they swim well, we'll be fine."

Butterfly specialist Christa Narus' performances for UMass to this point in the season have been a great source of points for the Minutewomen. Against Army, Narus gathered 12 points in the Minutewomen's victory – she was part of the 200-yard medley relay that tallied four points for the Maroon and White.

"We've had a great practice this week," Newcomb said. "The girls really feel good about this meet. They know that no matter how well one of them swims, it's a team thing."

Coming off last week's disappointing loss to Central Connecticut, the Minutewomen hope to recover and deal BU a thumping similar to last year's.

The Minutemen have been off since their loss to Army two weeks ago - UMass fell to the Black Knights 155-145. The 10-point loss pleased UMass coach Russ Yarworth because the Minutemen lost to Army by 114 points in 2005.

"Coming off that Army meet, where we had 100 percent effort, we've had just as much over the last two weeks," Yarworth said. "The last two weeks were two of the toughest we'll have this season."

The Minutemen's best performer this season has been Evan Swisher. The senior is undefeated in the 100-yard backstroke event for the 2006 campaign. Regardless of how a meet may be going for the Minutemen, it is almost assured that nine points will be added to the team score when the 100-yard backstroke is over. Swisher received A-10 Swimming Performer of the Week on October 30.

"We were pleased that Evan received [A-10 Swimming Performer of the Week]," Yarworth said. "But we're not about the individual stuff, Evan's not about the individual stuff."

The Minutemen will face a stiffer contest from BU on Saturday than they did last season, but should have enough left in their legs after the last two weeks of practice to leave Boston with a victory.

Butterflies aside, Hill prepares for season

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

UMass freshman guard Diatiema Hill said she isn't at all that nervous about her first collegiate basketball game, taking place tonight at Vermont at 7 p.m.

She mentioned that last week's 60-58 loss in an exhibition game against Bishop's University got rid of all the butterflies in her stomach. The only thing left now is the fire in her belly.

"Even though it was an exhibition game, we took it seriously, like it was a real game," Hill said of the game. "I didn't go into the game nervous. [But then,] at the beginning of the game, warming up, I was nervous. I just stayed calm and played the game how I usually play. I feel like if I go into the game nervous, everything is just going to be off."

Hill played a total of 12 minutes, recording a defensive rebound and a personal foul against the team from Quebec, Canada. She normally plays point guard but has been manning the shooting guard position due to an injury to fellow freshman Kim Benton.

"I think she did really well. I think she saw the floor [well]," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "I think she moved the ball well. I think her teammates were quite surprised and pleased with her level of understanding of the offense. She filled those shoes pretty well."

Hill is a first-year student from Queens, N.Y. She served as a three-year starter for the prestigious cross town basketball team at Francis Lewis High School in Flushing.

"I loved that school," Hill said. "It's a big difference going from being big on the team to [a team where] everyone has to play a role. At Francis Lewis, I'm not going to say I was the star player, but I was one of the key players on the team. The coach, he really got into me. He wanted me to motivate the team and do a lot more. Here, Marnie, she doesn't care who takes the role of being the leader.

"But, at Francis Lewis I had a lot on by back," Hill added. "I had to keep the team up. When it comes to defense, if we were losing, I couldn't put my head down because everybody's looking at me. Even when I was a sophomore I was the point guard and I still had the role of being the leader and trying to keep the team together. But, here I'm looking up to everybody else and following what they do."

Despite her impressive high school career, Hill's play with her AAU team is what actually attracted UMass scouts to her.

"She's been on our radar screen for about three or four years. We've watched her play. We've liked what we've seen. She came out of a good AAU program. We're familiar with her AAU coach," Dacko said. "We got her up on a visit and we knew she was somebody we wanted because she has that gift of speed and quickness and that's something that you just can't teach."

Despite Hill's limited play on Saturday, her coach says she had an excellent game and expects more of the same today in Burlington, Vt.

"I'd like to see her pick her defense up," Dacko commented. "We're trying to get her to be a better defensive player. We feel she possesses the quickness and the smarts to do what we got to teach her. She's somebody that I look to have her defense create her offense."

As for Hill, she intends to treat the season opener as if it was any other game of her basketball career.

"I take every game the same way. I just play the game and let the game come to me," a humble but confident Hill said. "Even though it's college, I'm not really nervous. I'm not expecting to play 40 minutes or anything like that, but how ever many minutes I get to play I'm expecting to do my best and do whatever my team needs me to do. If it's just to play defense and stop somebody, then I'll do that. If they want me to score, then I'll do that too."

SPORTS WEEKEND

Streaking UM sits atop Hockey East

Senior Mark Matlowsh has contributed a goal and an assist to the Minutemen's 4-1-1 start this season. UMass currently sits atop the Hockey East standings, tied with Boston University and UMass-Lowell.

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team will look to keep its momentum going, riding a two-game sweep of Providence last weekend. Tonight the Mass Attack (4-1-1, 3-1-0 Hockey East) will challenge another conference rival, Northeastern (2-5-1, 0-4-1 HEA).

UMass has gotten off to its best start since the 2003-04 season, in which the Minutemen reached the Hockey East Finals. That year they started at 5-1-0 in their first six games.

The Minutemen want to carry the excitement into this weekend against the Huskies, but UMass coach Don Cahoon doesn't want to focus on what's been done so far.

"We don't really think about what has transpired, but what we're doing," said Cahoon. "We're dealing with this three-pronged view of the past, present and future [and that] has to be channeled toward the present. You certainly can't look at the past, and you certainly don't want to look too far into the future, if at all."

Home-ice advantage has been critical for UMass, as the Minutemen are undefeated at home thus far, with a 3-0-1 record. However, Cahoon is focused on taking it one game at a time.

"You want to keep [your focus] right to the present, so the way we build off of what we've already done is to just stay with the here and now and work hard, and make gains in areas we're deficient on a very regular basis," he said.

UMass is currently atop the league standings. The team is tied with UMass-Lowell and Boston University with six points in the conference, but UMass has the most wins, with three on the young season.

Northeastern has yet to win against a conference foe and will be trying to fight its way out of the basement this weekend. With so many upsets already this year, this game against the Huskies could quickly become a trap game.

"Every game is potentially a trap game," Cahoon said. "It's just a matter of what our guys' mentality is going into the game.

Fenton, Minutemen riding high

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

A year ago on Nov. 4, P.J. Fenton recorded his first goal of the 2005-06 season for the Massachusetts hockey team against the Providence Friars in Amherst. Fenton's goal against PC last Saturday was already his third of this season.

On Nov. 10 last season, his line read: one goal and two assists. Fenton didn't record another point until he had an assist against Merrimack on Dec. 6. This year Fenton is off to a vastly improved start with three goals and three assists.

Much of the Minutemen's success can be attributed to the production Fenton is turning out, especially last Saturday.

His goal in the third period was the deciding factor in the Minutemen's 3-2 victory over the Friars — effectively sealing the weekend sweep. Will Ortiz assisted on the play when Friars' goalie Tyler Sims couldn't control the puck off the freshman's shot.

With the puck refusing to settle on the ice, Fenton charged in and batted it by Sims and into the net. His production, coupled with that of a number of other players on the roster has earned UMass first place in Hockey East.

"I think it's very important because balance is going to be the mainstay of this team," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "I said a few times earlier in the year that I felt the team, top-to-bottom, was better than it had ever been, going back to the two teams that were good teams a few years ago. We have more depth right now. What we weren't sure about is how good our high-end players would be, how outstanding they would be."

After a stellar freshman campaign, Fenton had somewhat of a down season last year. In his first year in Amherst, he recorded 13 goals and 12 assists. Although his assist numbers stayed the same last year, Fenton's goals slumped to five tallies.

But as Cahoon notes, Fenton wasn't the only UMass player that struggled a year ago. Unlike this season, the Minutemen relied heavily on just a few players for offensive production.

"Again, it wasn't just P.J., it might have been people around him not playing as well," Cahoon said. "He might not have gotten the puck as often as he needed to.

"I know he played really well towards the end of the year, and the numbers never really showed how well he was playing down the last month and a half of the season. I think

Minutewomen back in action

By J.M. Friedman

The Massachusetts women's basketball team opens its 30th season tonight in Burlington against the Vermont Catamounts. After stumbling out of the gate last season, the Minutewomen will call on their leaders to maintain consistent effort from start to wire this year.

The Minutewomen aim to improve on a 10-22 record in season openers, having lost their last nine straight debuts on the road. The Maroon and White fell all against a UVM team that has won 16-straight home openers at Patrick Gymnasium. the Catamounts hold a 15-24 mark against Atlantic 10 opponents. UMass holds a 2-0 record against Vermont, including a 9-7 mark away from Amherst. The last meeting between these two teams resulted in a 54-49 victory for UMass at the Curry Hicks Cage on Dec. 3, 2003.

Vermont begins the season with 10 of 14 roster spots occupied by underclassmen. The young team was tabbed to finish eighth in the nine-team America East Conference. Catamounts coach Sharon Dawley begins her fourth season with a 37-46 record.

The Minutewomen look to move forward with the momentum garnered at the end of last season, finishing strong down the stretch by posting eight victories in 11 games.

Tabbed to finish eighth out of 14 in the Atlantic 10 Preseason Coaches' Poll, the Maroon and White finished last season with an 11-17 conference record, including an 8-8 record against A-10 foes.

On the road against UVM tonight, the Minutewomen look to display the growth and maturity of a team that returns all but one starter from last season, along with nearly 80 percent of its scoring.

After going 2-12 on the road in the 2006-07 season, the Minutewomen face an early road test in the Green Mountain state. UMass failed to win a non-conference road game over the course of last season, going 0-6. Starting strong in the opener would go a long way towards boosting the confidence and mental state of the Minutewomen.

"It's baffling to me, we've got to learn to win on the road," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "The courts are the same, 94 feet by 50 [feet], the baskets are 10 feet high, we've got to get out of that [negative] mindset and be able to play on the road. [The opener against Vermont] will really set the pace for learning to win on the road."

While the road has not treated UMass well, the home court at the Mullins Center has provided a definite advantage. The Minutewomen posted an 8-4 record there last year, including a 6-2 mark against conference opponents.

The schedule this year reflects new A-10 policy, providing more non-conference matchups in an effort to renew regional rivalries. The '06-'07 slate has several long road stretches, including a six-game trip through Boston College, Holy Cross and Yale, along with A-10 opponents Rhode Island, Richmond and George Washington.

The first conference game at the Mullins Center is not until Jan. 18, a matchup that kicks off 11 straight contests against conference opponents to finish the season.

"You can only do so much talking as a coach," Dacko said. "At some point the kids have to take over [in the locker room]. The kids returning this year have already been there, we return a great deal of the people who got the majority of playing time a year ago, and now it's for them to step up to say this is my team and take ownership of what [they're] going to do."

Leading the way for the Minutewomen both on the court and in the locker room will be junior forward Kate Mills. She Junior Pam Bryan was tops on the Minutewomen in scoring during the 2005-07 season. Her 12.5 points per game just edged Kate Mills' 12.4. UMass opens its season tonight against UVM in Burlington.

Young guards mix with veteran forwards

Senior Tamara Tatham averaged 10 points per game and 6.9 rebounds per game for the Minutewomen a season ago.

By Eli Rosenswake
Collegian Staff

Yesterday's edition of the Collegian was inundated with a preview of the Massachusetts men's basketball team. The hype and expectations of the Minutemen are immense, and it hasn't been this way in a long time.

What about the Minutewomen? Last year the women's basketball team finished the season at 11-17, just two games behind its male counterpart. The 2005-06 campaign ended well the Minutewomen won eight of their final 12 games including a big win over George Washington, which was nationally ranked at the time

The Minutewomen look to build on that late success this season, albeit with a much younger squad.

The Floor Generals

The point guard – a vital position on the floor will be in the young hands of sophomore starter Sakera Young and freshman Kim Benton. Despite the lack of experience, UMass coach Marnie Dacko expects her young guns to step in and contribute right away.

"We expect Young to create for her teammates," Dacko said. "We want her to really run the ball, push the ball up the floor, see the defense and get us going. We'll also need her to have a nose for the ball defensively and get our break to happen."

Last year, Young only made one start and averaged just over eight

With its 28-25 win over Louisville last night, Rutgers improved on its best start since the Scarlet Knights went undefeated in 1976. They defeated Louisville that season, 34-0, 30 years ago this week.

UMass heads to Northeast qualifier

By Steve Games

The Massachusetts cross country teams have been preparing for the NCAA Division I Northeast Regional Qualifier meet held in New York. The top two teams from each region will go on to the nationals.

Two weeks ago the teams raced for the Atlantic 10 Championships. The Minutemen had an impressive showing, placing third and the Minutewomen had a respectable sixth place finish.

Iona College — at Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx, N.Y. — will play host to the meet. UMass ran the course earlier this season on Sept. 30 at the Meet of Champions. There, the men placed sixth while the women finished ninth.

The Minutemen are coming off a strong performance at the A-10 Championships. Junior Nils Fischer finished ninth overall and sophomore Jesse Regnier placed 17th.

They will run on a 10,000-meter course – just over six miles. This is the first time all season the men will run a course of this length. Normally, they run five-mile courses.

"That really doesn't hold a physical disadvantage, but some people do let it bother them a little bit mentally," Minutemen head coach Ken O'Brien said. "We haven't raced over 10,000 meters yet, but at the same time, I think our level of training has prepared us for that."

Last year, the Minutemen finished 17th overall and look to move up a couple places this year. Fischer finished first for the Maroon and White, placing 85th at the regional meet.

"I see us being somewhere between 10 and 15," O'Brien said.

The men have a deep team with many young and talented runners, although O'Brien says he isn't certain what to except out of his young runners.

"This year's team is significantly younger and sometimes that can be a drawback, but it hasn't held the team back," O'Brien said. "It would be a nice step for the kids to set their sights on a NCAA qualifier in the future."

After the A-10 Championships, the team knew it wouldn't race for another two weeks, and O'Brien knew it was essential for his runners to be rested before the next race.

"We had a pretty hard effort in the Atlantic 10 meet," O'Brien said. "We

Campus Pro-choice group rallies against abortion ban

VOX: Students for Choice group members traveled to South Dakota to encourage voters to strike down legislation that would make all abortions illegal, except in instances when the mother's life would be endangered during childbirth.

By Anna Dollantis
Collegian Staff

Members of the University of Massachusetts' VOX: Students for Choice traveled to Aberdeen, South Dakota last week in order to rally support to strike down an abortion ban passed last year.

Their efforts were rewarded when the ban was repealed in last Tuesday's election.

VOX president, senior Jessica Parker, treasurer, junior Tevin Murray, and group member sophomore Jessica Kincman went to Aberdeen from Nov. 2-Nov. 6. The trip was fully funded by the Planned Parenthood Foundation of America, the nation's leading sexual health and reproductive healthcare advocate and provider, according to the organization's Web site.

VOX, which has been an active Registered Student Organization at UMass since 2003, functions under Planned Parenthood and aims to "spread awareness about sexual health and reproductive rights in hopes of promoting pro-choice activism," said Murray. "This includes providing access to information on safe sex, where to get tested and why it is important to do so."

The organization also promotes decreasing restrictions on access to abortion, emergency contraception, and birth control.

The group's goal while in South Dakota was to encourage voters to strike down legislation that would make all abortions illegal, except in instances when the mother's life would be endangered during childbirth.

This legislation, placed on the state ballot as Referred Law 6, would keep the ban with a "yes" vote, and would repeal it with a "no" vote.

"Many people in South Dakota found this [law] too restrictive and so staged an injunction," said Murray. "This means they got 40,000 signatures which prevented the ban from going into effect, and placed it on the ballot to be put to vote by the people," she said.

The students worked 14-hour days, in collaboration with two other organizers in Aberdeen, rallying support in various ways, including phone banking, canvassing, and holding signs at high-traffic intersections.

"About 500 phone calls were made each day, and about 750 houses were visited," Murray said.

The group members encountered opposition in their efforts, as Aberdeen is in a conservative area of South Dakota. "We definitely caused a stir when holding signs. Lots of people were screaming out their car windows calling us 'baby killers,'" said Murray.

Although the group found supporters, these supporters were in the "silent majority," according to Murray. Pro-life advocates were

Freefalling: UMass student takes the leap of a lifetime

Adrenaline junkie shares experience of first jump

By Owen Boss
Collegian Correspondent

Have you always dreamed of skydiving, but have never gotten around to planning your first jump? Well now is the time to do it if you are a University of Massachusetts student and have three hours to kill and $195 in the bank you could fall through the skies of Amherst tomorrow.

"Jumptown," a skydiving facility located in Orange, Massachusetts gets its share of student jumpers from the University of Massachusetts. "Jumptown" is the home of the Massachusetts Sport Parachute Club (MSPC). They recently relocated to Orange because it is the birthplace of skydiving in the United States.

"Jumptown" started as the University of Massachusetts Amherst skydiving club in 1959 and was located in Turners Falls until 1995. After 1995, they moved to a larger facility in Orange. Since then, they have built up a reputation as one of the best and most convenient places to jump in Western Massachusetts. A month ago, for my birthday, I tried it for the first time, and have been thinking about my second jump ever since.

If you are a first-time jumper, you are required to perform what they call a "tandem jump" which means you are strapped extremely, and often times uncomfortably, close to a trained professional. In order to jump by yourself, you must perform a minimum of 20 freefall skydives with an instructor.

"Jumptown," a skydiving facility in Orange, Mass. started as the University of Massachusetts Amherst skydiving club in 1959.

The thought of going by myself was not something I had considered before my first jump, but afterwards, I analyzed the financial benefits of becoming certified. The prices drop dramatically and you can plan a jump on almost any weekend.

The morning of my scheduled jump, I woke up hung over from a long night of drinking in uptown Amherst. I had told my roommates all about the jump, so that morning I was greeted with comments such as "I hope your chute opens," and "If you die I'm keeping your laptop and the Xbox."

I printed out directions to the address on the "Jumptown" Web site and made my way to Orange. The ride was surprisingly quick – it only took about 15 minutes to get there from the UMass campus. I parked my car next to the runway, and as I pulled up it dawned on me that I was actually about to go skydiving. I walked into the front office, and paid the woman for my jump. She told me that I would be orientated in a couple of minutes, and I should just grab a seat on the couch.

While sitting on the couch, I started conversations with the other first-timers in the room. A couple of them were UMass students, and were just as nervous as I was.

After forcing small talk, my eyes wandered around the office. I noticed framed pictures of people skydiving on the wall. Several of the pictures had people throwing the thumbs up and smiling on the way down.

I scanned the wall further and saw a picture of a woman who couldn't have been younger than 70 falling through the sky. The knot in my stomach became bigger "I can't back out, some old woman did it. What would they think if I just walked out right now? I've seen 'Final Destination,' and I know how things like this end." I started looking for the door.

A man in a ridiculous white jumpsuit walked into the room and clapped his hands together, "Hey guys. You all ready to get orientated for your first skydive?"

The man was Dennis O'Loughlin. He is a 34-year-old resident of New Salem, Massachusetts, and he has been jumping for 10 years. We walked into the back room and O'Loughlin closed the door behind him. He walked into the middle of the room, turned the chair around and said "So, you guys ready to jump?"

No one said anything. "Any of you nervous?" We all smiled and raised our hands. "Now first thing I'm going to do is show you the parachute." He went on to explain how he had recorded over 600 jumps in his lifetime, and that the parachute had not one, not three, but four backup parachutes.

I began toying with the thought that I was going to live through this. "Today we will be jumping from 15,000 feet, and that means you're going to have about a minute and a half of free fall. You'll be falling at about 150 miles per hour – and you will be strapped to one of our veteran jumpers."

After the meeting, we walked back into the waiting area and sat down for about 15 minutes. Several of the other rookies were noticeably freaking out – I remained stoic in an attempt to be the "cool rookie" in the group – but I was definitely scared.

The door opened back up and O'Loughlin told us we could all come out and get suited in our flight gear. I hope they have something in extra long. A kid who couldn't have been older than 19 walked over to me with his hand out I shook it.

"Hey my name is Scott I'll be jumping with you today." There must

Calorie reduction may increase lifespan

BY STEFANIE PEHR
THE DAILY VIDETTE (ILLINOIS STATE U.)

NORMAL, Ill. — Numerous studies, including some done in Wisconsin, have linked dramatic effects in animals and more recently monkeys that indicate calorie reduction could extend the lifespan. While still taking nutrients and vitamins into consideration, the idea of calorie reduction is to eat about 30 percent less calories than normal.

According to Bob Cavanaugh, the secretary and editor with the Calorie Reduction Society, those who encourage calorie reduction have received a lot of scrutiny, but are finally starting to get some recognition for this concept.

"Before everyone just considered us the wacko anorexics trying to live forever ... we are being taken more seriously these days with much media coverage including the 'Today Show' and the New York Times," Cavanaugh explained.

Cavanaugh said he emphasizes the pairing of calorie reduction with proper nutrition and the combination of the two is what truly increases the lifespan and delays the onset of age related disease.

Lauren Rusk, the senior nutrition major and vice president of the Illinois State University Food Nutrition and Dietetics Club, said she feels cutting calories alone is not the best way to diet.

"You do not get all the nutrients you need this way ... just like with the low carb diets, excluding anything from the food pyramid isn't good for you," Rusk explained.

"Although the overall picture indicates the extension of lifespan boils down to the calories, one must also have proper nutrition to increase the health span as well," Cavanaugh said.

There are still many skeptics of calorie restricted diets who do not believe Americans can stay on such diets because they are too strict and will feel miserable trying to attempt them.

Rusk said many people go on diets, especially the fad ones and feel they are only temporary.

"People go on diets thinking they are temporary, they will lose weight and then go back to how they ate before when in reality it should be more of a life change using the food pyramid as a guide to stay healthy," Rusk explained.

Cavanaugh said he has seen many members of society having a difficult time adjusting to the new diet, but the idea is to ease into it and stay on track.

"I cannot emphasize enough the idea of easing into the diet ... you must gradually change your diet to include less calories, not all at once. Also, keeping track of what you're eating by using various types of software can help you see your progress," Cavanaugh explained.

Experts emphasize both calorie reduction and proper nutrition.

Rusk explained a similar point of view and said there cannot be a drastic change because it will be too difficult to maintain the diet.

"You cannot just automatically cut out all the fat and sweets from your diet, it's not realistic ... you need to take little steps like eating three cookies instead of six. If you change too quick you will overwhelm yourself and that's usually when people give up, when they feel frustrated," Rusk explained.

Recently the drug Resveratrol has received a lot of attention in relation to calorie reduction.

It is an antioxidant present in large amounts of red wine that is said to help one reduce their calorie intake.

Cavanaugh said some of his members are using this drug and it is already available in capsule form that can dissolve into wine or juice and can be purchased from various wineries.

"I am not necessarily a proponent of supplements and pills, but many of our members take them and it works for them ... some people need that to help them, and many seem to like Resveratrol," Cavanaugh explained.

Cavanaugh said there can be negative effects from reducing too many calories and too quickly

Castro believed to be terminally ill

Fidel Castro was seen weakened and thinner in official state photos released late last month, and it is considered unlikely that he will return to power or survive through the end of the year.

BY KATHERINE SHRADER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — The government believes Fidel Castro's health is deteriorating and that the Cuban dictator is unlikely to live through 2007.

That dire view was reinforced last week when Cuba's foreign minister backed away from his prediction that the ailing Castro would return to power by early December. "It's a subject on which I don't want to speculate," Felipe Perez Roque told The Associated Press in Havana.

U.S. government officials say there is still some mystery about Castro's diagnosis, his treatment and how he is responding. But these officials believe that the 80-year-old has terminal cancer of the stomach, colon or pancreas.

He was seen weakened and thinner in official state photos released late last month, and it is considered unlikely that he will return to power or survive through the end of next year, said the U.S. government and defense officials. They spoke on condition of anonymity because they were not authorized to speak publicly about the politically sensitive topic.

With chemotherapy, Castro may live up to 18 months, said the defense official. Without it, expected survival would drop to three months to eight months.

American officials will not talk publicly about how they glean clues to Castro's health. But U.S. spy agencies include physicians who study pictures, video, public statements and other information coming out of Cuba.

The CIA's Office of Medical Services, for example, studies hair and other biological samples for hints about world leaders' health and how that could affect their official duties.

Images and video of a weakened Castro released in late October showed his now-slight frame and shaky movements. They contradicted the athletic image he sought to portray in his red, white and blue Cuban Olympic team warm-up suit, emblazoned with "F. Castro" on the chest.

A dark lesion on his neck could be seen in some images and a baggy nylon jacket could be hiding a colostomy bag. But the photos also made clear that he has not lost his hair or beard to chemotherapy.

Cuba has only known one leader in 47 years. Castro temporarily ceded power to his brother, Raul, at the end of July just before the government announced that the president was having intestinal surgery.

A planned celebration of Castro's 80th birthday next month is expected to draw international attention. The Cuban leader had planned to attend the public event, which already had been postponed once from his Aug. 13 birthday.

Perez Roque, the foreign minister, said last week that Castro was recovering steadily from his intestinal surgery. "We are optimistic," he said.

But the minister also said there was no guarantee Castro would be well enough to attend the birthday celebration.

Brian Latell, a former Latin American specialist with the CIA who has written a book examining the leadership of Fidel and Raul Castro, said he has been convinced for three months that Castro is gravely ill with inoperable cancer.

Questions abound about what comes after Castro.

In the immediate future, the Cuban government could decide to hold a large state funeral and welcome an international contingent to Havana. But Latell thinks that probably will not happen. "They will be concerned about maintaining security," he said.

Because of the current transition to Raul Castro, unrest among the Cuban population is considered unlikely. "I have not seen one credible report about riots or demonstrations ... not one credible challenge to the succession," Latell said.

Nevertheless, the U.S. government is preparing for a range of scenarios. For instance, the Miami-based U.S. Southern Command is working with the Coast Guard and Homeland Security Department on training and planning to minimize the impact of any mass migration out of Cuba.

"We are not expecting a mass migration, but are ready for that possibility," said Jose Ruiz, a Southern Command spokesman.

The United States has long wanted to see an end of Communist rule in Cuba.

During an interview on Fox News last week, Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice said the goal is to have Cuba hold democratic elections.

"When there is a transition, whenever that comes, it has to be the goal of the United States and the goal of the international community to insist that the Cuban people get to make a choice," she said.

Cuba has one of the lowest unemployment rates in the world, but also a faltering economy. The CIA reports that the average Cuban's standard of living remains lower than before an economic downturn of the 1990s, caused by the loss of $4 billion to $6 billion each year in Soviet aid and domestic inefficiencies.

Location of 2001 NYC plane crash memorial draws mixed reactions

BY JENNIFER PELTZ
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK — Hundreds of relatives and friends of the victims in the nation's second deadliest air accident dedicated a much-awaited memorial Sunday with mementoes and mixed emotions.

Wearing their loss on T-shirts, scarves and buttons, families clutching red roses and photographs gathered on a foggy beachfront to look up the names of 265 loved ones killed when American Airlines Flight 587 crashed five years ago.

"It's something that we can come to and pray," said Ana Lora, who placed a model car near the name of her brother, Jose Francisco Lora, who collected cars. "This is something that, really, we need."

The memorial marks years of effort to create a tangible remembrance of the crash, which killed all 260 people on board and another five in the quiet Queens neighborhood where the jet fell. The National Transportation Safety Board eventually determined that the tail of the Airbus A300 had fallen off, and the agency blamed pilot error, inadequate pilot training and overly sensitive rudder controls.

Mourners gather at the new Flight 587 memorial during its dedication Nov. 12, 2006.

very vocal in their opposition to repealing the ban, which created tension between them and those who supported it.

"One woman told us she had been refused communion at her church because she was pro-choice. The churches there were also preaching to vote 'yes'- 'vote God's values,'" said Murray..

While the group was in Aberdeen a pro-life van drove around the town, plastered with pictures of aborted fetuses, which Murray called, "incredibly graphic and complete fabrication." According to Murray, these pro-life advocates were lying to the people by claiming that the law allowed exceptions for instances of rape, incest, and poor health, which is not the case.

Pro-choice advocates argued that the ban was in violation of the 1973 Supreme Court decision in the case of Roe v. Wade, which held that prohibiting abortion violated the individual's constitutional right to privacy, as protected under the Fourteenth Amendment.

South Dakota voters struck down the ban last Tuesday, keeping abortion legal in the state.

We accomplished what we hoped for," said Murray, who also added that there is only one abortion provider in the entire state, located in Sioux Falls; the one abortion provider at the clinic is from out-of-state.

The UMass chapter of VOX has been an official RSO since 2001, but has only been active in the past two years. The group's past events include Sex on the Lawn, an all-day outdoor sexual education fair held last May, which included games, contests, a bake sale and the distribution of over 3,000 condoms.

The group's most visible activity is the Hanger project, which takes place each semester on the lawn of the Du Bois Library.

"It is a reminder to everybody what women had to resort to before Roe v. Wade," said Murray.

The group's upcoming events include the Beta Project, an audio documentary of women who had abortions prior to abortion legislation, and World AIDS Day on Dec. 1.

Student protesters carried signs at high-traffic intersections.

The disaster jarred a city still raw and fearful after the terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center two months before. The loss was also felt heavily in the Dominican Republic, where Flight 587 was bound from John F. Kennedy International Airport. Many passengers were of Dominican heritage.

Designed by a Dominican artist, the $9.2 million memorial is a curved wall inscribed with the names of the dead. Cutouts, where weeping relatives placed roses, wreaths and photographs, provide a view of the sea.

"Your ideas and your memories have been woven into it," Mayor Michael Bloomberg told those gathered Sunday.

But the memorial also was shaped by tensions over its location – a seaside park, rather than the residential street where the plane crashed – and some victims' relatives were still coming to terms with the outcome Sunday. After the city-sponsored ceremony, mourners flocked to an impromptu memorial around a tree at the crash site.

For many, too, just remembering raised conflicting feelings.

"I feel good being here, but it's very painful," said Lora. Her 43-year-old brother was on the verge of graduating from law school in the Dominican Republic when he boarded Flight 587.

Initially, she and many other victims' relatives wanted the memorial built at the scene of the crash, about 15 blocks away in the Belle Harbor neighborhood. But many residents opposed the idea, saying a memorial wouldn't fit on the residential block.

Others said they didn't want a constant reminder of the calamity, especially in a part of New York City that had lost a number of residents on Sept. 11.

The city ultimately compromised on a spot off the Ocean Promenade, surrounded by shops and a condominium complex.

Family members and friends greeted the memorial Sunday with gratitude, if it took a measure of resignation for some.

"We would like to see something done where the plane came down, but it's too late now. They built a house there," said William Fernandez. He lost a cousin, Luis Arturo Pichardo, a father of four and the owner of a furniture store in Brentwood, N.Y.

Gladys Matos, whose aunt, Iris "Magaly" Santana de Acosta, was on the flight, saw the memorial and ceremony as a fitting tribute.

"It's nice, but it's not going to get back to what we really want, which is to be with them and to talk with them," said Matos, 36, of Queens. "But it's nice that we get together. We have the same emotional feelings. We try to give support, one to another. We're like a family."

First-time skydiver overcomes fears and finds his passion be some mistake. I'm a first timer – I'm paying money to jump with some kind of grizzled ex-Navy Seal, not a pre-teen. He strapped me into a flight suit and slapped both of my shoulders like it was the Super Bowl.

"You nervous about the jump?" I shook my head no. "You ever done this before?" I say smiling, but at the same time completely serious, "Yeah, I have over 900 recorded jumps and will probably do four today. Don't worry man – you'll be fine."

As we boarded the camouflaged twin engine airplane I began remembering some obscure fact about how 90 percent of all airplane crashes occur in small low-flying airplanes. It may actually be a fact, or it could be something someone stupid had said to me one blurry night.

We slid down the bench, and I began picturing the beginning of "Band of Brothers," and how while watching it I had convinced myself I would have died early on had I actually fought in World War II. I turned to Scott and asked "How long you guys had this plane?"

"Oh we've had this thing for years. It's called the 'Spankin Otter.' We got it from the Norwegian Airforce. It's a Twin Otter, she's not new, but she'll get ya up there. Besides, you don't even have to worry about the landing."

I laughed even though I didn't think it was funny. We took off. After about five minutes into the ride, the veterans in the front began eyeing down the newbies. They exchanged glances and smiled at us. Scott slapped the back of my helmet and started strapping me into his harness.

"This might be a little tight," he says as I basically sat in his lap.

"No problem dude – I don't want to fall out."

After about 20 minutes in the air, the vets up front slid the door open. The entire cabin filled with air. The first couple of jumpers started jumping out, and my stomach dropped. "Oh my God, I'm about to go skydiving. I'm definitely going to die," I thought.

As each vet fell out of the airplane, it became closer and closer to being my turn. Eventually, Scott and I were the only ones left on the plane. "You ready bro?" I shuffled closer and closer to the edge. Eventually my toes were over the state of Massachusetts, and I couldn't hear anything but wind. I heard Scott start counting, "One.... two....three..."

The Spankin' Otter banked, and we flew out.

My stomach immediately flipped. I could see the airplane after the first front flip, but after the second it was completely gone. I am going to die.

Scott then tipped us straight up and down so we were flying vertically toward the Earth. The wind was deafening. My eyes were watering, and I could feel my cheeks flapping like I've seen in so many movies.

I stopped worrying about the fact that I was nervous, and started enjoying the view. The feeling of going 150 miles per hour is amazing. We curled back into a helicopter spin that lasted about 25 seconds, and then we straightened out. Scott slapped the back of my helmet and passed me the ripcord. I remembered what I was supposed to do from training – I'm supposed to pull it.

I pull the ripcord and immediately Scott's and my bodyweight were pressed into the harness latched inconveniently on my crotch. The pain from the sudden jerk was quickly replaced with gratification that the chute had actually opened. It hit me that I was going to make it.

I did it. The wind stopped, and we started to bend around to the landing sight. It took about a minute and a half for us to come down in the chute, and we stuck the landing very smoothly – something I was certain I was going to blow.

After jumping for the first time, I immediately started saving for my next jump. I have gotten my friends interested in it, and plan on taking a group jump with the package that lets you not only take mid-air pictures, but also film the jump.

"Jumptown" is open on Thursdays and Fridays from 10 a.m. to sunset and on Saturdays and Sundays from 8 a.m. to sunset. And as for winter hours, they are open, but you should call ahead because it is based strongly on the weather. They will be shut down for the entire month of January, but are operating the other 11 months of the year. Get out there and do it.

While boarding the plane for his first jump, Owen Boss remembered a fact that 90 percent of all airplane crashes occur in small low-flying planes.

Gov.-elect Patrick faces challenges before taking oath of office

BY STEVE LEBLANC
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Deval Patrick won't have much time for a victory lap.

Even before he takes the oath of office in January, Patrick will be asked to weigh in on a slew of high octane issues, from gay marriage to Turnpike tolls.

After he's handed the keys to the corner office, those challenges will only multiply. Within weeks Patrick will have to deliver his first state budget, a massive document that will attach dollars signs to many of the proposals he's campaigned on for the past 19 months.

But perhaps the most daunting challenge of all will be reshaping the face of Beacon Hill – at least that enormous chunk that falls under the power of the governor.

"I'm looking for the best ideas and the best people from wherever they come," he said this week. "We don't have a litmus test. I suspect there will be people from both parties and no party in the cabinet and in the administration."

Patrick, the first Democratic governor in 16 years, also promised "a real reflection of the diversity of Massachusetts in every way, racially and ethnically and geographically and in terms of background and perspective."

Among those keeping a close eye on Patrick's appointments will be leaders in the Democrat-controlled Legislature.

"The transition is going to be the first indication of the new administration so it's key, those first appointments. It's reflective of the direction of the administration," Senate President Robert Travaglini, D-Boston said in an interview with The Associated Press.

"He's got to strike a balance," Travaglini added. "He needs to give serious thought to reaching a balance that includes veteran players, new faces."

Republicans, dwindling in number and strength on Beacon Hill, are also watching.

"He's had the luxury because of his oratorical gifts of letting people paint their own canvas," said House Republican leader Brad Jones, R-North Reading. "We're going to make sure that the actions he takes as governor matches his rhetoric."

The sheer scope of the task is dizzying.

Patrick will begin by cleaning house in the governor's office, bringing in his own inner circle, including a chief of staff, chief legal counsel, director of legislative affairs and communications director – charged with helping create the administration's public image.

Equally key will be the people Patrick names to 14 cabinet posts, from the secretaries of environmental affairs and economic development to the directors of consumer affairs and housing and community development.

Some cabinet appointments will get closer public scrutiny than others.

Patrick's new transportation secretary will not only help him set the administration's transportation agenda, but will also take the helm at the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority and oversee the Big Dig. Patrick has placed the Big Dig near the top of his "to do" list and vowed to conduct his own top-to-bottom review of the massive $14.6 billion project.

Another cabinet post with enormous power is the Secretary of Administration and Finance – charged with helping write the governor's version of the state budget.

Whoever Patrick names to the post will get the unenviable task of trying to find money to close budget holes, help Patrick figure out how much money to spend on top priorities and make the case for cuts or revenue increases.

That's just the start. Patrick will also name the heads of dozens of state departments.

Under the Executive Office of Health and Human Services alone, there are more than 16 departments, from the very large – such as the Department of Public Health and the Department of Social Services – to the small – such as Office of Refugees and Immigrants and the Soldier's Home in Holyoke.

Under the Executive Office for Public Safety, there are another 14 departments, from the Department of Corrections and State Police to the Massachusetts Parole Board and the Chief Medical Examiners office.

Then there are the hundreds of boards and commissions with thousands of members, some of all of whom are appointed by the governor.

And it doesn't stop there.

Patrick will also have wide powers to reshape the judiciary. As governor, Patrick has the power to make appointments to the bench, from the lower courts to the Supreme Judicial Court. The appointments must be approved by the Governor's Council, but the eight-member panel has rarely blocked appointments to the bench.

There are some Romney appointees Patrick will have to live with, at least at first.

Mass. Gov.-elect Deval Patrick and Lt. Gov.-elect Tim Murray share a laugh after a news conference in Boston, Nov. 8, 2006.

Reveling in the regime change

Ben Duffy

Are Democrats planning a redeployment or sounding a general retreat?

Congratulations Democrats, you did it. Last Tuesday, your party captured both the House and Senate. I'm not a Democrat, so I'm not pleased but many are.

I'm still not sure where the Democrats stand on the Iraq War. From what I gather, the Democrats believe the war in Iraq is ill-founded and un-winnable, although they want "a new direction" and a timetable for success. Yet, that doesn't mean that they're offering any suggestions as to what that new direction might be, and they're offering no timetable.

They also want to "bring the troops home," but consider it slanderous for anyone to suggest that they want to cut and run. Retreat is the last thing on their minds. They just want "redeployment." Yet, redeployment is simply a euphemism for retreat.

Some key Democrats have suggested that redeployment would mean moving our troops to countries that border Iraq, where they could be on alert to assist the Iraqi Army when necessary. It kind of makes you wonder how the Democrats are going to "bring the troops home" if they're all going to be in countries that border Iraq.

If you can't make sense of the Democrats' plan on Iraq, don't be alarmed. Neither can I.

Despite any clear policy on the Iraq War, the world seems to be rejoicing about last Tuesday's Democratic victory. Jihadists, militia leaders, dictators and Iranian mullahs across the globe are high-fiving each other. The leader of al-Qaeda in Iraq, Abu Hamza al-Muhajir, commented on an audiotape that "The American people have taken a step in the right path to come out of their predicament ... they voted for a level of reason."

That's right. A major leader of the terrorist group that attacked us on 9/11 thinks that the Democrats are quite reasonable. Isn't this the same group that we swore we would never surrender to? Didn't we swear that we would bear any hardship in pursuit of victory? I guess that was just American bluster.

Despite the fact that I cannot discern an actual policy for the Iraq War on the part of the Democrats, it appears that al-Muhajir has. "The (U.S.) enemy is now wobbly. Today they are loading their gear to flee," he said.

Wow, so all that talk about redeployment isn't fooling the terrorists any more than it's fooling me. Redeployment means surrender and handing control of Iraq over to the likes of al-Muhajir and his master, Osama bin Laden.

For those of you who do not believe that retreating from Iraq will mean more terrorist attacks at home, take note of this quote from al-Muhajir. "We will not rest from our Jihad until we are under the olive trees of Rumieh and we have destroyed the dirty black house – which is called the White House."

Retreating from Iraq won't be like retreating from Vietnam. When we cut and ran from that war, the only people who paid the price in blood were the innocent Vietnamese we left to die in that communist hellhole. But if we lose this one, that will not be the end. The terrorists won't interpret it as a sign of good will, but rather as a sign of weakness.

The radical Shiite militia leader Muqtada al-Sadr is also pleased with election results.

"The vote shows the Iraqi and American people are of one mind about withdrawing U.S. troops," said Falah Hassan Shanshal, who leads the parliamentary bloc of radical anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr to the Associated Press in a November article. "We hope the Democrats don't forget their campaign promises. If they don't, we will deal with them in a brotherly way once the last American soldier pulls out from Iraq," he said.

In case you were wondering, Muqtada al-Sadr's Mahadi Army is half terrorist organization and half political party. Both factions support an Iranian-style theocracy in Iraq. I don't want this guy's "brotherly" treatment any more than I want Osama bin Laden's. I'd prefer if al-Sadr thought I was an infidel dog, but I can see that the Democratic Party gets the al-Sadr seal of approval.

The Iranian theocrats who have been covertly supporting militants in Iraq have a similar view. "This issue (the elections) is not a purely domestic issue for America, but it is the defeat of Bush's hawkish policies in the world," said Iran's Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. "Since Washington's hostile and hawkish policies have always been against the Iranian nation, this defeat is actually an obvious victory for the Iranian nation."

Syria is also pleased with the Democratic victory. According to CNS News, Syrian Information Minister Dr Mohsen Bilal "noted that incoming House Speaker Nancy Pelosi opposes the war in Iraq. 'This lady has made the word of the American people audible,' he said. 'And this is very comfortable.'"

I'm not sure that Pelosi did make our voices audible, because we elected a party that has no coherent position on Iraq. Nonetheless, the jihadists understood Tuesday's election as a surrender. As much as Democrats struggled to disguise the true meaning of their campaign to take back the Congress, somehow our enemies seemed to receive the message loud and clear. Thanks, Democrats.

New rules of the air

Chris Eckel

It's getting colder every day in Amherst, and finals are starting to creep up, so naturally, we're all starting to think about warmer weather and stress-free living. However, it might be a pipedream for all of those dreaming about the perfect spring destination of Cancun, the Bahamas or Rome.

By the time March rolls around, your viable options might be limited to Cleveland, Santa Fe and Sheboygan. Currently before the Bureau of Customs and Border Protection (CBP), which falls under the Department of Homeland Security, is a proposal concerning passenger manifests for flights both coming into and leaving the United States.

The proposal is complex (36 pages long), but it essentially entails the CBP being given the authority to demand a full list of every passenger prior to the plane taking off. Nothing too strange about that, but the disturbing part is that the bill specifies "the carrier will not permit the boarding of a passenger unless the passenger has been cleared by CBP (Customs and Border Protection)."

This proposal is dubious in several ways. For one thing, the chances of it being ideally enforced are about the same as the odds of your little brother taking Angelina Jolie to his senior prom. According to the North American region of Airport Council International, the yearly number of passengers nationwide is over one billion, a number which works out to about 3,000 people per minute across the United States. How on earth will the United States government keep up with that information flow? How many workers and how many dollars would it take?

For the sake of argument, let's assume that Bush somehow finds a way to rein in his budget, somehow fixes the widely estimated $9,000,000,000,000 national debt, and manages to afford a shiny new "national defense" toy. Even if it were affordable, would it be a move in the right direction?

Consider the implications of this legislation passing. American citizens would need to receive permission from their government to take an international vacation. If some government employee who's having a bad day decides that you shouldn't be able to go to London, forget about getting on that Virgin Airlines flight VS012. Considering the way the Bush administration has worked, do you really think this bill would require any sort of justification for denial of passage? Quite simply, this is a huge violation of civil rights.

The other half of this bill is even more disturbing. Imagine taking a two-week trip to Argentina. If you looked up the wrong term on "the Google" or called home and asked how many boys were sexually abused by members of Congress this week, and it was noticed by U.S. intelligence services, you might be banned from: re-entering the United States; returning to your home; reuniting with your family; resuming your job; and becoming reacquainted with your friends, your dog, and your baseball team. Good luck spending the rest of your life scrounging for scrap wood on some La Plata beach.

I hear you war eagles crying out that this move is in the best interests of national security. When does this so-called movement towards national security become more of a burden on the citizenry than a promise of peace? Speaking of peace, I bet (but not online) you might be wondering what other world leaders might have sought to limit the travel of their electorate. Two leaders come to mind. I'll give you a hint to their names. One begins with "S" and ends with "talin," and the other has a last name that rhymes with "whittler."

Because European history often gets left behind so children won't be, I'll give the answers just in case – Stalin and Hitler, two swell fellows and widely-respected policymakers. The current leader of the United States has been compared to both for his actions abroad. Now, it seems like he is attempting to emulate them at home, as well.

A politician we might all seek to emulate, Benjamin Franklin, once said, "Any society that would give up a little liberty to gain a little security will deserve neither and lose both." The exact wording is disputed, but the message is consistent and clear. Americans are on the precipice of losing the civil rights that have made the United States a wonderful nation for 230 years.

If we do not demand what the U.S. Constitution promises, we may lose both our rights and our standing in the world. If that isn't dire enough, just imagine how depressing it will be not to be able to get a tan in March.

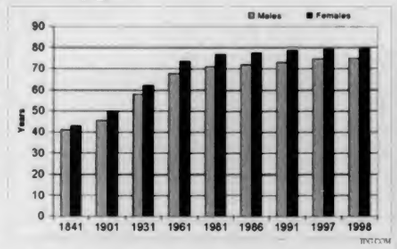
Apocalypse soon

Lauren Modisette



The average life expectancy is slowly on the rise, what does this mean for the future?

Modern medicine is a regular part of life that has become necessary to our means of survival. Antibiotics cure viruses, surgeries assist in more comfortable living conditions, and in-vitro fertilization grants infertile couples a chance at starting a genetic family line. These can all be considered useful to us and our livelihood.

But what I am about to offer is my theory, and most of you aren't going to agree with it. I believe that modern medicine will contribute to the downfall of mankind.

Although modern medicine has done a great deal of good things for humans, we need to consider its effects. For a moment, I would like to talk about how modern medicine negatively affects the theories of Charles Darwin.

Modern medicine is just another tool humans are using to prolong life. Death is something humans commonly fear because of the uncertainty of what happens afterwards, hence the will to live longer. Since medicines, like amoxicillin and MMR, flu, and tetanus shots, have become available, the human life expectancy has increased dramatically. This has disrupted the natural balance human's once lived by.

Less than 200 years ago, humans were lucky if they lived past the age of 50. These days, it isn't uncommon for us to make it to the late eighties and nineties, and some are even making it to the hundreds. Does everyone really want to live until parts of our brains shut down and we can't even remember our own names? Until we need assistance to live?

What I would like to know is what people expected their prolonged lives to be like when modern medicines began to be established. Did they anticipate Alzheimer's, strokes, osteoporosis, menopause, etc.?

I have a theory that our prolonged lifespan contributes to medicinal conditions like menopause. Technically, the female body was meant to reproduce in the teenage years. I believe women experience this inevitable medical condition because that is around the time female bodies used to die. In a way, it's saying to us, "wait a minute, I'm still alive? This isn't right, what am I supposed to do now?"

The same goes for men except they don't necessarily have a medical condition but rather a mid-life crisis. Both of these experiences fall upon the middle-aged adult. It is only rational to believe that we experience these phases because our bodies are still trying to adjust to the change.

In theory, by Survival of the Fittest, the strongest humans would overcome the natural obstacles and illnesses in life, and they would be the ones to survive, just like the animal world. As much as I know people hate to hear it, we are animals. Our advantage is our cognitive abilities which create things like language and medicines.

Another aspect of modern medicine that is rather unsettling is the availability of options such as life-support and in-vitro fertilization. With life-support we are simply evading and cheating the inevitable death of those we hold close to us. Can't this be considered selfish, holding back those whose time has come to pass on?

In-vitro fertilization is a great option available to couples that are otherwise unable to conceive. Although it is revolutionary, it completely goes against Darwin's theory of Natural Selection. In theory, those who are infertile and cannot conceive aren't meant to. For one reason or another nature did not intend for their genes to be passed on.

These practices we have discovered are disrupting the natural balance of the world.

Consider for a moment what life would be like without modern medicine. Besides the discomfort of constant illnesses, there would be no knowledge of anything that is negatively affecting our bodies. Would people be happier or more miserable if not aware of the illnesses they were suffering from?

I know it is unsettling to consider, but imagine how much lower the population would be if we didn't have modern medicine. You and I may not even be alive. It is reasonable to believe that we wouldn't have the environmental and global problems we are encountering today.

Eventually, people will be living so long that the birth and death ratio will be ridiculous. What will happen when this occurs?

Either we are in store for an astounding series of natural disasters, a plague that will wipe out a mass amount of the global population that our current medicines will not be able to fight or a serious world war. Unfortunately there is no stopping it. By now it is simply inevitable.

Death is just another part of the life-cycle, and while people shouldn't anticipate it, it should be mildly embraced and accepted. Who truly wants to live forever anyway? To be there when everything falls apart and comes to a crashing end? It's scary, I know, but some things just need to be said.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

HAD TO BUY MINTS AFTER VISIT

I visited UMass-Amherst on Nov. 11 for the Maine football game, and mostly enjoyed my time on campus (in spite of Maine's heartbreaking loss – I am a Maine alum). The day was beautiful, and people were very respectful of my 2-year-old son.

I think highly of everyone at UMass-Amherst, with the exception of the person(s) who stole the Rutgers block letter "R" magnet off of my vehicle while it was parked during the football game (I am also a Rutgers alum).

Yes, it's only a $5 magnet. It is also no longer available due to Rutgers' recent successes on the gridiron. The point here is that this action did not exhibit much class, and left a bad taste in my mouth. I guess when I return for the Maine game in 2008, I'll have to take everything off of the outside of my vehicle.

Marley zig-zags the Calvin with raggae vibes

By Lauren Modisette
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On Saturday night, the Calvin Theatre in Northampton, Mass. was overrun by reggae lovers from all over Western Massachusetts because of Ziggy Marley's musical expertise. To the dismay of all the procrastinating fans, tickets were sold out by the night of the show.

The show started at 8 p.m. as musician Trevor Hall opened the evening with a unique contemporary rock/reggae style. For a young musician, Hall has created a substantial fan base. Many of the people in the crowd were requesting songs and singing along with him.

Musical performer Mike Curran spoke of his love for both Hall and Marley and said that the evening ahead was a promising and entertaining one. Curran saw Hall play at Bonnaroo and hadn't forgotten about him. Curran was thrilled when he learned that Hall was making an appearance at the Calvin Theatre Saturday night.

Hall's percussionist doesn't play a simple drum; he plays an instrument called a box drum. This instrument was developed in Cuba and Peru and originated from wooden shipping crates and drawers.

With the plethora of fans shouting praise to him, Hall put on a wonderful opening act. It's highly recommended for everyone to discover this remarkable duo.

Curran also speaks of a song Hall played called "The Lime Tree," which he claims is "his best song." If his music doesn't win you over, his smile and enthusiasm is guaranteed to. He will return to the East Coast for a performance on December 10 at the Paradise Lounge in Boston. Learn more about him at www.trevorhallmusic.com. Marley and his nine band member's finally made it to the stage around 9:30 p.m. and everyone released a roar of built up anticipation.

Marley exclaimed, "Come on baby let's make some music."

Ziggy Marley offers a more modern influence in his music than his father had, and is spreading his originality across the country.

His band consists of two guitarist (occasionally three when Marley joined in,) a bassist, two percussionists, keys, drums and two back up singers. With all of them working together, the energy they released was astounding.

Marley's appearance in Northampton attracted a great deal more experienced music lovers along with a multitude of the college crowd – and even a child here and there. The subs were bumping so loud you could feel the vibrations in your stomach and your hair stand on end. Everyone was dancing and it was rare to spot an immobile fan taking a breather to regain his/her energy.

Amidst the selection of his original songs, Marley played some of his father's legendary pieces by incorporating his own modern technique into songs like, "Is This Love," "Get Up, Stand Up" and "Jammin.'"

Marley is currently on his "Love is My Religion" tour in support of his latest CD. There was a big banner hanging in the backdrop that read "LOVE" – just what resided in the energy released from the fans and the musicians.

Marley and his band played nearly 20 songs for their fans with no set break and little resting time in the encore split. He played songs like "Make Some Music," "Rastaman Vibration," "Concrete Jungle," "Wake Up and Live," "True to Myself," and many more original masterpieces. He left the crowd dangling at the tips of his fingers as he played "Love is My Religion" as his last song.

Ziggy Marley offers a more modern influence in his music than his father had, and is spreading his originality across the country. Although you can see and hear resemblances between the two, Marley has definitely found a way to make his music his own and apart from the rest of his family. He successfully takes the renowned pieces of his father and completely makes them his own. Marley possess a great deal of talent and, as expected, his siblings also have their own incredible and unique musical styles to add to the diversity.

Some noteworthy quotes from the surplus of songs he provided the fans with are considerably deep and hold a great deal of truth in them. In one song he sings "we're on a ride that never stops," and exclaims "I wonder how you survive with the environment going down the drain?"

Marley believes that "you are musically active since you are born. All babies are born into music and music teaches all of us." Speaking of how his music has changed over the many years in his experience he said, "As I've grown and become more open [to new things] my music has become more open. I have become less egotistical and more spiritual."

If you missed the concert on Saturday, unfortunately you may have to wait until this spring to catch Marley and his band, unless you have the means to make a trip across a state or two. To retrieve a copy of his latest CD visit www.ziggymarley.com and decide for yourself if you're willing to make a short journey to join in his music before he moves further out west.

Ziggy Marley, son of the late musical legend Bob Marley, jammed at the Calvin Theater on Saturday night and even rocked-out with some of his father's timeless songs, like "Jammin" and "Is This Love."

UMass exhibits art of former Panther activist

By Karen Aisen
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Charlotte Hill O'Neal is one of the most interesting and unique individuals of our time, and her character shines through in her artwork. Born in Kansas City, Kansas in 1951, she joined the Black Panther Party at age 18. Under the leadership of Pete O'Neal, she became a leader and an activist for her people during the revolutionary time of the 1960s.

Soon after, Hill married O'Neal, thus becoming Charlotte Hill O'Neal. The couple united in spreading their message throughout Kansas, until Peter O'Neal was accused of transporting a gun across state lines. He became a political exile, and the couple moved to Algiers, Algeria – the international headquarters of the Party. After two years, they moved to Tanzania, East Africa, to make their home in Imbaseni, a rural village and traditional home of the Wameru tribe.

Hill O'Neal's exhibit, called "On Being...and Finding Voice," celebrates the theme of women finding a voice in the face of adversity.

Together they founded what is now known as the United African Alliance Community Center (UAACC). Hill O'Neal refers to the center as a "campus" in which they teach classes in English, computer studies, arts, HIV/AIDS awareness and life skills training. O'Neal has never returned to America, both he and his wife refer to Tanzania as their home. Hill O'Neal travels back to America every few years to inspire people through her art and her words. The story of this extraordinary couple has been portrayed in the PBS documentary, "A Panther in Africa."

"Perhaps one day in the not too distant future, art will be considered a necessity for spiritual well-being as much as food is necessary for our physical growth."

Hill O'Neal is currently traveling throughout America, giving speeches and representing her newest artwork. Her exhibit, entitled "On Being...and Finding Voice" is on display in the Augusta Savage Art Gallery in the New Africa House, located within the Central Residential Area. It features many unique pieces, which were made exclusively for the Augusta Savage Art Gallery, and cannot be found anywhere else. The exhibit, which opened Oct. 24 and runs through Nov. 21, has already been very successful and is attracting observers from all over. Many people have traveled to the gallery just to see her celebrated work.

The exhibit features 12 rich and colorful portraits on fabric. The Augusta Gallery manager, Alexia Cota explained that, "each portrait is meant to promote the pride and self-sufficiency of women in her community."

Interacting with women at the UAACC in Tanzania has given Hill O'Neal the opportunity to experience just how therapeutic and liberating creating art can be. Many Tanzanian women who are oppressed by the hard work and monotonies of everyday life create artwork to find their voice and individuality. Hill O'Neal frequently gets the chance to watch the birth of an artist right before her eyes. Cota says, "You can see it in her face, the deep effect it has on her every time someone gets excited about art."

"Perhaps one day in the not too distant future, art will be considered a necessity for spiritual well-being as much as food is necessary for our physical growth," said Hill O'Neal.

The theme of the exhibit is about women finding their voices through art. Hill O'Neal is influenced by many things including the women of Tanzania, her life as an American, her mothaer and herself.

Hill O'Neal is a member of a hip-hop group that records music in Tanzania. She strongly believes in the power of music as a form of self-expression, and her passion for music is represented in many of her pieces. One portrait, entitled "Blue Boas, Baby Grand and Jazz Music" demonstrates her love of singing blues and jazz, as well as the relationship between women, soul and music.

Hill O'Neal uses papier-mâché, acrylic painting, quilling and collage in her work. She incorporates materials that can be found only in Africa, such as pressed bark, fabrics and jewelry. This allows for very textured pieces which are rich and abundant in African flavor.

She wore Sticks and African Lace to the Prom" is the visual interpretation of the story about a girl who stood out at her high school prom by wearing traditional African clothing. This true story took place in Kansas City, and the girl was none other than Hill O'Neal herself.

"On Being...and Finding Voice" celebrates the lives women live in the face of strife and adversity. A piece entitled, "Dreams of Eyes in Times of Drought" portrays the struggle to find meaning and hope in times of natural disaster, while "Mama Sho' Could Style!" is a portrait of her mother, who was always very well put together and fashionable. The exhibit ranges from portraits to abstract concept pieces.

Hill O'Neal's lifelong mission of promoting and expressing uniqueness has given her artwork a flair that only someone who has lived her life could create. Each of the 12 pieces featured in the exhibit beautifully illustrate how women throughout the world may use diversity to unify themselves.

Charlotte Hill O'Neal is an artist and former Black Panther activist who left the U.S. more than thirty years ago. She is now the codirector of the United African Alliance Community Center in Tanzania in East Africa.

A new weekly TV column – so stay tuned.

BY MONICA GUBERMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

November has unexpectedly been a busy month for the television industry. ABC has a new show called, "Day Break," that is going to fill in for "Lost" until February.

The new show is about a police detective who is on the run after he's framed for the murder of a prosecutor. The premise of "Day Break" is that he relives the same day over and over again. It's "The Fugitive" meets "Groundhog Day," except this fugitive's loved ones are in danger as well.

"Day Break" has met some mixed reviews, but hopes to catch some leftover ratings from the hit show "Lost."

"Day Break's" episodes air on Wednesdays at 9 p.m.

ABC is also adding a new show after Thanksgiving called, "The Big Day." This show deals with a couple's wedding day and follows everything that goes wrong. It sounds like it would be funny; however, the entire season takes place over the course of a day similar to that of the popular show "24." This is set to premiere on Nov. 28, but as of right now fans seem less than thrilled to see this show.

ABC isn't the only network trying something new. CBS is adding a new show called, "3 LBS." This show has had some buzz already all over the Internet as medical shows are starting to dominate the airwaves. This show is to replace "Smith" on Tuesdays.

"3 Lbs." follows the explorations of a top New York neurosurgeon and his highly skilled protege as they explore the intricacies of the human brain. This medical drama follows the pair as they perform surgeries and care for their patients' needs. This show is similar to that of "ER" and "Grey's Anatomy," which are alive and well on popular television.

The new CW network has not seen decent ratings and, as a consequence, may now bring back "Reba," which has been off the air. On Nov. 19, two new episodes will air back to in the hopes of pulling in viewers.

From mid-season comings and goings to what's playing this week – there are many shows that everyone should tune-in for.

Sunday, Nov. 19

"Extreme Makeover Home Edition" (ABC at 8:00 p.m.) – A home is renovated for the Koepkes in Wisconsin, who recently lost their father to cancer.

"Desperate Housewives" (ABC at 9:00 p.m.) – Lynette is intrigued by a mysterious new neighbor; Susan and Ian take their relationship up a notch; and Gaby trains beauty contestants. Rupert Cavanaugh: Ian Abercrombie. Gloria Hodge: Dixie Carter.

"TVGuide" (TVGuide at 9:00 p.m.) – The TVGuide channel is doing a special on Tom Cruise and Katie Holmes's wedding. They will be covering everything from the latest news to video footage outside the celebrities' home. If Cruise is involved it is definitely worth watching to mock.

"The E! True Hollywood Story of Friends" (E! at 8:00 p.m.) – ETH Story will take you behind the scenes on the show, "Friends," with tons of commentary and even some bloopers. Watch the never before seen footage.

Monday, Nov. 20

"Deal or No Deal" (WWLP at 8:00 p.m.) – See whose playing next for a chance to win $1 million.

"Prison Break" (Fox @ 8:00 p.m.) - Michael takes time out for a sad farewell with Mahone hot on his trail; C-Note suffers a loss when he ventures out in public; and Kellerman tries to cover up a missed opportunity.

"Not Your Average Channel Guide" (Travel Channel at 8:00 p.m.) – This is a new travel channel that takes viewers off the beaten path in different locations to get an overall view of the culture and a true experience of the location.

Tuesday, Nov. 21

"Gilmore Girls" (CW at 8:00 p.m.) – Lorelai and Chris arrange a dinner so they can tell their big news to Rory, who puts on a happy face for her dad but tells her mom she's angry. Elsewhere, Logan surprises Rory with a visit and an announcement that he's relocating to New York to start an Internet company; and Luke calls Lorelai when April becomes sick. Bobby: Vanessa Branch.

"Frontline" (WGBY at 9:00 p.m.) – "Living Old" is an earnest, and often sobering, look at the lives of people 85 and older, "the fastest-growing segment of the [U.S.] population," notes narrator Will Lyman. The episode addresses the expectation that, over the next 30 years, the total of those over 65 is expected to double and fears that, as geriatrician Jeffrey Farber says, "There's not really anyone trained to care for them." Also included: comments from seniors; case histories.

"American Music Awards" (ABC at 8:00 p.m.) – Jimmy Kimmel hosts the 34th annual gala honoring the music-buying public's favorite artists. Slated performers include Beyoncé; Josh Groban; Mary J. Blige; Dixie Chicks; Gwen Stefani; Nelly Furtado; Pussycat Dolls; Rascal Flatts; Snow Patrol; Tenacious D; and Carrie Underwood. Mariah Carey, Red Hot Chili Peppers, Nickelback and Black Eyed Peas lead the field with three nominations each. Presenters include Nicole Richie; Taye Diggs; Paris Hilton; Nickelback; Chingy; Vanessa Williams.

SOME MORE SHOWS TO LOOK OUT FOR THIS MONTH:

Wednesday Nov. 22

"America's Next Top Model" (CW at 8:00 p.m.)
"One Tree Hill" (CW at 9:00 p.m.)
"Show Me the Money" (ABC at 8:00 p.m.)
"Day Break" (ABC at 9:00 p.m.)

Thursday Nov. 23

"Ugly Betty" (ABC at 8:00 p.m.)
"Grey's Anatomy" (ABC at 9:00 p.m.)
"Comic Relief" (HBO at 9:00 p.m.)

Friday Nov. 24

"What Not To Wear" (TLC at 8:00 p.m.)
"Everest Beyond The Limit" (Discovery at 8:00 p.m.)
"Close to Home" (CBS at 9:00 p.m.)

Saturday Nov. 25

"CSI" (CBS at 9:00 p.m.) - Repeat
"Dateline NBC" (WWLP at 8:00 p.m.)
"Karaoke Superstars" (Lifetime at 8:00 p.m.)

Kazakhs living in U.S. talk about 'Borat'

BY MONICA ENG
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

The mock documentary, "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan" has caused some controversy.

CHICAGO — The successful and controversial movie "Borat" has been deemed offensive to both the people of Kazakhstan and to the people of Middle America.

But what about Kazakhs living in Middle America?

We took Kazakh grad students Zhandos Yessenbayev, 25, and Abzal Daribayev, 25, to a screening of the new movie to see what they thought. (Yessenbayev is a PhD candidate in computer science at the University of Chicago, and Daribayev is a PhD candidate in molecular biology at the University of Illinois at Chicago.)

Despite their studies, both academics are well aware of the movie (a mock documentary about Borat's journey to America; the film's full title is "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan").

"I've been here for a year," Daribayev said, "and each time I introduce myself to a colleague and say where I'm from they say, 'Oh, Kazakhstan, right. Borat.'"

After the screening, we discussed the film over cups of hot tea at a local cafe. Answers and questions were given in both Russian and English. The following is an edited and translated transcript:

CHICAGO TRIBUNE: So cultural representations aside, how would you rate "Borat" as a comedy?

ABZAL DARIBAYEV: I would give it two stars.

ZHANDOS YESSENBAYEV: I would give it less. I smiled only two or three times. I didn't understand a lot of the jokes. I don't think it was Kazakh humor.

How would you rate it as a representation of your country?

ZY: There was no representation of Kazakhstan except for the name and the flag.

AD: Even the (the village) was like from somewhere in the Caucasus, maybe Georgia. (Actually it was shot in Romania.)

At the end, Borat tries to kidnap Pamela Anderson to be his bride. Don't Kazakhs sometimes kidnap brides?

AD: Yes, it still happens occasionally in our country – mostly in the south, never in the north – but not like that. These days it is arranged beforehand. If a boy likes a girl but he and his family does not have enough money to pay the bride price, the boy will "kidnap" her, but she will know. Then after some time when the parents are waiting for her to come home, some relatives of the husband will go to the parents' house and say, "Sorry, your daughter was kidnapped by our relative but we are bringing small presents to you and it is her destiny or something like that."

We have a joke that if you are the relative who has to tell the girl's family, you may be beaten. But it is not done like he did with Pamela Anderson in the movie.

Is Anderson famous in your country?

AD: Yes, we have "Baywatch" and so many people like Pamela Anderson but everyone has his own taste.

You said you laughed a few times. When?

ZY: I liked the scene when he was singing the (fake Kazakh) national anthem at the rodeo. He started by praising America and the war ("of terror" as Borat says). He says that George Bush should "drink the blood of Iraqis," and the American people there (in the movie) liked that and clapped for him. Because most people in Kazakhstan don't agree with the war, they would find that funny. But as soon as he started singing the (Kazakh) anthem about the greatness of another country, the crowd turned on him. Watching that transformation on their faces was very interesting. I like that kind of dark, black humor.

There also was that part when he thought the elevator was his hotel room. That is the kind of humor that would be funny in any country.

What about the scene where the two nude guys wrestle each other throughout the hotel? Was that funny?

ZY: I couldn't even look at that part. It was too vulgar. You have to know where the limits are and it crossed those limits.

AD: I agree.

So obviously, the film isn't going to teach anyone about Kazakh culture. Does it teach anything?

ZY: Yes, actually, I think he opens up an America that you don't see very often and gets things out of people that they wouldn't normally talk about. It shows it as a very diverse country just as we are in Kazakhstan.

Part of the film was to show a strange side of the U.S. It pretended to show how these foreign (Kazakh) people live, but it is really about how real Americans live. It's a good idea because there is this concept out there of how Americans live and then you have this film that shows these representations of American life that aren't like that.

Some Kazakh citizens are offended by the film's humorous yet outrageous depiction of the nation of Kazakhstan, and its people. Some Americans also feel that the film gives a false representation of the U.S., as "Borat" depicts U.S. citizens as ignorant and unsympathetic to foreign peoples.

[UMass] blitzed and we knew we had it all day," Whitcomb said. "Nobody dominates them, but we did enough.

"Coach [Cosgrove] came up with a great game plan and we kicked their butt," he added. "He knew them inside and out. I watched a lot of film. We had it. We had it."

The emotional Whitcomb saw his four-year career basically come to an end on Saturday. Whitcomb, while his team didn't put up tremendous points, was stellar in the passing game and even better in the running game.

He threw an efficient 21-for-30 for 183 yards, and rushed 15 times for 68 yards and the biggest touchdown of the game. Those aren't numbers that you usually see from a guy lining up against UMass. But Whitcomb, especially on the final drive, slowly and methodically moved his team down the field.

With 6:41 left in the fourth, Whitcomb began his dissection. A 14-yard pass to Manzi Pierre put Maine at the UMass 37, then the Maine quarterback used his legs. The Black Bears used five wideouts to get the Minutemen's defense out of their blitz package, leaving holes up the middle because the linebackers and the safeties were in coverage.

Maine used a series of draws on the ensuing plays, and Whitcomb ran for six and seven yards, putting his team down at the UMass 24. Maine was charged with a holding penalty on the play, but that was offset by a personal foul by UMass corner Tracy Belton, which moved Maine down to the 22.

Whitcomb rushed three more times, one for the touchdown, to put the ball in the end zone and move Maine within one point.

Then it was the biggest play of the game. Both teams lined up for the extra point. Maine snapped the ball and the holder bounced to the outside looking for a hole in the defense. There were none, and the Minutemen wrapped him up.

Game over. With 1:44 left in the game and Maine down one, that would've been it. But there was a flag on the play. False start on the offense. Maine got another shot at it. The referee is supposed to blow the play dead in that situation, but either nobody heard the whistle or the whistle never came.

Everyone was confused, but they lined up again, five yards further back this time. They snapped the ball again, the ball went down, and the kick went up and wide.

That was the game. No flag. No false start. Just a sequence of events for the Maine guys to think about for a long time.

"I disrupted the chemistry of the whole operation on that thing," Maine coach Jack Cosgrove said. "UMass is a hell of a team and you have to try something. You have to have guts and courage during the course of the football game.

"I thought we went toe-to-toe with a great football team today and I thought we just didn't finish some things off offensively," he added. "I thought we could've put some more points on the board. We're probably going to look back at that as some opportunities we could've cashed in on."

"It hurts a lot to come up short like that, especially against a great team like UMass," cornerback Mike King said. "The team has to keep their heads up. I'm very proud of these guys and we just have to keep our head up and get ready for next week."

For the Minutemen, this was the closest it's been. With a win against Hofstra at home next weekend, the Minutemen could have at least two home games for the playoffs, and may have a legitimate shot at a national championship.

They played another great game on Saturday, and it was one of the most physical games of the A-10 season. But luck had a lot to do with the final result.

I guess you have to have luck every once in a while if you want to be the best.

Freeman, Life bury Dartmouth early

Life buried a three-pointer 17 seconds into the contest, followed by another just over a minute later. He finished the game with 17 points, and went 5-for-7 from behind the arc.

Freeman showed his dominance early on as well, scoring 15 of his game-high 25 points in the first half. He also had 10 rebounds on the night, giving him his 31st career double-double.

Freshman point guard Tiki Mayben notched a double-double as well in his first official collegiate game. Mayben had 12 points and 11 assists, making him the first UMass player to tally 10 or more assists since Maurice Maxwell had 10 helpers in the 2004-05 season.

The Minutemen ended the first half on a 20-5 run when Mayben made one of his many no-look passes to junior forward Gary Forbes for an easy basket. UMass held a 52-29 lead at the half.

"It helped us a lot going into the second half because we started the first half pretty good, but we started to let [Dartmouth] back into the game," Forbes said on ending the first half strong. "Our intensity was lacking, and getting out on the break and making defensive stops helped us going into the second half to make it a bigger lead."

Forbes finished the game with 17 points and six rebounds in his first game with the Minutemen after transferring from Virginia last year.

"We're going to celebrate tonight, and take it for what it's worth, but we have to move on," Forbes said. "It was a game that we were supposed to win, and it was a game that we were supposed to win big, so we have to move on."

UMass hits the road for three games in Pittsburgh next weekend in the Colonial Classic. The Minutemen face Oakland on Friday, No. 5 Pittsburgh on Saturday and Northeastern on Sunday. Their next home game will be on Nov. 22 at 7 p.m. against St. Francis.

Newcomers play big role in season opener

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts men's basketball team played its first regular season game on Saturday against Dartmouth.

Piece of cake. The Minutemen rolled over the Ivy League bottom-feeder, pulling away in the middle of the first half. It was another game in a long season for most of these guys.

But for the transfers who hadn't played in a game that mattered in over a year, it was the biggest it's been for a long time.

Tiki Mayben, Gary Forbes and Luke Bonner got significant minutes on Saturday. Mayben sat out last season for academic reasons and played well at the point for the Minutemen in their first game of the season.

Bonner, the big man transfer from West Virginia, subbed into the game at the 13:25 mark of the first half. Both Mayben and Gary Forbes started for UMass. Mayben replaced suspended point guard Chris Lowe, and Forbes is an offensive weapon who transferred from Virginia last season.

All of them took a while to get going on Saturday. Forbes turned the ball over several times in the first half, including getting stripped trying to penetrate Dartmouth's 2-3 zone at the 8:29 mark. Forbes, who UMass coach Travis Ford said would play some point guard this season, guarded Dartmouth's point guard during UMass' full-court press in the early going.

By the end of the first half, Forbes, Mayben and Bonner started to get into their rhythm. With just over a minute left in the first frame, Mayben did a little shake-and-bake at the top of the key and found Forbes wide open underneath the basket after he had lost his man with a backdoor cut.

"I felt good," Mayben said. "Everybody knows what I've been through. My nerves are really gone. Playing with him I got nothing to be nervous about. It just made me feel good. Coming from high school I passed a lot and I got a lot of assists. I know that if I pass those guys are going to put it in the hole. It just feels real good right now."

"Tiki was good this game," Ford said. "I'll take 11 assists and three turnovers any day from my point guard. I like the way he ran the team. Tiki is a young man who is a freshman who did not play basketball last year. He is going to have his ups and downs but tonight he was very good.

"Three turnovers in 31 minutes, I'll take from a guy who controls the ball like he does," Ford added. "He's got to get better with his defense and containing his man a little bit. Thirty-one minutes is a lot. I'll be glad to have Chris Lowe back."

Mayben handled the ball a lot during the course of the game, and has had a problem in the preseason with turnovers like Lowe last season. Forty seconds into the second half, Mayben penetrated into the paint and left his feet without knowing what he was going to do with the ball – a cardinal sin in basketball. He threw the ball out of bounds trying to find freshman Ricky Harris on a backdoor cut.

"The only thing he has to switch is the turnovers," senior captain Rashaun Freeman said. "He can do a lot better than he did today. That's how much confidence I have in him. He's still got to get comfortable. Three games in, he'll really be able to help out the team a lot."

Ford said before the season that it takes transfers a half a season to get back into a solid rhythm, so the Mullins Center faithful might not see the real Mayben, Forbes, and Bonner until midseason.

Forbes, for all of his scoring ability, doesn't have a scorers' game. He lets the game come to him and doesn't force anything, which limits his turnovers. He is unselfish and rotates the ball without hesitation. Last night, he didn't score his first basket until he slammed home a rebound in the middle of the first half.

"I was picking and choosing little spots, I didn't want to force anything," Forbes said. "After my first put-back the nerves went away and everything pretty much fell into place. We practice so hard and so much that games are easy. Practices are different. It's going to pay off throughout the season and towards the end of the season."

Forbes finished the game with 17 points on 8-for-11 shooting in 29 minutes.

Bonner came into the game at the 13:25 mark of the first half and displayed his shooting touch, going 6-for-6 from the free-throw line in 16 minutes of play. He took one three-pointer on the night, after the Minutemen had established a big lead.

UMass won 98-61 and will face much stiffer competition than Dartmouth, the Ivy League's punching bag. But seeing 98 points on the board must be nice after last season's poor offensive output. Forbes, Mayben and Bonner already have helped in that department.

With a lot of commotion in front of Quick, Northeastern's Ryan Ginand got a shot off that deflected off the left post, ricocheted across the crease and kissed off the right post. Ginand thought the puck crossed the line, but the net was dislodged from its moorings and play was whistled dead.

"They caught a big post there at the end," Quick said. "I lost track of where the puck was and thankfully the other pipe came off [its mooring] and they blew the whistle."

Huskies coach Greg Cronin said he also thought the puck hit the padding in net, but the referee determined it hadn't. He pulled his goalie while on the power play with just over a minute left in the game. But the Huskies couldn't tie the score with the six-on-four advantage.

Northeastern got on the board first, just 20 seconds into the second period. On the power play, Mike Morris ripped a shot from between the face off circles that beat Quick.

After the goal, Quick said he felt the team woke up and was determined to strike back.

"It's never good to let up a goal, but I think that the way the team responded was excellent," he said.

Four minutes later, Matheson tied the game at one apiece with his second goal this season. Quick sent the puck to Scott Crowder who brought it all the way into the offensive zone. He slid the puck across the crease to where Matheson was waiting at the far post. The senior one-timed the puck in to tie the game.

Mass Attack proves to be first place team

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After defeating Northeastern on Friday, the Massachusetts hockey team finds itself in an unfamiliar position. With a 4-1 record in Hockey East, the Mass Attack has fought its way into first place in the conference, a point ahead of Maine and Boston University.

The Minutemen are off to a much better start this year. At 5-1-1, UMass is worlds away from the 1-5 mark that kicked off last season.

"It's certainly better than last season," said goaltender Jon Quick. "I'm excited about the team. I think we have the potential to do big things this season. As long as we stay focused and play one game at a time, I think that we can do a lot this year."

It wasn't until Dec. 6 against Merrimack last year that the Mass Attack earned its fifth win of the season in the 13th game of 2005-06. Seven games into the 2006-07 campaign, this new group of skaters hit five wins in half the time.

"I think that we're a faster, stronger team so far this season, and I think it contributes to how hard we worked before the season," said sophomore right-winger Chris Davis. "From day one, we've been working hard, and I think it's paying off."

UMass coach Don Cahoon chimed in after his players spoke, ensuring that his team would not get too excited by all the conversation about first place.

"And I need to remind everyone that we're only one-fifth of the [way] through the regular season," Cahoon said. "So we've got four-fifths of the season to go, and everybody knows that. It's a nice start and that's all it is. We've got a lot of good hockey ahead of us."

The top spot in Hockey East has changed hands nearly every week, and upsets have not been scarce. Cahoon made it known he was aware of those facts Friday.

"Merrimack, as an example, they've struggled out of the gate, and we're going to play them just liked we played Northeastern tonight," Cahoon said. "If you're smart about things, you're not looking at records because these teams are all capable of beating one another."

Merrimack is in ninth place in the conference, with its lone Hockey East victory coming against eighth-place Providence. However, those same Friars pulled off a big upset two weeks ago against Boston College, showing how close the first- and last-place teams are.

"It's proven over and over again that the league has just got great balance, and the parity is terrific," Cahoon said. "The difference between the teams that get it done and don't get it done is very small."

Despite trying to keep a level head about the numbers, Cahoon recognized the significance of jumping ahead of the pack early on.

"It's a nice place to be, and we'd like to stay there," Cahoon said. "We're going to work to try to stay there, but there's a lot of hockey to be played."

UMass also has a shot to break into the USCHO.com/CSTV Top 20 poll when the new rankings are released this week. The Minutemen entered the weekend nine votes shy of earning the 20th spot, but with another win, they may earn their first national ranking this season.

However, Cahoon only reiterated his comments from last week, explaining that the rankings are superficial at this point in the season.

"I think what's good about [being ranked] is it brings some attention to the program," Cahoon said. "It brings some attention to these kids that work so hard, and it's great from a recruiting standpoint. Other than that, there's only one poll that matters, and that's the final poll."

UM gets first win in last 10 road openers

momentum came right back to our side, and then all of a sudden she hits another one."

"She can stick it from deep range," Dacko said. "She's a gutsy and fearless player. Her size is not a detriment and she can step up and hit the big one, and that's what she did."

The 5-foot-5 backup point guard showed little fear in her first collegiate game.

"It was nerve-racking but after the first half I calmed down," Benton said. "When I got rid of the jitters I was able to pick up my game. I just went in there and Kate passed me the ball and I hit the shots."

Benton was quick to point to co-captain Mills in the 12-point triumph.

"Kate is our captain and leader," she said. "We look for her every night to help us, and she did a great job tonight."

"You know what, she's talented," Dacko said about Mills. "We got the ball inside and she found a way to score and did a great job on the glass the whole game. I'd like her to take 20 shots a game. I tell my kids that she's the black hole, when the ball goes in to her, it doesn't come out."

Not lost in the praise was Rosario.

"She wears her heart on her sleeve," Dacko said. "She's gutsy, she fills the lanes and she'll dive on balls. She's a gamer that came to play tonight, and is going to get better and better. Our team feeds off her energy."

"Pam does everything for us," added Mills. "She gets physical with the other team, gets the loose balls, penetrates and does it on a consistent basis. Her tenacity is great for us."

The opening victory for the Minutewomen – their first win in the last 10 road openers – came despite the Tatham sisters, Alisha and Tamara, not being much of a factor. Tamara struggled throughout, scoring just two points and committing six turnovers. She fouled out late in the game, but did manage to grab nine rebounds. Alisha sat out the entire second half for medical reasons, but is expected to be fine.

"Alisha's pulse started to speed up in the first half," Dacko said. "The doctors checked her out and decided she shouldn't play the second half."

Sophomore guard Stephanie Gerardot started the second half in her place, scoring four points.

The teamwork out on the court was both evident in person and in the stat sheet, as UMass recorded an assist on all but one of its 17 field goals. Dacko loved the unselfishness with the ball and the effort on the defensive end her players exhibited.

"I applaud my team for being able to execute with Tamara having a sub-par game and Alisha not being in the game," she said. "Winning on the road was huge. We're a work in progress. But any way we can get a win, I'll take it."

"This win gives us a lot of confidence, Rosario said. "Winning our first game on the road says something about us as a team. We came out with a lot of intensity tonight, and it's something we'll have to keep going at teams with."

Rosanio and Mills carry load

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

The brisk Vermont air forced basketball fans to herd quickly inside the Patrick Gymnasium on Friday as Massachusetts juniors Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills heated up the court with their red-hot performances.

Rosanio and Mills, a guard and forward, respectively, each registered 19 points in UMass' 60-48 victory over Vermont.

"I'm thrilled because I think there was a monkey off their backs," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "It's proof that they have the capabilities of carrying this team, and they did it tonight without the services of [junior guard/forward] Alisha [Tatham]. They did a nice job."

Rosanio was 5-for-10 from the field and sank nine out of 12 free throws.

"It feels so good. I'm just glad to get it going. I'm glad we started off on a good note. It's the best feeling right now," Rosanio said after the game. "I'm pumped. The adrenaline definitely kicked in. It was a physical game."

Physical may have been an understatement in describing how she played against the Catamounts. The 5-foot-10 Pennsylvania native flew around the court diving after loose balls and fighting for rebounds, and spent much of her 38 minutes of playing time on the floor. But her coach says that isn't anything unusual for her, it's the way she plays every single game.

"She wears her heart on her sleeve. She's gutsy, she fills the lane, she'll dive on balls and she came to play," Dacko said about Rosanio. "She can just give you that energy. She's a winner."

Dacko added that Rosanio showed a vast improvement from the exhibition game against Bishop's University on Nov. 4.

"[She had a] horrible performance in the exhibition game," Dacko commented. "When she first came out [last week] she reverted back to her old tricks of putting her head down and not seeing anything and kind of burrowing like a groundhog does, and now she kept her head up and moved the ball."

Rosanio was the team's leading scorer last season, averaging 12.5 points per game for a total of 350, and Dacko selected her as one of the top two or three players to look for this year.

Mills went 7-for-12 from the field while draining five of her six free throws.

"It feels great. It's a great confidence thing for me," Mills said. "I'm so proud of our team. We were able to come in and, for the most part, stay composed and pull off this victory. I guess it just kind of happens. Our goal this year is to have an inside-outside game, so I know I'll be getting a lot of touches. Our outside people hit so many big shots and that just opened it right up for me."

Mills played 31 minutes, recording 13 total rebounds and blocking three Vermont shots. But she knows that she wouldn't have been able to do it without a little help from her friends.

"It was definitely because of the rest of the team that I was able to come out and do that. If they can keep hitting outside shots, then we're going to go far this year," Mills said.

Mills was UMass' runner-up in points scored last year, averaging 12.4 a game and finishing her sophomore year with a total of 346.

As for tallying the exact same number of points on Friday as one of her classmates, she said that it was a nice feeling.

"It's great that we were both able to get that," Mills said. "But at the same time, we know it could be anybody else in any other given game."

The Minutewomen's next game is their home opener at the Mullins Center against New Hampshire on Tuesday. The game is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m.

Junior Pam Rosanio had 19 points and nine rebounds in UMass' 60-48 season-opening win over Vermont on Friday night.

UMass gets another split decision at BU

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

The last dual meet that both the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams competed in produced a split decision. The Minutewomen (2-2) defeated the Army Black Knights, and the Minutemen (2-1) fell in a close contest.

On Saturday, when both teams visited Boston University, the product, once again, was a split decision. This time, however, the roles were reversed.

UMass heads back to Boston next Friday, Saturday and Sunday for the Boston University Invitational.

The Minutemen (2-1) triumphed over the Terriers 127.5-97.5, with strong performances from UMass coach Russ Yarworth's underclassmen spearheading the Maroon and White's assault.

"I was really impressed by how hard the team came out," Yarworth said. "We trained really hard the last week and for them to swim like they did was really impressive."

Freshman Kevin Cabriales won the 50-yard freestyle event – coming in at 22.25 seconds and scoring nine points for UMass. The Minutemen took the top four spots in this event – the second- and third-place finishes of senior A.J. Vozella and freshman Christopher Howard tallied four and three points, respectively.

"Our sprinters looked really good," Yarworth said. "They swam really well, I was a little surprised. It was a real fast swim for them."

Rookies Andrew Willbrandt and Justin Brooks won events for the Minutemen as well.

Willbrandt won the 200-yard backstroke for UMass – he finished the race in 1:58.41. This was just ahead of fellow freshman Trevor Ziegler who came in at 1:59.36.

"Andrew's been good in training," Yarworth said. "We've been trying to get him to be more aggressive in the race."

Senior Evan Swisher typically swims the 200-yard backstroke for UMass. However, BU's backstroke unit isn't particularly strong. Even without Swisher, the Minutemen finished in the event's first three positions.

Brooks tied in the 1,000-yard heat with BU's Ben Kaiser. They both hit the final wall at 10:03.7, and received 6.5 points each for their efforts. Brooks took third place in the 500-yard freestyle event – scoring three points for UMass.

"With Justin, we worked on something specific for him to do in the 1,000," Yarworth said. "We want him to take it down a little easier and then bring it back for the second half. He did a really nice job of doing that [on Saturday]."

The surprise of the day came on the diving board. Boston University's Brian Lawler defeated UMass junior R.J. Rappe in the one-meter event – this was Rappe's first defeat of the season. Rappe's total of 285.55 is certainly nothing to be angry over, but Lawler's score of 294 bested Rappe.

Rappe suffered an undisclosed injury recently. He and UMass coach Mandy Hixon believed he could continue to dive, however, he most likely will not see action in the near future.

BU rolled to a 133-110 victory over the Minutewomen.

Perhaps an even bigger surprise than Rappe's loss came in the women's diving competition. Sophomore Karen Upperco fell for the first time this season as well. Upperco had been undefeated entering Saturday. In the one-meter event, she finished just fourth while taking second on the three-meter panel.

The Terrier women's swimmer got off to a torrid start, and BU won five of the first seven events. Only senior Liz Lovejoy and junior Allison Volpe could knock off their Terrier counterparts early on.

Volpe's performance in the 50-yard freestyle was her best showing of the year so far, according to UMass coach Bob Newcomb. She also finished second behind freshman Kathryne Chalikis in the 100-yard freestyle.

"[Volpe] came in second in the 100 at 54.8 which is a great time for her," Newcomb said. "Freshman Kat Chalikis impressed me a lot winning the event."

The Minutewomen had been training very hard since their loss to Central Connecticut last week, and their struggles were most likely due to fatigue. However, the main goal of Newcomb is to have his squad in peak physical condition for the Atlantic 10 Championships in February.

That is not say these meets are meaningless, but a loss in a head-to-head meet is nowhere near as devastating as it is in other sports.

"Wins and losses are not really the focus right now," Newcomb said. "We have to look at where the team is, and I think we're in good shape right now."

Cross country teams improve

By Steve Games
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts cross country teams competed on Saturday at the NCAA Division I Northeast Regional Qualifier in New York's Van Cortlandt Park. The race featured over 38 schools from all over the northeast region. The Minutemen finished 14th, a slight improvement from last year's 17th-place finish. The Minutewomen placed 21st, which is just nine places better than last year's 30th overall finish.

UMass will be back in New York next week for the IC4A Championships. The men will start at 10:30 a.m., and the women will follow at 11:15 a.m.

In the men's race, Iona College took three places in the top 10 in a field of 220 competitors.

The Minutemen finished with a score of 418. New Hampshire finished ahead of them by 63 points with a total of 355.

Leading the way for the Minutemen was sophomore Jesse Regnier and junior Nils Fischer. The two leaders have finished first and second for the team in every race they have ran together. Regnier placed first for the team and 54th overall with a time of 33:22.2. Five spots behind him, Nils Fischer placed 59th (33:27.5).

For Durkin, this is the fourth time this season he has placed fourth or better for the team. Durkin is running in his third season at UMass, and has built himself into a better distance runner.

"[Durkin] is one of those guys who was a good runner in high school but may be a runner who was just behind the scenes compared to the better known runners in the state of Massachusetts," UMass coach Ken O'Brien said. "When he was in high school I wouldn't say he was a pure distance runner, he was more of a middle distance [runner].

"It's kind of taken him a year or two to put together some of the training necessary to compete successfully at the longer events like five miles," O'Brien said. "His best events were the 1,000-meters and the 1,500-meters, but he really set his sites on doing that because he really loved being part of a good team. He realized he had the potential, but he had to go through a process of physical development and also learning how to run a race that was longer than the one in high school."

Freshman Andrew McCann rounded out the top five with a 110th-place finish (34:32.7).

The Minutewomen took a step forward this week and finished with 571 points, 24 points behind the University of Albany. Boston College won the race with four runners finishing within the top 20.

Junior Christina DeRosa continues to solidify the top spot for the Minutewomen. DeRosa has made 21 consecutive first-place finishes for the team. She placed 46th with a time of 22:46.7.

Sophomore Eilis Kierans finished second for the team at 109th (23:58.1). Eilis had not finished any higher than fourth for the team. Behind Eilis came her older sister, senior Cuisle Kierans at 115th (24:08.5).

Finishing out the top five for the Maroon and White was freshman Lauren Liuzzo at 149th (24:55.6) and junior Ashley Davidson at 155th (25:04.2).

UMass clinches A-10 North title

UMass players and coaches celebrate after their 10-9 victory over Maine on Saturday. The Minutemen clinched the Atlantic 10 North Division title with the win, and are now riding an eight-game winning streak.

Who says you never get a second chance? That's exactly what Maine received on Saturday when a failed two-point conversion try was nullified by a false-start penalty.

But the Black Bears didn't capitalize on the break, and saw their comeback attempt squashed by the Massachusetts football team (9-1, 7-0 Atlantic 10). They missed the subsequent extra-point attempt and weren't able to recover an onside kick.

The Minutemen downed the Black Bears by a score of 10-9, in front of 13,166 at McGuirk Alumni Stadium on Saturday. Up next for UMass is a shot at revenge over the Hofstra Pride this Saturday, the team that kept it out of last season's Division I-AA playoffs.

The game ended up deciding the winner of the Atlantic 10. Villanova defeated James Madison, effectively giving the automatic playoff berth to the Minutemen.

Maine (6-4, 5-2 A-10) controlled the clock for much of the afternoon. It broke off two 10-play drives, one that consisted of 11 plays and two more that were 13 plays. But the Black Bears didn't finish one with points until the fourth quarter.

"We weren't anticipating an artistic win, there were no style points for today," UMass coach Don Brown said. "They're very good on defense and they're very dynamic with their front four. We had some drops that kind of hurt us. Right at the same time you have to give credit to Maine."

Quarterback Ron Whitcomb and the Black Bears scored a field goal and a touchdown on their final drives of the afternoon. The three points capped a 13-play, 64-yard effort, while the touchdown came at the end of an 11-play, 51-yard drive.

The quarterback draw was open to Whitcomb almost all game long. He finished the day with 45 yards on 15 carries. He scored Maine's lone touchdown on a one-yard scamper that brought the score to 10-9.

"Looking to win the game, Maine coach Jack Cosgrove decided to go for the two, instead of trying to tie the game with a kick. UMass linebacker Jason Hatchell stormed up the middle and broke up the attempt, but a penalty on Matt Mulligan negated the play, and forced the Black Bears to try again from the 7-yard line.

"In terms of the last field goal, we just got pressure," senior safety James Ihedigbo said. "We got pressure and forced the kick wide left. Everyone has heard the saying defense wins championships. They had a good defense and we wanted

Missed extra point proves to be costly

A missed extra point? That's how it has to end?

Sixty minutes of blood and sweat between Maine and UMass ended with 1:44 left in the fourth, when Black Bears kicker Devin McNeill pulled an extra point wide of the uprights.

Elated Minutemen stormed off the field with a one-point lead and less than two minutes between them and the Atlantic 10 North title. All it took was a couple of runs and a kneel-down, and the championship belonged to UMass.

Every UMass win in the 2006 season was by the way of domination – the only exception being the New Hampshire Wildcats, who the Minutemen handled in the first half before Ricky Santos and company crawled back into the game.

On Saturday, the Minutemen, for once, didn't look like the Minutemen Maine quarterback Ron Whitcomb had his way with the usually stiff UMass defense, even though the Black Bears only put up nine points.

From a 10-0 run to start the game, to the former manager knocking down a jumper at the final buzzer, the Massachusetts men's basketball team looked like the squad that most predicted in Saturday night's 98-61 season-opening win over Dartmouth.

The Minutemen (1-0) put on an impressive showing in their first official game of the 2006-07 campaign, shooting 62 percent from the field and finishing the night with four players in double figures.

"What I'm most pleased about in this game is, and nothing against Dartmouth, we did what we were supposed to do, and that can't always be said," UMass coach Travis Ford mentioned after the win. "In the past four or five weeks at practice, I can't say that we've always done what we're supposed to do. But tonight, we were just bigger and stronger than they were in the posts, and our big guys really exploited that a lot. Our inside play really opened everything up for us."

UMass went on a 24-2 run in the second half to take an 89-51 lead, putting any chance of a Dartmouth comeback to rest.

"We have games that we're going to have to try to sneak by to get, and then we have games when we're just going to have to take care of them," Senior Rashaun Freeman said. "We have to leave everything out there, we can't take them lightly. We definitely didn't take this team lightly because every Division 1 team has talent, and they can all come and get you if you fall back on them."

UMass didn't fall back one bit. Freeman and senior James Life got the Minutemen on the board early and often, leading the charge for its 10-0 run in the first three minutes of the game

Davis' goal in third leads UM past NU

Whenever the Massachusetts hockey team and Northeastern meet on the ice, a hard fought game seems to follow. The Minutemen came out on top Friday night, 2-1, in the latest meeting of the two.

NU	1

UMass had Saturday night off, and next faces Connecticut on Saturday afternoon at the Mullins Center. The game is slated for a rare 4 p.m. start.

"We expected it wasn't an easy game. It was a hard fought team against a very determined team," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We didn't think going into the game that it would be a real pretty affair, with a lot of big time transition plays. But it would be something that we would need a strong will to get through it."

Sophomore Chris Davis pushed the winning goal across the goal line at 10:36 of the third period. With Mike Morris in the penalty box for Northeastern, and Matt Anderson sent off for hooking, the teams squared off in four-on-four action.

The puck was brought deep into the offensive zone by senior Mark Matheson. He then curled back toward the blue line and fed it to freshman Justin Braun, who was positioned at the point.

Davis positioned himself in front of Northeastern goalie, Brad Thiessen, in order to screen him, which was something the Minutemen talked about between periods. Braun unloaded a slap shot toward the net. The puck deflected off the goalie and trickled across the line.

It appeared that Braun had recorded his first career goal at UMass. But upon further review, Davis got his stick on the puck and redirected it past Thiessen.

"I went in front of the net and tried to screen the goalie – Justin shot it, I got a tip on the shot and it went in the net," Davis recalled.

It was the second such time that it appeared Braun recorded his first goal. On Oct. 26 at UNH, a similar scenario took place. Braun sent a slapper in on the Wildcats' net that was tipped in by Kevin Jarman.

Not long after Davis broke the 1-1 tie, the Minutemen had a scare of their own in front of goalie Jon Quick. In a game where one team had a flurry of shots, and the other brought the puck down with a flurry of their own, the Huskies were putting

Minutewomen start season on right foot

By Eli Rosenswaike

It wasn't pretty, but it was a win.

It was chilly outside of Vermont's Patrick Gymnasium on Friday night, but it was the ice-cold shooting of the Catamounts that helped propel the Massachusetts women's basketball team to a 60-48 victory in its season opener.

Juniors Pam Rosanio and Kate Mills led the Minutewomen (1-0) with 19 points apiece. Mills added a personal-best 13 rebounds for the fourth double-double of her career. Rosanio added nine rebounds of her own.

Vermont (0-1) hit its offensive stride at the outset, hitting two quick three-pointers to take an early 8-2 lead. The Catamounts maintained that lead – thanks to an abundance of UMass turnovers – up until the five minute mark in the first half, when the Minutewomen took the lead for the first time. It was a lead they would not relinquish.

The Maroon and White was able to overcome 25 turnovers and 18 Catamount offensive rebounds due in large part to the inept shooting of its opponent. Vermont finished 18-68 from the field, good for just 26.5 percent. UMass coach Marnie Dacko was ecstatic about her team's interior defense, but realized there is a lot of work to be done.

"I was really pleased with our defense," Dacko said. "I think we established ourselves in the first half and that was indicated by Vermont only having 18 points. But at the same time we have to work on our turnovers. That was our problem tonight. We set a goal of under 15 turnovers but if the team runs the fast break, I don't have a problem with that."

Dacko's game plan coming into the game was to pound the ball inside and make frequent trips to the foul line. They were able to execute precisely that, making 24 of 33 foul shots in the game. The discrepancy of made free throws – Vermont hit just 8-of-12 – was a big factor in the victory, as the Minutewomen actually made one less field goal than the Catamounts.

Trailing 14-9 midway through the first half, UMass held Vermont scoreless for a five-minute stretch and was able to score 11 unanswered points. It took that momentum into the locker room at halftime with a 22-18 lead.

The Minutewomen were able to quickly extend the lead to 31-20 in the second half, but the Catamounts countered with a quick run of their own, pulling within four at 33-29.

Enter freshman point guard Kim Benton.

With starting point guard Sakera Young on the bench briefly nursing her sore shoulder, Benton came in and put away the charging Catamounts for good with two consecutive three-pointers. Her first triple bested the shot clock and was from well beyond the arc.

"That was huge for us," Mills said. "[Vermont] just got the momentum and Kim came right in and hit a big three for us. The Study investigates impact of care for Alzheimer's patients

By Caitlin Quinn
Collegian Staff

An assistant professor and student in the psychology department at the University of Massachusetts are conducting a study investigating the impact of spousal caregiving for patients with Alzheimer's disease on marital relationships.

The study is being done by Rebecca Ready, an assistant professor of psychology, and Lindsay Miller, a senior honors psychology student.

The research is funded by the Commonwealth College Honors Research Grant from the University.

Ready and Miller are seeking participants for this study from the Hampshire and Hamden counties, who will be asked to take part in a pre-screening to determine their eligibility.

In order to participate, people must have a spouse who has been diagnosed with Alzheimer's disease and who lives at home with them, and they must be the primary caregiver to that spouse. They must have provided care for at least one year and be at least 65 years old.

The study will determine the effects on the relationship quality of the patient and the spouse. The patient's quality of life, the quality of care provided to the patient and how changes in the patient-caregiver relationship affect caregiver depression will be investigated.

"There have been caregiver studies done in the past. What's unique is that we're looking particularly on how the marital relationship changes," said Ready.

In a press release, Miller said although there is a lot of information available regarding Alzheimer's, there is little known about the effect it has on relationships.

"Since caregiving is an intensive task and many spouses assume the role of caregiver, it is important to gain a better understanding of the caregiver experience for this particular population," said Miller.

Miller was inspired to do this study from personal experience. Her grandfather was a "devoted" caregiver to Miller's grandmother, who suffered from multiple sclerosis.

"I just want to know what it's like to be a caregiver," she said.

Alzheimer's is the fourth leading cause of death among adults, and an estimated 4 million Americans have Alzheimer's disease, of which 140,000 are from Massachusetts, according to the Web site of the Massachusetts chapter of the Alzheimer's Association. By 2050, those numbers could reach 14 million nationally, with 350,000 cases in Massachusetts.

More than 70 percent of Alzheimer's patients live at home, and 75 percent of the care given at home is by friends or family, according to the Web site. The average primary caregiver of an Alzheimer's patient living at home is a person between 70 and 80 years old with two chronic health problems.

The desired result of the research is to learn how to provide education and support to spousal caregivers of Alzheimer's patients. Miller anticipates finding from the study that "if the relationship is of a higher quality before the illness, it will remain a higher quality."

Former UMass president receives pension increase after court ruling

Bulger resigned as president of UMass in September 2003, after allegations of not cooperating fully in the search for his "fugitive" brother.

By Chris Hynes
Collegian Staff

Former University of Massachusetts president William Bulger received a $17,000 increase to his annual pension last Thursday after a ruling by the state's highest court.

Bulger's annual pension increased from $179,000 to $196,000, according a November story by the Associated Press.

The court determined that Bulger's housing allowance should be counted as compensation.

"The trustee's decision to have Mr. Bulger's compensation package include a housing allowance was upheld by the court," said Bulger's lawyer Thomas Kiley in a telephone interview yesterday. "And that's as it should be – the statute is unambiguous that such a payment should be included in the pension package."

In September 2003, Bulger resigned as president of UMass after amplified pressure from Gov. Mitt Romney and Attorney General Thomas Reilly. The pair alleged that Bulger hadn't cooperated with the authorities to the best of his abilities in the hunt for his "fugitive mobster brother, James "Whitey" Bulger," according to the Associated Press.

The Bulger name is familiar in the Commonwealth. Before his seven-year term as president of UMass, Bulger presided over the state Senate for 17 years. Bulger is also a past president of the Boston Public Library Board of Trustees, as well as a former member of the Massachusetts General Hospital Board of Trustees and the Boston Museum of Fine Arts Board of Trustees and Citizens Bank of Massachusetts Board of Directors, according to the Boston Public Library's Web site.

"Whitey" Bulger is also known throughout Massachusetts, mostly for his criminal acts. He was the "one-time leader of the Winter Hill Gang – [and] a key figure in a long-running scandal over Boston FBI agents who protected their underworld informants," according to the Associated Press.

"Whitey" Bulger has been on the run for 10 years.

The state court originally ruled last November that William Bulger's pension should be cut at $76,000 "because annuity payments and a $20,000 annual housing allowance should be counted as compensation," according to the Associated Press.

Attorney General Tom Reilly later appealed the decision, believing the payments to be "perks" that would set a dangerous precedent for the public system if they were included when setting pension payments, the article said.

In a March 2006 Associated Press article, Reilly argued that the housing allowance was treated more as a reimbursement, similar to travel expenses, rather than compensation.

The two sides eventually settled upon the dispute with the $196,000 ruling.

"This case has always been about more than Bill Bulger, and we should be concerned about the dangerous precedent this may set for our pension system," according to a statement released by the Attorney General's office.

Woman acts as surrogate mother to baby gorillas

Primate nursery keepers at the Columbus Zoo and Aquarium teach young gorillas how to be babies while adult gorillas watch and learn their own roles.

COLUMBUS, Ohio (AP) — Barb Jones spends her days crawling through piles of straw with a 15-pound baby gorilla on her back, sometimes climbing up on platforms inside the cage. It's all part of being a surrogate mother to baby gorillas, but that doesn't mean it's easy work for the 68-year-old Jones, who's been doing it for 26 years.

"Now, I need a little help scaling the ropes," she said. "But I can't not do what they are going to do."

Jones, a primate nursery keeper at the Columbus Zoo and Aquarium, works to break the cycle of primates born in captivity who never learn how to care for their offspring.

She teaches the young gorillas how to be babies while adult gorillas watch and learn their own roles. The hope is that the babies will grow up to be better caregivers that can look after their own young.

Jones' most recent project was Umande, who came to Columbus from a Colorado Springs zoo where his mother rejected him. Other females at the zoo didn't want him either. Last week, 40-year-old Lulu took over his care after weeks of Jones and other workers tending to him.

Umande was clearly at home with his human mother, even falling asleep in her lap.

"He's like a little heating blanket," Jones said.

Jones, whose experience is in teaching, started her work at the zoo as a volunteer. In her many years of experience, she's never been injured, she said. She's also picked up a few tricks, such as coughing when the babies misbehave, because that's what adult gorillas do.

She points out that she doesn't do everything a gorilla mother would, such as using its teeth to trim the baby's fingernails and toenails.

"We use clippers," she said.

The world's first gorilla born in captivity was Colo, born at the Columbus Zoo in 1956. Back then, baby gorillas were snatched away from their mothers and reared in nurseries. Zookeepers thought they were protecting the babies from adult gorillas.

But zookeepers later learned that gorillas need to learn from one another, said Beth Armstrong, an anthropologist and former gorilla keeper at the Columbus Zoo.

Keepers imitating primate behavior at the zoo has helped decrease the time it takes for an infant gorilla to become part of a pack. The bond between Umande and Lulu took only a matter of weeks.

Congress prepares for lame-duck session

By Lauren Kellman
Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Lawmakers present and future mingled in the Capitol's marble hallways Monday as Republicans exiled from power in last week's elections glumly opened a lame-duck session and wide-eyed Democrats prepared to take control of Congress.

After losing majorities in the House and Senate last week, Republicans of the fading 109th Congress still faced weighty work before year's end, including keeping the government in operating funds and confirming a new defense secretary.

The news didn't get much better when the GOP opened the session Monday. House Republicans trying to give President Bush a gift for Vietnam ahead of his visit there Friday failed to pass a bill normalizing trade relations with the Hanoi government. The House was expected to vote again on the bill Wednesday.

So it goes in the twilight of the Republican Revolution.

Asked how he was doing as the House opened its first vote, outgoing Majority Leader John Boehner replied, "Lovely."

The session won't be as short as some might hope. Senate Majority Leader Bill Frist, who is considering a bid for the GOP presidential nomination in 2008, envisioned Congress meeting three more weeks this year, this one and the first two weeks of December.

Frist urged Republicans not to be discouraged by this "time of transition" and to listen to the voters who ousted them from power.

"Change can be tough," said Frist, R-Tenn., whose self-imposed 12-year term limit in the Senate comes to an end in seven weeks. "That is a very powerful message from the American people. Move forward and move forward together."

Bipartisanship was more a matter of pragmatism, noted Frist's successor.

"We can't accomplish anything as Democrats standing alone. As we've shown, the Republicans couldn't accomplish theirs standing alone," said Democratic Sen. Harry Reid of Nevada, who will become the new majority leader in January.

Returning lawmakers had company from more than 50 House members-to-be and most of the 16 senators-in-waiting. The incoming freshmen attended orientation meetings Monday and embarked on a host-of-the-town schedules – from private tours of the Capitol and the White House to dinner with Frist and a reception with Bush.

But it wasn't out with old, in with the new just yet.

A lame-duck session could last until Dec. 22 with a two-week break for Thanksgiving. On their agenda is nine spending bills, reviving popular business and middle-income tax breaks, bioterrorism legislation and giving doctors a reprieve from billions of dollars in scheduled Medicare payment cuts.

The Vietnam trade bill failed Monday to gain the two-thirds majority required to pass with-of-rough debate. House Republicans were expected to try again to pass the measure Wednesday, under rules that require only a simple majority for passage.

Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., is followed by reporters after giving an interview in the Canon House office building yesterday.

The Senate started work Monday on a spending bill for veterans and military construction, while the House took up the Vietnam trade bill ahead of Bush's

Bill Gates criticizes U.S. education system

Bill Gates, whose children attend private schools, said every state should require three or four years of math and science to graduate from high school.

By Donna Gordon Blankinship
Associated Press

SEATTLE — Microsoft Corp. Chairman Bill Gates said Monday that the U.S. lags behind other countries in the developed world but primary and secondary schools are failing to adequately prepare students for college.

In an interview with The Associated Press, Gates said the experience of being a parent of three kids – ages 10, 7 and 4 – has led him to spend more time thinking about schools.

Specifically, he said the U.S. education system needs higher standards, clear accountability, flexible personnel practices and innovation.

Gates, whose children are in private schools, said every state should require students to take three or four years of math and science to graduate from high school. "[S]tates currently have such requirements. He wants states to have the power to intervene at low-performing schools.

"Real accountability means more than having goals; it also means having clear consequences for not meeting the goals," he said in a speech earlier Monday to Washington state educators who came to hear the results of an education task force.

Gates said schools should also be able to pay the best teachers better and offer incentives to attract people with rare abilities.

"It's astonishing to me to have a system that doesn't allow us to pay more for someone with scarce abilities, that doesn't allow us to pay more to reward strong performance," he said. "That is tantamount to saying teacher talent and performance don't matter and that's basically saying students don't matter."

An Amherst resident contacted the police when his girlfriend smashed his red 1992 Ford vehicle with a baseball bat on Riverglade Drive. No arrests were made.

8:42 p.m.

A female party contacted police with concerns of identity theft when a male employee of Russell's Liquors at 18 Main St. wrote down her license information after he refused to serve her. The female had a Maine license that the employee believed to be a fake, and a Massachusetts address. Both parties were very cooperative with police and the piece of paper with her information written on it was disposed of.

A female resident reported to police that people came onto her property and urinated on her grill and front door. The suspects also taunted the woman about contacting police about previous and future noise complaints. The woman was alone with her children and was advised to keep her doors locked and call authorities again if the parties returned.

11:58 p.m.

A 19-year-old male from Garden City, NJ was summoned to court after police observed him with an open can of Busch Light on a bus at the PVTA bus stop outside the Townhouses. He also had a backpack full of Busch Light cans.

Saturday

1:26 a.m.

A 19-year-old Tewksbury resident was observed by police with a sealed can of Bud Light. Police found several more cans in his backpack. He was summoned to court for being a minor in possession of alcohol.

1:38 a.m.

A male Washington D.C. resident struck two slices of pizza out of another male's hands outside of Antonio's Pizza on North Pleasant Street. According to police, the aggressor continued being belligerent as his friends tried to remove him from the area. An officer advised him that it would be in his best interest to make restitution for the slices of pizza, to which he and his friends complied.

2:35 a.m.

Maxime Thelusma of 96 Annafran St. in Roslindale, Mass. was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and failure to stop or yield. Thelusma was pulled over by Amherst Police on North Pleasant Street and was arrested on a warrant issued by another agency.

1:03 p.m.

A resident of the Townhouses reported to police that his backpack, which was full of books, was stolen during a party held by his roommate on Friday night. Police found a similar backpack to the one the resident described filled with beer.

7:11 p.m.

A Clark House security guard contacted police after seeing a male passed out underneath bushes outside of the building. The man was breathing but unconscious.

8:03 p.m.

Police observed a vehicle traveling southbound on East Pleasant and Pray Street that veered over the fog line, nearly striking the curb and then took a wide left turn into the Post Office parking lot and stopped. The operator of the vehicle, who identified himself as a plain-clothes Amherst detective, said he was on his cell phone and was distracted. He was also advised that his back window, which was covered with plywood, was unsafe.

Yanah R. Halpern of 90 Waban Park in Newton, Mass. was arrested for unlawful noise and possession of a class D drug. Police say there was a party of approximately 150 people at his 36 South East St. residence, both inside and outside. According to police, partygoers were uncooperative and were told several times to leave the area. When the house was cleared out, police found a large bong on the kitchen counter.

1:38 a.m.

A male party suffered multiple lacerations when was hit in the face with a beer bottle during a party outside at the Townhouses. Police believe it was unintentional, as many people were throwing beer bottles in the air. The case is still under investigation.

1:56 a.m.

A 19-year-old Hull, Mass. resident was summoned to court for disorderly conduct and possessing unlawful fireworks at the Pufflon Village bus stop.

2:11 a.m.

A 20-year-old Ashland, Mass. resident and a 20-year-old Beverly, Mass. resident were observed by police smoking something in front of a bush on Hobart Lane. Police found a small pipe with a green substance consistent with marijuana and a small baggie containing marijuana during a search of the area. The two parties were summoned to court for possessing a class D drug.

2:42 a.m.

Nicholas Robert Mason of 33 Redford St. in Florence, Mass. was arrested for disorderly conduct and possessing an open container of alcohol. According to police, Mason refused to cooperate with police and was highly belligerent and intoxicated. He also threw a glass bottle against a parked vehicle.

4:21 p.m.

Residents of Puffon Village reported a robbery in their apartment. Five Xbox games, multiple DVDs, a backpack and about 20 beers were taken from the apartment.

7:52 p.m.

Simon A. Bousel of 187 Heatherstone Rd. in Amherst, Mass. was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license and for failure to inspect the vehicle. Bousel pulled over for having an out of date inspection sticker.

Jail officers fired after urging inmate to strip for pie

Union officials have challenged the firing of two officers for urging an inmate to strip for a piece of cherry pie, saying the punishment was too severe.

ADRIAN, Mich. — Two Lenawee County Jail officers have been fired after authorities say they urged an inmate to strip and run naked around his cellblock in exchange for a piece of cherry pie. "We took decisive action," Sheriff Larry Richardson told The Daily Telegram.

Richardson said firing of the officers — two of the jail's best employees — was recommended by the county's labor attorney. Richardson said he learned of the incident in a letter from another inmate.

The sheriff's department said Sunday that the names of the officers weren't being released.

Union officials have challenged the firings, saying the punishment was too severe. Union local president Deputy Michael Osborne said it's not normal procedure to fire such employees after a single incident.

Richardson said the officers considered it a prank. An investigation found that the male inmate who was urged to strip saw the two officers eating in August in the jail's glass-enclosed control tower and asked for some food.

The conversation turned to joking about what the inmate would do for cherry pie, the investigation found, and the inmate said he was willing to streak. Richardson said the inmate was allowed out of his cell and streaked.

No criminal charges will be brought, the Lenawee County prosecutor's office has ruled. Following that decision the department went ahead with internal disciplinary action, Richardson said.

"We had to be satisfied there was no criminal act," Richardson said.

Defeated Republican incumbents return to Washington after loss scheduled visit to the country Friday.

The atmosphere Monday echoed 1994, when Congress briefly returned after the GOP landslide to ratify a trade bill. Then, there were dozens of the "living dead" — Democratic lawmakers who lost re-election bids — who returned to Washington still smarting over their losses. There are at least 26 defeated Republican incumbents in that situation this year. Ten races, all in the House, are still undecided.

Away from the television lights, other drama emerged as the House speaker-to-be, Nancy Pelosi, D-Calif., prepared to take the reins of the House and Reid did the same in the Senate.

The behind-the-scenes agenda included leadership elections and jockeying for committee and subcommittee chairmanships in the next Congress, exposing divisions on both parties.

On the Democratic side, politicking is under way for party leadership elections scheduled for Thursday. Rep. John Murtha, D-Pa., a Marine Corps veteran and hawk on military issues who became the darling of the anti-war movement after calling for a U.S. pullout from Iraq, is running against Democratic Whip Steny Hoyer of Maryland to be majority leader.

Pelosi is backing longtime ally Murtha in the majority leader race. Hoyer is an old Pelosi rival dating back to a bitter 2001 leadership race.

House Republicans also face leadership contests, with three lawmakers hoping to succeed Speaker Dennis Hastert, R-Ill., as the GOP leader. Hastert said last week that he doesn't want to be minority leader.

Rep. Nancy Pelosi, D-Ca., in line to become Speaker of the House, spoke on Capitol Hill yesterday.

Boehner, R-Ohio, now No. 2 to Hastert, is favored to get the job, but he faces challenges from Mike Pence, an ambitious conservative from Indiana, and from Energy and Commerce Committee Chairman Joe Barton, a 12-term Texan mounting a long-shot bid.

U.N. releases global climate report

Rajendra K. Pachauri, the chairman of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change during an interview at his office at the U.N. in Nairobi, Kenya yesterday.

BY CHARLES J. HANLEY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NAIROBI, Kenya (AP) — A long-awaited report by an international scientific network will offer "much stronger" evidence of how man is changing Earth's climate, and should prompt reluctant governments into action against global warming, the group's chief scientist said Monday.

The upcoming, multi-volume U.N. assessment — on melting ice caps, rising seas and authoritative new data on how the world has warmed — may provide "just the right impetus to get the negotiations going in a more purposeful way," Rajendra K. Pachauri told The Associated Press midway through the annual two-week U.N. climate conference.

The Indian climatologist is chairman of the Intergovernmental Panel on Climate Change, a global network of some 2,000 scientists that regularly assesses research into how carbon dioxide and other heat-trapping gases produced by industry and other human activities are affecting climate.

In its pivotal Third Assessment in 2001, the panel concluded that most global warming — temperatures rose an average 1 degree in the past century — was likely the result of such manmade greenhouse gases.

In its Fourth Assessment, to be issued in installments beginning in February, "there's much stronger evidence now of human activity on the change in climate that's taken place," Pachauri said.

The 1997 Kyoto Protocol requires 35 industrialized nations to reduce their greenhouse emissions by 5 percent below 1990 levels by 2012. The United States and Australia are the only major industrial nations to reject Kyoto. President Bush contends such emissions cuts would harm the U.S. economy.

At the U.N. conference here, Kyoto parties are discussing what kind of timetables and quotas should follow that pact's expiration in 2012.

They also are weighing ways to draw the United States, the world's biggest carbon dioxide emitter, into a mandatory system of emissions caps. Many look toward the scientists' upcoming assessment for support.

"It's bound to have a major impact," Pachauri said.

He said the detailed document will offer significantly more evidence on sea-level rise, the melting of glaciers and the growing scarcity of water. He didn't discuss those details, since the Fourth Assessment Report is still in the draft stage. But it is likely to cite such recent research findings as:

World temperatures have risen to levels not seen in at least 12,000 years, propelled by rapid warming the past 30 years.

Greenland's ice mass has been melting at what NASA calls a "dramatic" rate of 41 cubic miles per year, far surpassing the gain of 14 cubic miles per year from snowfall.

The levels of oceans, expanding from warmth and from land-ice runoff, have risen at a rate of about 2 millimeters a year between 1961 and 2003, and by more than 3 millimeters a year in 1993-2003.

Pachauri said increasingly powerful supercomputers allow scientists to run more accurate models of future climate. The match between what the computer models have predicted and what is actually happening to the climate has become "much, much sharper," he said. This has allowed his panel to refine its range of scenarios for 21st-century climate.

In the 2001 assessment, the U.N. network projected temperatures in this century would rise between 2.5 and 10.4 degrees, depending on many factors, including whether governments move quickly to rein in emissions. In the upcoming report, "we probably have a narrowing of ranges," Pachauri said. "Some of the uncertainties are being reduced."

Further warmth of even 1 or 2 degrees would tend to shift climate zones, disrupting agriculture and ecosystems, and producing more extreme weather events, scientists say.

Pachauri credited the ever-deeper ice-core samples taken in Antarctica and Greenland for allowing scientists to look further back at ancient atmospheres. This "gives you a solid perspective on what human beings have done to Earth's climate," he said.

Citing growing public acceptance of the science of climate change, Pachauri indicated he believed the United States would eventually accept emissions caps. "Democratic governments will have to take into account the views of the public," he said.

U.S. commander meets Iraqi prime minister

BY STEVEN R. HURST
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — The U.S. Central Command chief confronted Iraq's prime minister on Monday over how Iraqi forces would halt raging violence and signaled a possible prelude to shifts in American policy on engaging Iran and Syria.

The meeting came as sectarian attacks killed at least 90 people throughout Iraq, 46 of them showing signs of torture. The U.S. military announced the deaths of four additional American soldiers.

Gen. John Abizaid, commander of all U.S. forces in the Middle East, sternly warned Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki that he must disband Shiite militias and give the United States proof that they were disarmed, according to senior Iraqi government officials with knowledge of what the two men discussed.

One of the militias, the Mahdi Army, is loyal to anti-American cleric Muqtada al-Sadr. On Monday night, U.S. forces raided the homes of al-Sadr's followers and U.S. jets fired rockets on their northwest Baghdad neighborhood of Shula, residents said. Police said five residents were killed, though a senior al-Sadr aide put the death toll at nine. The U.S. military said it had no comment.

In their meeting, Abizaid also asked the Iraqi leader to give the U.S. military a firm timetable for when Iraq's security forces could take full control of the country, the officials said on condition of anonymity because of the sensitive nature of the talks.

Al-Maliki has been pressing the U.S. to move more quickly to hand security affairs over to his army, claiming it could crush violence in the country within six months. On Monday, Abizaid asked the prime minister to give a detailed explanation of how he would do that. The top U.S. commander in Iraq, Gen. George Casey, recently said it would take 12 to 18 months before Iraqi security forces were ready to control the whole country with some U.S. backup.

The U.S. did not respond to requests for comment on Monday's meeting.

But a brief statement by the Iraqi government said Abizaid told al-Maliki he had come to "reaffirm President Bush's commitment" to success in this country. It also said the two discussed the "effect of neighboring countries on the security situation in Iraq," a clear reference to Iran and Syria.

That was particularly significant given that al-Maliki had said only a day earlier that he was ready to take "five steps" toward Syria if it took one in Iraq's direction.

After more than two decades of virtual estrangement between Damascus and Baghdad, the al-Maliki government has invited Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem to visit and he accepted, although no date had been set.

What's more, the American blue-ribbon bipartisan commission trying to devise a new course for the war in Iraq, which met with President Bush and other White House officials Monday, was widely expected to recommend that the administration engage Iraq's neighbors in a bid to tamp down violence.

The Iraq Study Group plans to announce its recommendations to Bush and Congress by year's end.

The reference to Iraq's neighbors coincided with a call by British Prime Minister Tony Blair for Iran and Syria to help stem bloodshed in Iraq and to join efforts to stabilize the Middle East.

In a major foreign policy speech Monday night, Blair warned there would be no incentives or concessions for doing so and that any failure to assist would lead to international isolation for the two countries.

Blair was to speak with the Iraq Study Group by video-link Tuesday. Britain has been the Bush administration's key ally in the Iraq war and has about 7,000 forces in the country.

The Syrian ambassador to Washington affirmed a readiness to work with the United States.

"We in Syria believe that engagement with the United States on Iraq can help a lot, because we believe that we need to stabilize the situation in Iraq and support the political process there," Imad Moustapha told the British Broadcasting Corp.

Both Washington and Baghdad charge Syria with doing too little to prevent foreign fighters, especially al-Qaida operatives, from crossing its border into Iraq. Beyond that, top members of Saddam Hussein's former regime have found safe haven in Syria, where they have operated freely in helping fund and organize the Sunni insurgency that is responsible for the vast majority of U.S. deaths in Iraq.

As for Iran, many of the key figures in Iraq's now-dominant Shiite hierarchy spent years in exile there during Saddam's rule. One Shiite militia was trained by Iran's Revolutionary Guard. Iran is known to fund that militia and the one loyal to al-Sadr. Both are believed deeply involved in the sectarian killing that is tipping Iraq toward all-out civil war.

Abizaid was the third top U.S. official to visit Iraq since Oct. 30, and the meeting came a day after al-Maliki promised to shake up his government in a bid to end the sectarian slaughter.

National Security Adviser Stephen Hadley was first to visit, followed five days later by U.S. National Intelligence Director John Negroponte.

Before Abizaid pushed the same theme, Negroponte also demanded that al-Maliki disband militias by year's end — but was met with a flat rejection. Al-Maliki told Negroponte such a move would be political suicide. Al-Maliki, a Shiite, relies heavily on two major Shiite political groups which run the heavily armed militias.

In Monday's meeting, the government said, Abizaid "emphasized the multinational forces' commitment to training Iraqi security forces to handle security in all Iraqi provinces."

Responding to statements by al-Maliki that the United States should move more quickly to hand security affairs over to his army, Abizaid asked for "proof that Iraqi security forces were capable of controlling the security situation in order for us to give you more powers as the commander in chief," according to the Iraqi government officials.

Such a move seemed distant Monday as a police said a bomb detonated on a bus in the northeast Baghdad Shaab neighborhood shortly after noon, killing 20 people. Sunni insurgents have frequently targeted Shiite bus passengers in the sectarian reprisal killings that are tearing at the fabric of Iraqi society.wounded, police said.6 New York-based Committee to Protect Journalists. Thirty-five other media employees, including drivers, interpreters and guards, have been killed, all but one of them Iraqi.

Hostages overpower gunman demanding prescription drugs

STOLLINGS, W.Va. — Four people taken hostage by a gunman at a pharmacy overpowered their captor Monday after he demanded prescription drugs and fired several shots, authorities said.

The 90-minute standoff ended when the hostages, who were barricaded inside the store with the gunman, hit him with something, Sheriff's Deputy B.J. Ferrell said.

None of the hostages was harmed, but the suspect was taken to a hospital, Ferrell said. The nature of his injuries was not immediately clear, but a witness said he had taken a painkiller and an anti-anxiety drug.

The gunman arrived with a handgun and a sawed-off shotgun, taking six people hostage at the Family Discount Pharmacy in Stollings, about 60 miles southwest of Charleston, according to Logan County 911 Director Marilyn Crosby.

Pharmacy technician Jessica Thompson, 24, said the gunman said he needed drugs but could not afford to buy them.

The man told the hostages that he wanted to kill himself but did not want to hurt them, Thompson said. He was given an unknown quantity of Lortab, a painkiller, and Xanax, an anti-anxiety drug, which he took, she said. He then became drowsy.

Workers told the man there were more drugs in an adjacent building, Thompson said. She told the suspect she was going to get the keys to the other building but ran for help instead.

"I was just afraid he would hurt the rest of them that were in there," she said. Another worker in the store also escaped after a similar ruse.

Authorities identified the gunman as Jeffrey Harvey, 31. They did not release details about the last four hostages or how they overpowered him.

Democratic displeasure?

Debbie Friedman

Well, America, you just gave the terrorists exactly what they wanted. Are you proud? Are you happy we elected a bunch of pansies to take control of Congress and go all soft on the war on terror? My God. Why didn't you listen to the warnings of the President, Rush Limbaugh, Oren Hatch and Bill O'Reilly?

Just a few weeks ago, Mr. O'Reilly explicitly stated, "The terrorists want to damage the Bush administration. And so does the left-wing press. They are pounding the Iraq mess furiously so Americans will vote for the Democrats."

Mr. Limbaugh offered a similar analysis, saying, "Sounds like the terrorists around the world, and particularly, those in Iraq, are voting Democrat."

With these words of wisdom being broadcast across America's mainstream, why would anyone ever cast a vote for a Democrat? In a time of war we need to support our president by remaining loyal and, more importantly, ignorant to reality. Last week, we did anything but that, and as a result the terrorists have one up on us.

However, the surge in violence surrounding the recent election was not just about the war. Terrorists were responding to several issues that made it onto the ballots all across the country. And not surprisingly, the terrorists' stance on issues concerning them bore a striking resemblance to the democratic platform.

Most Americans do not know this, but terrorists are major proponents of gay marriage. In fact, very little would make them happier than letting the homosexual population of this country have the right to legally bind themselves to one another in holy matrimony. Ripping to shreds the sacred bond of marriage and subsequent divorce would give them intense pleasure.

Luckily, seven states had enough sense to knock this terrorist desire right down. Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin, thank you for not giving in to the terrorists.

Terrorists are also pushing for stem cell research. They want people with degenerative, debilitating illnesses to have the possibility of a cure, even at the expense of destroying the moral foundations of this country. Terrorists are perhaps the most intent on this issue because they are forming alliances with Americans in order to manipulate the public into backing the cause.

I bet the recently aired commercial starring Michael J. Fox was funded by al-Qaeda. I don't have any real evidence for this, but I think I heard it on FOX News. And since this is America, he's guilty until proven innocent.

I bet the recently aired commercial starring Michael J. Fox was funded by al-Qaeda. I don't have any real evidence for this, but I think I heard it on FOX News. And since this is America, he's guilty until proven innocent.

So, what was with all the uproar about when Limbaugh accused the actor of not taking his medicine to worsen his symptoms? I think they were completely legitimate claims, given the fact that Limbaugh is an expert on the abuse of prescriptions drugs.

Unfortunately, Missouri fell for this Hollywood-terrorist ploy and voted to allow stem cell research last Tuesday, throwing another bone to the terrorists.

Perhaps many American voters really did not hear the warnings given by some of the finest men in this country. To those Americans, I say, you need to start listening to Limbaugh and O'Reilly more if you truly love this country and hate the terrorists. Use their guidance and impeccable moral integrity.

KAN KITSUT/ DAILY COLLEGIAN

Mind their high and noble credentials, too. Don't pay attention to the fact that neither of them have any real political experience and accept their sensationalist banter as fact. Everything will go a heck of a lot smoother if we all do that.

Sure, our senseless war with Iraq may in fact have created an environment that fosters more terrorists, but that only means there will be more terrorists to defeat. More losers. That's a good thing, right?

While it's too late to turn back the clock now, we will have another chance to defeat the terrorists in two years by putting the Republicans back in office. For now, we will have to watch them bask in the glory of a cut and run policy in Iraq, marriages to the gays and the killing of lifeless life.

We will have to watch the Liberals do the same, since they are one and the same. And making a comparison like that is completely justified. It's not at all like the Bush/Hitler comparisons, which cause so much controversy. Those are just plain tacky and unjust.

For the minority of the country who did hear the warnings and act accordingly, know that the outlook is not completely grim. We still have the finest man of all, our president, in charge and relaying all the shots his superiors call. We also have an administration that cares about us, loves this country and wants what is best for it. It will make sure the terrorists do not win, even if it is at the expense of the American people.

Stop being unpatriotic

Domenic Poli

Midterm elections took place exactly a week ago today. During the months prior, the country was subjected to countless advertisements promoting numerous politicians running for public office. Even though each one was slightly different, they all shared a common theme: What is best for "America?" "Let America be America Again." "America Can Do Better."

"America" this, "America" that. Every candidate seeking election seemed to try to remind people that they are U.S. citizens and to go vote. All this talk about being an American got me thinking – what exactly is American? Or, better put, what are some un-American things when it comes to politics?

The most un-American thing out there is simply not voting in the first place. This nation was built on the principle of being a government of the people, for the people and by the people. The idea of a democratic system is that the people decide, by a majority vote, who will lead and represent them.

This is the reason the Founding Fathers selected a president over a king – they wanted to be able to elect their leader, instead of allowing the next generation in a royal bloodline to become the automatic top-gun who calls all the shots.

To this day there are countries run by monarchial dictators who refuse to hear the voice of the people. That's why it made me want to puke when I heard that, according to the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement, only 24 percent of Americans under the age of 30 voted last Tuesday – and that number is up by four percent from 2002.

Citizens of Iraq, who had to brave threats of bodily harm and/or death, produced a higher voter turnout than this when they held their first democratic election in over 50 years back in 2005. Americans are taking the democratic masterpeece known as voting for granted, and it is beginning to sicken me beyond words.

Next on my politically un-American blacklist is something so very common – belonging to a political party. When you check one of those little party-affiliation boxes on your voter registration form, you hand over your political independence and subject yourself to the bias of one particular affiance.

There are many people who tend to vote a certain way (which is only natural) but still stay unenrolled – and that, my fellow Americans, is the way to go. They vote for the party that they favor and still keep their political freedom.

Think about it. How many Republicans do you know who dislike President Bush, even with the increasingly unsuccessful war in Iraq, the highest national debt in history and his legalized constitutional violations all being as blatantly obvious as Ann Coulter's Adam's apple?

Not many, right? That's because they've attached themselves to one perspective and can't open their eyes to see the overwhelming evidence staring them right in the face. And if you think I'm only going to attack the GOP, just stop yourselves right there because, despite my many liberal points of view, I am far from a Democrat.

It made me want to puke when I heard that only 24 percent of Americans under the age of 30 voted last Tuesday – and that number is up by four percent from 2002.

A lot of Dems have promoted their party as the open-minded one, the one who will fight for the average American and the one that has never done anything wrong in its existence. How many Bill Clinton fans either don't know, or don't care, that the former president bombed a factory in Sudan that he believed was making chemical weapons?

(FYI: The factory was manufacturing aspirin, and though no one was killed in the attack, the owner sought $50 million in damages).

Or how about the Monica Lewinsky scandal? Most Democrats shrugged it off as something unimportant and a private matter, but I don't think it's too much to ask for the man who represents my nation in the international arena to respect his wife and his marriage.

I could go on and on with this list but, unfortunately, I'm limited to 850 words. So, to finish up, third on my listing of things that are un-American from a political standpoint is rigging an election. Anything that is done to steal an election is the molestation of a democratic society, and it has happened far too often.

There is a lot of evidence to suggest that President Bush won both the 2000 and 2004 elections due to some sort of fraudulence. It appears that faulty voting machines, hanging chad ballots and some foul play may have won the elections for Bush.

And, again, I'm one-sided here. I know about JFK's victory in 1960. Even Robert F. Kennedy Jr. admits that his uncle's colleagues used the votes of people who had been dead to defeat his opponent, Richard Nixon.

A Commander in Chief is supposed to be selected by a coalition of proud, free-thinking Americans, and whenever anything happens to thwart the democratic method, we, as a nation, are the victims. Americans need to take a step back and decide whether to turn their heads to these atrocities or to help put our country back on the path of true democracy.

Superior to the south?

What if your professor came into class one day and said that Mississippi was both the greatest state in America and the most important as well? Odds are most of you would laugh and cast him off as someone who drank too much of the magical Kool-Aid. After all, to most of us here on the East Coast, Mississippi seems like the ugly stepchild when compared to good old Massachusetts.

I started pondering this question recently after the mini firestorm of sorts that began after comments made by New York Rep. Charles Rangel. The Democrat was quoted in The New York Times on Thursday saying, "Mississippi gets more than their fair share back in federal money, but who the hell wants to live in Mississippi?"

These comments enraged Rep. Chip Pickering of Mississippi, who went as far as to call them "slander and defamation." To Pickering, these words were a mortal wound. Who wouldn't want to live in Mississippi?

It seems that many people living on the East Coast have a bit of a superiority complex when it comes to the rest of the country. If an event isn't happening in Boston or New York, it might as well be happening in Kazakhstan, for all they care. Walking around campus all you hear is Boston, Boston, Boston, but what you don't hear is Biloxi. Maybe that is what you should be hearing.

Often, people overlook the treasure that is Mississippi and all of the great contributions it has made to our country over the years. I decided that the issue needed some research, and found the following information at the Mississippi Facts and Trivia section of 50states.com:

"In 1963, the University of Mississippi Medical Center accomplished the world's first human lung transplant and, on Jan. 23, 1964, Dr. James D. Hardy performed the world's first heart transplant surgery," according to the Web site. "While on a hunting expedition in 1902 in Sharkey County, Mississippi, President Theodore (Teddy) Roosevelt refused to shoot a captured bear. This act resulted in the creation of the world-famous teddy bear," the Web site continues.

The King himself, Elvis Presley was born in Tupelo, on Jan. 8, 1935. Edward Adolff Barq Sr. invented root beer, a favorite beverage here on campus, in Biloxi in 1898.

"The Mississippi River is the largest in the United States and is the nation's chief waterway," stated the Web site. "Its nickname is Old Man River."

At this point in my research, I had almost been convinced that I had been shallow and simple-minded to write off Mississippi as a haven for country music, hillbillies and NASCAR races. However, I soon stumbled upon a darker side of the state.

Racism has always been a major problem, with lynching a major cause of fear for African-Americans in the past. Mississippi takes the ultimate walk of shame here, holding the record for the most lynching from 1882-1968 at 581, according to archives at Tuskegee Institute. The closest state to that total is Georgia, trailing by 50.

The film "Mississippi Burning" was based on the 1964 slaying of three civil rights workers in the state by supposed Ku Klux Klansman Edgar Ray Killen, according to CNN. The murders shocked the nation and drew attention to the struggle to register black voters in the segregated South. The men had traveled to Mississippi as part of what was known as "Freedom Summer," when young activists from across the country went to southern states to lend their aid to the civil rights cause.

Killen was finally put to trial in June 2005, after being both a part time Baptist minister and kleagle, or recruiter for the Ku Klux Klan, in Neshoba and Lauderdale Counties, according to crimebase.co.uk. This strange pairing of job titles seems to fit a state that has been a breeding grounds for racial intolerance for decades. He was found guilty on three counts of manslaughter.

Finally, perhaps the most famous case of racism in Mississippi is that of Emmett Till. The African-American boy was murdered in August 1955 by two white men after whistling at a white woman, according to PBS. Photos of his death shocked the nation and showed just how violent and deranged people can be.

It would be unfair to claim that these tendencies are only found in Mississippi, since we all know that violence and prejudice can be found all over the world. It is pretty clear, however, that racism has definitely been a real presence throughout the state. I would venture a guess that most UMass students and faculty would find the environment down south to be a lot less liberating than the liberal Mecca that is Amherst.

And in reality, maybe that is all that Rep. Rangel meant when he asked that controversial question. Those who have had the luxury of living in states that value tolerance and equality might have trouble adapting to a place where a racist in the Ku Klux Klan can also be an upstanding citizen – a Baptist minister supposedly preaching the words of God.

Rep. Pickering should take the comments as a challenge – to try to reverse the ugly trend of racism in the state and bring it up to speed with its northerly neighbors. Maybe then, people will be talking about Biloxi.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

SURVIVAL OF THE WISEST

I was born missing a quarter of my heart. Had it not been for modern medical advancements, I would not be here now. I would've died when I was 6- or 7-days old, if not sooner. I therefore find it incredibly difficult to follow the advice of Lauren Modesette when she said, "Consider for a moment what life would be like without modern medicine."

I find it far easier to agree with one Galileo Galilei who said, "I do not feel obliged to believe the same God that has endowed us with sense, reason and intellect has intended for us to forgo their use." Be it God or nature, whatever is responsible for life on Earth seems to think brains are useful.

Birds create nests, beavers create dams, otters crack their food on their stomach, polar bears grow thick coats and humans build houses. Yet, somehow only the final example on that list is called unnatural. Basically speaking, a house is the same as a nest. But basically speaking, humans are far more advanced than birds. Modesette wrote, "Our advantage is our cognitive abilities which create things like language and medicines."

Yes, yes it is. What's the point? I don't think Modesette fully understands what this entails: how massively important language and technology (such as medicine) is to humanity.

I have a theory to put forward to counter Modesette's. Technology is evolution. In the past 5,500 years, we have not changed much as a species. We're basically still the same as the Sumerians, physically speaking. We're all Cro-Magnon. But are we really the same? Of course not. For better or for worse, technology has changed the course of humanity. No, technology is the course of humanity.

As someone who holds a strong belief in God, I've always struggled with technology from a moral standpoint. There is the argument of "God didn't intend it – you're messing with God's plan. If God wanted multi-vitamin pills, He would have created multi-vitamin pill trees." But God also gave us a brain, and with this brain, we have created multi-vitamin pills. And as the brain was from God, it can be said anything the brain develops is, ultimately, from God.

So, God did create multi-vitamin pill trees. And metallurgy trees. And 8 a.m. class trees. And open-heart surgery trees. It's simply a matter of finding it in our head, planting the idea on the blue-prints, nurturing it in the laboratory and eating its rewards in the real world.

Something, be it God or nature, gave us life. And that same something gave us a brain. And in over five millennia, it has not taken it away. We do not have a brain by accident. And I do not feel obliged to believe the same God that has endowed us with sense, reason and intellect has intended for us to forgo their use. So says Galileo. So says me. What do you say?

When I turned on the television on Friday morning, the first news article on every station was coverage of the death of Ed Bradley. CBS even went so far as to have all of their best get together that morning to remember the late journalist.

What did the Daily Collegian decide to do? They decided to put Bradley's death on page six, while the cover story talked about the UMPD's new unmarked cruiser.

Where are the Collegian's priorities? I understand that college students do not really know anything about Ed Bradley, but that's why the Collegian exists. To inform the people. To tell them about this great man. To tell them that they will miss out on the editorials by a man with over 40 years of experience ranging from Vietnam to the Catholic Church scandals to interviews with the Oklahoma City Bomber Timothy McVeigh. To tell them that leukemia (the cause of Bradley's death) is still a major problem.

All I am asking is that you please take an extra moment when you print tomorrow's paper to make sure that the important stories are the ones that make the cover, and whatever you do, please try not to turn the Collegian into a tabloid.

Also, the Collegian needs to print a correction: The "SGA may increase activities fee" article cited that the fees would increase "$6 per semester" when it should have read "$6 per year (or $3 per semester)."

Timberlake returns without boy band sound on new album

BY ALLY WELCH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Sexy has been brought back with some new tunes from former pop star pretty boy Justin Timberlake. Still accompanied by the screams and beating hearts of young women everywhere, Timberlake continues his career as a solo artist, releasing his latest album for the fall season.

With its very fitting title, "Future Sex/Love Sounds," the album attempts to combine edgy hip-hop beats with smooth and sexy R&B tones. By the album's end, Timberlake reminds listeners of strong R&B artists ranging all the way from Usher to Prince and the Jackson 5.

Although Timberlake hasn't really created anything that diverse from mainstream R&B, his creativity is apparent in almost every song.

With the album's first single, "Sexy Back," Timberlake used synthesizers to deepen his voice, creating an entire different sound that doesn't quite fit the higher pop vocals usually heard from him in the past. With the electronic beats and even an obscenity thrown in the song, it's easy to question if you're even listening to Timberlake.

It is hard to understand the lyrics and to get used to the song as a whole, but the hip-hop dance sounds and random lines sung by artist Timberland save the song. The song easily grows on you if you're in the mood for a catchy dance tune.

Most of the songs found on "Future Sex/Love Sounds" sound like they are within the same genre, giving the album consistency.

Perhaps the sounds that are most pop-like are those in the album's sixth track, "What Goes Around/Comes Around."

This song seems to be a portrayal of the breakup between Timberlake and his former girlfriend Britney Spears and ironically takes him back to his old style of music. The track could have been put in an 'N Sync album five years ago without losing any of its value.

What Timberlake adds is a two-minute ending to the song that he sings in an entirely different style, which fits much more with the rest of the album's tracks.

And this isn't the first time we see this on "Future Sex/Love Sounds." The song "Love Stoned/Think She Knows" starts off as a disco-sounding dance track and ends as a dramatic love tune one could hear from a band like Coldplay.

The ending in itself features an outro of violins transitioning into guitar chords with Timberlake's best boxing in the background. It is this contrast of sound that makes the album unlike the average techno dance soundtrack.

"What Goes Around/Comes Around" features almost an angry background sound you'd hear from Eminem or Tupac, implying Timberlake's anger about his breakup. Each song is a little bit more fun, and at the same time more meaningful.

The newest piece from "Future Sexy Love Sounds" features a one-minute rap intro from artist T.I., who appears later in the song as well. "My Love" seems to be the new dance theme for iPods, cars and cell phones. The track, much like "Sexy Back," is a completely surprising style to hear Timberlake in, where most of the music is techno, with some other quirky sounds in the background that could easily be featured in a video game. The song literally sounds sexy, encompassing the exact title of the album and proving to listeners that Timberlake can break away from pop and be noticed.

There are, however, a few songs that are not so pleasing to the ear. Ironically, these are the songs he did not produce, which seemed to lack the consistency of the album and just sounded annoying. Tracks like "Damn Girl" seemed to be fitting for almost any hip-hop artist and didn't have the stamina the rest of the tracks gave off. What may have been more impressive would be a few rock songs or slow ballads thrown in to show off Timberlake's songwriting skills rather than how sexy his dance moves are.

The album, for the most part, does work, and puts Timberlake in a whole different category than his older music. Timberlake uses his everlasting sexy charm in new ways, producing what he wants and what his fans are craving for. "Future Sex/Love Sounds" leaves room for a more mature and diverse Timberlake, and also leaves listeners excited for a future J.T. If he already brought sexy back, who knows what could happen next.

Cruger continues to be busiest man in hip-hop

BY CHRIS CUFFE
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

"Soul Search," the new release from Sweden's Freddie Cruger, aka Red Astaire, is a seamless mixture of hip-hop, soul and funk, with a dash of dancehall and reggae thrown in too.

Throughout the album, Cruger creates clean, down-tempo beats, filled with jazzy cuts that feel like they've been surgically removed from a '60s big band album. These tracks lay the perfect background for the varying vocal styles that appear on this album, from the soul singing of Anthony David and Linn to the reggae verses of Desmond Foster to the hip-hop rhymes of Rapadon and Cee-Rock "the Fury."

The first track on the album, "Over the Ocean," is a reggae-style love ballad, featuring the lush vocals of Desmond Foster. This track has a hip, relaxed feel to it that begs the listener to just slow down and enjoy the pulsating beat, along with Foster's hypnotic choruses.

Then, the listener is brought right back into action with the second, more up-tempo dancehall track, "I Wanna Make you Move," featuring Anthony David.

Other tracks on the album like "Bap Yo Head" feature an upbeat organ playing the melody, while MC Rapadon, an up-and-coming MC from New York, now operating out of Las Vegas, delivers quick and clever rhymes that compliment the playful sounds of the organ.

In stark contrast, tracks like "New World, New Time" deliver a morose depiction of all that is wrong with our society. On this track, David again supplies the smooth and mournful vocals, which blend with Cruger's downbeat funk production, interspersed with short, echo-y samples of spoken word that add to the overall feeling of urban depression, generating the feeling that David and Cruger are leading the listener around their city, pointing out every crack-ridden street and downtrodden denizen along the way.

While the South Stockholm-born Freddie Cruger might be a relative unknown here in the United States, this is his 25 release of his career. This number includes both titles he's released as Cruger and the albums he's released as Red Astair.

Currently, fans can expect another two albums – "Red Astaire goes Latin" and "Red Astarre: Nuggets for the needy" – to be released over the next six months on the Homegrown and House of Godis labels, respectively.

This album scores a four out of five. If you like down-tempo hip-hop, similar to the likes of the Herbalizer and other artists from the Ninjatune label, then don't miss this album.

If you're looking for something with more of a heavy production, reminiscent of some Definitive Jux releases, or if you're just in it for the rhymes and hip hop verses, then you might want to check out some of the tracks on Cruger's MySpace page before you buy, as these tracks are definitely worth listening to, even if there are only a few tracks that fit into the classic "rapping" definition of hip-hop.

Music industry still wary of Internet

BY MICHAEL TRABERT
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

Music lovers should be glad to be born in this generation. For $5 a month, you can listen to anything – there is a whole world of music at the click of a button.

The Internet provides access to so much music that would otherwise go unheard. Just a few years ago, back in the CD generation, listeners had to have money and time to find that one rare album.

Since almost anything can be found online, there is no longer a need to go to a record store. The digital makeover will ruin the Mom and Pop record store, but at the same time, it will release music from much of the corporate grip that has plagued the art for a long time.

Corporations like Wal-Mart and Best Buy are the biggest sellers of music and have been able to control the music market by selecting what music they will sell. Record companies have had to keep that in mind when recording an artist.

For instance, Wal-Mart bans albums that are of "explicit content," giving the artist an ultimatum: censor the albums or lose the sales from those stores.

Wal-Mart distributes 25 percent of music sales, according to a November 2005 article on Mac360. The chain doesn't like politics or swearing in music, but movie viewers can always get the new bloody movie that just came out.

However, Wal-Mart and Best Buy losing money should be the least of listeners' worries. The ones that truly suffer are the small record shops.

Every music lover can remember picking up a record and running home to give it a listen. That exhilaration is gone and it's not coming back.

Record stores should cut their losses right now. In five years, it will be hard to find a CD player, unless that device is part of a computer connected to the Internet.

The drawback of digital music is that you can't hold it in your hand or flip through a booklet of it. You can't show off your collection to your friends without waiting for the screen to load.

Should we consider this the death of the music collector? Don't worry, it is just a transition time now – the only thing to do is embrace it.

With digital music, the idea of the album could quickly become obsolete. The Internet allows musicians to release songs one at a time. This replaces the economic need to release songs in a set collection, the reason albums were made in the first place. It is unlikely that albums will ever stop being produced, but there is a possibility. If that happens, it would be the greatest loss to the digital music generation.

The Internet does leave room for new expansion. The artist Beck, best known for his hit "Loser" in 1994, is pioneering new ways to expand his albums. He put out videos on YouTube.com with songs off his new album, "The Information." He is using the power of the Internet to expand the type of media that can go with an album.

Digital music has been used by The Barenaked Ladies, as well. They put un-edited versions of new songs on their Web site for download.

According to the band's Web site, the band wants fans to "remix, re-create, re-edit, re-configure, and realize what you will with these parts in coming up with your own versions." This gives fans an interactive experience, and if fans mix their own songs, they have played a part in creating the music.

With these pros and cons weighed, there is a lot to look forward to in these next few years. Musical curiosities can flourish and be exposed to more music than if the CD were still popular.

There is a lot to leave behind with the music store culture, but its ever hastening death is giving way to complete musical access to the one who deserves it the most: the listener.

Recap of Noho Independent Film Festival

BY MORGAN-ANN ROUSSEAU AND KATE BAUER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

More than 130 films were screened over the course of four days and five nights at the 12th annual Northampton Independent Film Festival, which drew to a close on Sunday night. This year's NIFF drew professional and amateur filmmakers from across the country, along with a wide range of film-loving spectators.

The festival kicked off last Wednesday with a screening of "Disappearances," a film that later in the weekend grabbed the award for Best Narrative Feature. Over the next few days, the NIFF screened works at the Academy of Music, Graham Hall, Seelye Hall, Stodard Hall, and Pleasant Street Theater.

The festival offered a diverse range of films, ranging from short documentaries to experimental feature length films. In addition to the wide selection of films, there were also special panels for screenwriting, producing, and documentary filmmaking.

On Sunday night, the Clarion Hotel hosted a closing party and awards ceremony to celebrate the festival's best filmmakers.

"SLIPDREAM" BY MARC GRANT AND "LIFE IN TRANSITION" BY JOHN R. DILWORTH

At 9:30 p.m., the experimental feature film "Slipdream" was screened at Seelye Hall. The film won filmmaker Mark Grant the award for Best Experimental Film at Sunday's award ceremony. A screening of an experimental short animation called "Life in Transition" preceded "Slipdream."

Although "Life in Transition" was only four minutes long, it offered enough time to confuse and amuse its audience. The animation was based around a strange little nude man who danced in a dream-like world of color, morphing movement and lullaby-like music. The film aimed to be symbolic of the journey through life's transitions – an idea that is perhaps only symbolic in the eyes of its creator.

Beyond being pleasantly amusing, the only higher effect the film achieves is that it's disturbing. It takes visual and musical elements that are usually associated with sleepy child-like reveries and inserts jolting imagery that is usually associated with child-hood nightmares: a baby eating a wolf, a giant porcupine spider, demonic creatures and sequences of loneliness in a vast shadowy desert. But it it's in the name of creative experimentation, what's to discourage? The film can be viewed at www.stretchfilms.com.

There are a few things, however, to discourage when viewing a film like "Slipdream," although the negatives don't necessarily overshadow the pleasing aspects of the film.

NBC's 'iVillage' comes to Orlando theme park

BY SCOTT POWERS
THE ORLANDO SENTINEL

ORLANDO, Fla. – Universal Orlando and NBC are turning an Islands of Adventure theater into a live broadcast set to house a new daytime TV talk show that will be seen around the country.

"iVillage Live" will be a television version of NBC's established iVillage women's forum on the Internet. The TV show will mix that Web site's formula of lifestyle and entertainment segments, gossip and news with live gab from a set of hosts, including former Miss Florida Molly Pesce, guests and audiences.

Starting Dec. 4, the show will be broadcast at noon, five days a week, from the former Toon Amphitheatre. The audience will be a combination of theme park visitors and people who reserve seats and arrive through an outside entrance.

"iVillage Live" will appear nationally on NBC's Bravo cable TV network, plus on 10 of NBC's corporate-owned stations including those in New York, Los Angeles, Chicago and Miami. The show also will be Webcast live on iVillageLive.com.

Because the show is based on an existing, successful Internet site, "iVillage Live" will be more Internet-based than anything else on TV, said executive producer David Shenfeld. The Internet and devices at each of the show's 300 audience chairs will allow people at home and in the audience to communicate with producers, hosts and guests to help drive the show.

"The road to daytime talk-show success is littered with carnage," said Robert Thompson, director of the Bleier Center for Television and Popular Culture at Syracuse University in New York.

While intrigued by the concept of "iVillage Live," Thompson expressed doubts about the show's prospects to attract much of the Web page's audience. The ways people use the Internet and TV are very different, he said.

People like TV because "it's so darn uninteractive," Thompson said. That's particularly true of daytime TV, which people often use as background noise for busy daily lives. So soap operas and talk shows such as "The Oprah Winfrey Show" are programmed to make sense to people who are just listening, he said.

Universal and NBC officials said the success or failure of "iVillage Live" won't be measured just by TV ratings, because the show serves so many purposes. It will provide original programming that the NBC-owned stations demand. NBC's iVillage Internet property, the Universal Orlando Resort and the show all will cross-promote each other. And it will be a new theme park attraction.

"We're going into this with the deliberate intent of making this an ongoing, long-term programming commitment from both the parks and the broadcasting group," said Tom Williams, chairman of Universal Parks and Resorts.

Pesce's most recent role was as a hostess on an Animal Planet show, Sissy Schaefer and Naanua Delaney arrive from local TV in Cleveland and New York respectively. Guy Yvvan was a host on the Home Shopping Network. Comedian Bob Oschack, who will do live, remote cut-ins from around Universal, arrives with some "Tonight Show" and Comedy Central credits.

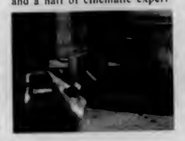
The 85-minute experimental feature played off of the Jack and the Beanstalk fable, albeit in a rather modern context. Protagonist Jack, is (leave gap here) a stoned-out drug dealer who is struggling with himself as he lives his dazed life in a state of constant confusion. He becomes homeless, and trades his fathers gold watch for two "magic beans." After he plants them in a bucket of soil the plants grow more and more each day. But, much like in the story, this story has a "giant" of sorts – an immoral yet ingenious psychiatrist. The magic beans lend Jack psychic powers that lead him to the psychiatrist, and also to Maya – a mentally tormented violinist under his care. In Jack's attempts to rescue Maya, he also tries to free the chaotic shackles of his drug-induced mind.

While the plot was a bit confusing, the visual aspects of "Slipdream" were at times enjoyable and undeniably creative. Grant used thousands of still photographs set to the protagonist's stream of consciousness voice over narration. The film intercepted this with 35 millimeter motion film, digital video and animation. Most of the film's art was in its editing.

The movie lived up to its name, as it was a very dreamlike depiction of an internal psychological struggle, but somehow it just didn't manage to maintain an active interest. At times it was unclear in what direction the plot was moving, and once it got there it was difficult to decipher how it arrived.

Experimental films have a license for a certain "poetic freedom," but "Slipdream" made it too apparent that it was striving to be poetic. Voice-over lines like "You are a memory fading from my mind," set to Jack riding his bike along a sunset silhouetted street, was one of many instances in which a cliché devoured an entire sequence.

All in all, the film captured the idea of self-exploration and internalized struggle, and almost pulled off the Jack and the Beanstalk metaphor. In the realm of experimental film, "Slipdream" manages to fulfill certain expectations, but as far as offering a well rounded hour and a half of cinematic experience the movie slips between the fingers of overall enjoyment.



"GREASY RIDER"
DIRECTED BY JOEY CAREY AND JJ BECK

A 1981 Mercedes-Benz sets off on a cross country trip from New York to Los Angeles. What's so significant about this story? It's not about the car and its passenger's trip across America, but rather the fact that the car is running on vegetable oil.

In the past few years, in the wake of a continuing oil crisis, alternative fuels such as bio-diesel have been introduced to the auto market. Surprisingly, fuel alternatives (or what Joey Carey and JJ Beck's film "Greasy Rider" refers to as "the only fuel we need") have not only been around for a long time, but the government also knew about them before they became as well-known as they are today.

This politically-driven documentary is filled with interviews from both celebrities and academia. Morgan Freeman, Noam Chomsky, Yoko Ono and Tommy Chong discuss the government's "cover-up" of alternative fuel sources, and how it has changed the landscape of both America and the world.

One interviewee acknowledged that we now live in a world where there is no infrastructure in which we can live without cars and that because of this, we are losing landscape, valuable resources and even clean air.

But, as Chomsky puts it, there is still hope for change and a chance to save our environment.

Actor Morgan Freeman discussed in the documentary his plans to build a bio-diesel plant out in Mississippi. Different companies across America are interviewed about their efforts to change cars from gas-run engines to veggie-oil ones.

Diesel engines were originally designed to burn vegetable oil – meaning that you can use the oil from a grease trap at any McDonald's or Wendy's to fuel your bio-car. The film praises that there are a number of ways to be different, radical and environmentally conscious in today's world, but also acknowledges that it's a full-time commitment. To own a bio-car involves constant activism, and it is recognized that today's environmental groups aren't exactly well organized. But as both Ono and Chong point out, and as the filmmakers express throughout the film, is that the good results that come out of being an activist, or even someone who cares enough about the environment to do something, outweigh the difficulties we'll face in getting to a more environmentally friendly environment.

"CARTONEROS"
DIRECTED BY ERNESTO LIVON-GROSMAN

Over a period of three years, Livon-Grosman interviewed unemployed workers in Buenos Aires, Argentina. To get by in the city, every evening the unemployed collect trash left behind by Buenos Aires residents and sell it to recyclers.

A loosely organized union filled with people once from middle-class neighborhoods with good-paying jobs, as well as lower-class citizens, these cartoneros discuss how they got into the market of garbage collecting and their everyday struggles within Buenos Aires' poorly structured economy.

The film also follows an artist's method of changing everyday trash into beautiful works of art, creating depictions of both cartoneros and their everyday activities and symbolic representations of the government's oppression of its people.

"AMERICAN VACATIONER"
DIRECTED BY KRAMER O'NEILL AND MARY SPEAKER

"American Vacationer" is an award-winning humorous animated short about the over-paranoia behind today's airport security systems. In the short, a chain of events leads to an unattended piece of luggage left in an airport, which then leads to a frenzy of fearful patrons as a security officer attempts to destroy the piece of luggage, thinking it may contain a bomb or other serious substance. The officer's decision to destroy the luggage ultimately not only reveals the suitcase to be harmless, but results in the collapse of the airport.

"WHEN I CAME HOME"
DIRECTED BY DANIEL LOHAUS

Meet Herold Noel, a homeless veteran living in his car, trying to find a job and take care of his young family in New York City. Herold, who is diagnosed with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder, is one of 300,000 homeless veterans in the United States and one of an estimated 500 homeless Iraq veterans.

In the documentary "When I Came Home," director Lohaus follows Noel as he struggles with PTSD and as he attempts to bring attention to both his case and the cases of other homeless veterans struggling to survive.

Like many young men and women looking to get out of their impoverished lifestyles and get a chance to try and better themselves, Noel signed up with the Army right before the terrorist attacks on September 11. After being honorably discharged from the Army, Noel was given numerous medals and certificates, but was left alone to try and re-establish himself into American society.

Noel's journey helps to reveal the under-funding of veteran societies from shelters to support groups. Noel also showcases how clueless American society is about this problem. As one person declares in the film, "look around; does this look like a country at war?"

Another politically driven documentary like "Greasy Rider," this film exposes a government that "spends $1.5 billion a week" on a seemingly endless war but can't provide enough money to take care of its veterans, whether by creating a shelter and or providing psychiatric help.

At one point Noel breaks down and asks the camera, why he has to struggle after "making the ultimate sacrifice someone could make" – protecting the country by going in harm's way.

The film leaves an underlying message that hopefully our generation will be able to do a better job of taking care of the soldiers who first took care of us. This film can also serve as a reminder to college-aged students about the effects of the war, and that it is ultimately their generation that will have to pick up the pieces when it ends.

'CSI: Miami' follows real life story

BY MARISA GUTHRIE
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Worlds collide in decidedly creepy fashion this week at "CSI: Miami" and the CBS News' documentary series "48 Hours Mystery."

"48 Hours," at 10 p.m. EST Saturday, examines the case of suspected serial killer William Bradford, who has been on Death Row in California since 1987 for the deaths of two women. Bradford's MO: Posing as a photographer to snap pictures of aspiring models at beauty pageants.

When police searched his home, they found dozens of pictures, including one of Nika LaRue, younger sister of Eva LaRue, who stars as DNA expert Natalia Boa Vista on "CSI: Miami."

"It is kind of ironic," said "48 Hours" executive producer Susan Zirinsky. "It is usually news that pushes the entertainment in terms of true-life stories."

Police have identified LaRue and 27 other women in Bradford's pictures, among them an unsolved homicide victim.

"This guy Bill Bradford is a really bad guy," said "48 Hours" producer Paul LaRosa. "He's only been convicted of two murders, but cops are pretty sure he's committed five or six. And he also allegedly raped a number of women. If you read the court papers about how he raped these women, it's horrific. Horrific. At his death sentence, he stood up in court and said, 'Think of how many you don't even know about.'"

"CSI: Miami" will eerily fictionalize the case in Monday's "Dark Room" episode, in which LaRue's Boa Vista is looking for her missing sister. LaRue's real-life sister, Nika, has a small part in the episode as a reporter.

During the episode, said Eva LaRue, "was weird, and Nika and I just watched the episode for the first time last night. When you have a brush with something like that, you realize that you can just kind of cruise along through your life kind of oblivious and never realize that there, by the grace of God, goes my sister.

"It's a real wakeup call."

Bradford had more than 130 pictures of Nika LaRue in his possession, and while some were typical modeling photos, many more showed LaRue clearly unaware of being photographed.

"48 Hours" interviews Eva and Nika LaRue as well as one of Bradford's daughters, Jodeen Larsen, who said she "would like to see him dead," said Zirinsky.

While the news interviews may have been cathartic for the LaRues, doing the episode was more than a little surreal.

"This is a woman who was really dealing with something that blew her mind," Zarinsky said of Eva LaRue. "I think that during the interview, it really enabled her to approach this, look at it, absorb it and react to it. It was like we were shrinkage for her."

Borat continues to cause havoc

BY DAVID GERMAIN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

While teaching American humor to a gregarious and absurdly out-of-touch foreign journalist, Pat Haggerty realized something was off – who WAS this guy?

Haggerty, a public speaking coach from Washington, is one of the unwitting co-stars of the surprise hit movie "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit of Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan." Haggerty has no hard feelings toward Borat, aka comedian Sacha Baron Cohen, but the same can't be said for others who were humiliated, thanks to the awkward fellow with the bushy mustache.

Their embarrassment over the film's hilarious, cringe-inducing blend of fiction and improvised comedy is magnified by its success. "Borat" has topped the box office two weeks in a row, earning a total of $67.8 million.

Last year, Haggerty agreed to be filmed for what he thought was a benign documentary on his client's journey across America. He hurriedly signed a release form, was paid $400, and the lesson began.

As cameras rolled, his client told raunchy stories in garbled English and laughed heartily at the expense of handicapped people. "And then, I'm starting to smell a rat," Haggerty told The Associated Press. "Each passing minute I'm going, 'You know, this can't be real.'"

Confused, he ended up playing along. He later figured out thanks to his son, an HBO-watching college student that he'd been duped.

Duped by Borat.

"They were exercising a First Amendment right," said Haggerty, adding that he enjoyed the movie. "And this Sacha Cohen guy's going to make 87 gazillion dollars. You know, good for him. I'm just sorry that he had to do it in such a way that he allowed people to make jerks out of themselves exposing their character flaws."

Two of Cohen's targets – fraternity boys who made drunken, insulting comments about women and minorities – are suing 20th Century Fox and three production companies. The lawsuit claims that a production crew took the students to a bar to "loosen up" before participating in what they were told would be a documentary to be shown outside of the United States, and that they signed waivers after drinking heavily. Studio spokesman Gregg Brilliant said the lawsuit "has no merit."

Cohen's behavior also wasn't funny to former TV producer Dharma Arthur, who claims she was duped into giving Cohen airtime on a morning show segment in Jackson, Miss. Cohen's live appearance, in which he said he had to go "urine" and hugged a bemused weatherman, led her life into a downward spiral, she told the AP. She is seeking an apology.

Although Arthur has said she was fired from the show, she told the AP that she left the station.

Kathie Martin, who runs an etiquette school in Birmingham, Ala., was also left out of the joke. Even though she was gracious and calm when Borat showed her nude photos of his son, Martin admitted she was "taken aback" by his schtick during their on-camera meeting.

"Unless you can figure it out for yourself, you have no way of knowing you have been tricked into being part of a childish prank with an R rating attached," she told the AP in an e-mail.

"And even if you figure it out, you've signed a release that Mr. Cohen's people say relinquishes any rights on your part to take action against them."

Ronald Miller, of Natchez, Miss., was baffled by the ruse. He and his wife attended a dinner at a plantation house, which they were told would be an interview with an "Eastern European television reporter coming to Natchez to film social customs in the South," he told the AP.

Borat disturbed guests, Miller said, by making anti-Semitic remarks and saying slavery was wonderful. He also invited a dinner guest a woman posing as a prostitute to join the group.

In another scene in the film, former "Baywatch" babe Pamela Anderson was attacked by Borat's alter ego at a book signing, and he later chased her through a parking lot.

Did she learn of his antics in advance? Yep, claims Anderson.

"I love Borat ... Of course [Sacha] and I planned this years ago," she wrote in a recent post on her Web site. "And it turned out perfect – I'm so happy for him."

Critics starting to doubt Cook

BY JAKE COYLE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

Dane Cook's rise to the pinnacle of standup comedy is undeniable. HBO has handed him the all-important one-man show, plus the "Tourgasm" series. He has sold out stadium shows that harken back to the '70s, when giants like Steve Martin and Richard Pryor roamed arenas. His albums rank with music stars on the sales charts, he's hosted "Saturday Night Live" multiple times, he was the leading man in the recent film "Employee of the Month."

But is he funny?

That might sound like an absurd question for the biggest name in standup and surely a subjective one. But a number of comics and critics are wondering if Cook might be more of an energetic talent and savvy self-promoter than any kind of comedy great.

"Everyone kills this guy," says Jim Breuer, a standup veteran and former "SNL" cast member who hosts a Sirius Satellite Radio show that often includes comedians as guests. "Not one comedian comes on [my show] and says 'I'm so happy for him,' which is weird. ... They can't stand this poor guy."

Breuer acknowledges Cook is a "tremendous performer," but says a lot of comedians "are upset because they really feel this guy has snatched a lot of material" – the ultimate sin among comics.

Cook has been particularly hounded by accusations that some of his material on his second album, "Retaliation," which debuted last year at No. 4 on the Billboard pop chart, bears similarities to earlier jokes by Louis CK. Cook has denied any plagiarism.

Cook generally brushes aside criticism or even welcomes it by soliciting feedback from his fans and altering his material accordingly. Still, the backlash appears to be mounting, with recent slams from Rolling Stone, Slate.com and Salon.com, and a spoof of Cook by the Fox sketch comedy show "Mad TV."

In July, Cook performed a guest spot at the Rhode Island comedy club Yuk Yuk's, where he was to perform a 20 to 30 minute set before headliner Peter Kelamis. Cook continued past his allotted time despite repeated signals to finish the act and eventually had to be cut off.

Cook wanting to extend his set wasn't remarkable, but the biting criticism from Kelamis was. He later called it "the most arrogant thing that I've ever seen in my life."

The Internet-fueled rise of the Boston-bred, 34-year-old comedian is a well-known part of his identity. In 2002, Cook spent his $25,000 savings to build a robust Web site, DaneCook.com – an avenue few if any comics then considered. He also set up a MySpace.com page, where he now has over 1.5 million friends.

"I got my balls busted for a long time when I first started the Web site," Cook recently told The Associated Press. "Those same comics that were busting on me were coming back to me five years later and asking 'Hey, how do I set up a MySpace?'"

Stephen Rosenfield, director of the American Comedy Institute, says Cook's influence on standup is "in selling, as opposed to an artistic impact."

"He's been able to make it without going through the same process that a lot of comics go through, in terms of using the clubs and working their material out that way," says Rosenfield. But, he adds, Cook is "kind of like Perrier water. It's brilliantly bottled, but it's still seltzer."

Cook will sign every last autograph after a show and treats his fans with gracious, even unprecedented respect. This is an essential quality in Cook: earnestness. In the liner notes to "Retaliation," he thanks his parents: "Mom – I'm right where you always told me I'd be. Dad – I'm proud to be your son."

The badge of honor among his fans is flashing the "Sul'i," or "Superfinger," a hand gesture Cook invented because (as he said in a famous bit) the regular middle finger had lost its impact as an insult. On Cook's MySpace page, there are hundreds of photos of fans with their middle two fingers extended.

Jim Breuer appreciates Dane Cook (above) as a performer, but when it comes to Cook's comedic material he has some serious doubts.

Bond movie returns to roots

'Casino Royal' is the 20 James Bond movie, however it is the first time for the actor Danial Craig play Bond. Craig was originals doubted by critics, but after they saw the latest movie, many of them now believe Craig to be one of the best actors to ever play the secret agent.

BY JOE NEUMAIER
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Over the course of 44 years and 20 films, James Bond has battled megalomaniacs and madmen, killed with pistols, poisoned darts and spear guns, bedded Pussy Galore, and cut a dashing figure whether in a tux or a tank. But it's a blue swimsuit that may finally make women come on their own to Bond.

"Casino Royale," opening Friday, introduces Daniel Craig as cinema's most popular secret agent on his first mission as 007. Despite being a "reboot" of the action franchise (the movie's conceit is that it takes place before any of the previous ones), it hits all the notes a Bond flick should. And where Internet buzz was once about whether Craig would be a worthy successor to the character Sean Connery first brought to the big screen in 1962's "Dr. No," now you hear heavy breathing from the ladies about a scene in which Craig emerges from the ocean.

Do they expect him to talk? As Goldfinger might say, No, Mr. Bond, they expect you to make them sigh.

"There's an intense sexuality about Daniel," says co-producer Barbara Broccoli. "It was just a scene in the script Bond is in the water doing surveillance – but when he came out of the sea, I actually gasped. The women on the crew had their mouths open. We all knew Daniel was in great shape, he'd been in training for three months and took it very seriously; he was doing it to have the stamina and energy and flexibility for the fight scenes ... but, lemme tell ya.

"And it is about bringing women into the fold, since Bond is a female fantasy, too. We can fantasize about being with someone like him. Men may want to be him, but a lot of women dream about being a Bond girl.

"It's nice for the girls to be able to have the toys this time."

Craig – who during a recent discussion cut a more respectable figure in a tailored gray suit – says, "I remember there was discussion about 'What bathing suit should he wear?' I was like, 'It can't be a Speedo. And it can't be a thong. Then you're left with a pair of longer shorts.' It's somewhere between the two. And believe me, when I came out of the water, I thought, Well they did this with Ursula Andress in 'Dr. No'... Hopefully it makes people smile."

Mission accomplished, from all reports. But there was some worry, when Craig's name was announced as the new 007 a year ago, that no one would be smiling. (Word quickly spread that he injured himself during filming, and a protest Web site, craignotbond.com, was like a minor henchman in the whole drama.) Shorter, blonder and more rough-hewn than his predecessors (who, besides Connery, include George Lazenby, Roger Moore, Timothy Dalton and Pierce Brosnan, who publicly said that leaving wasn't his idea), Craig was an actor first and foremost, in films like "Sylvia," "Road to Perdition," "Munich" and this year's "Infamous."

In fact, when he last spoke with the New York Daily News about Bond, in spring 2005, it was with trepidation. His British gangster film "Layer Cake" was opening, and his name had just been floated as a possible choice by Broccoli and her half brother, Michael Wilson, who've guided the franchise since her father, series co-founder Albert R. (Cubby) Broccoli, died in 1996.

"Since I was a kid on the playground, I'd [imagined] playing Bond," Craig said then. "I'd have to think about it seriously." But could he turn it down? "Ah, but I could, mate I could," he mused.

Flash-forward to the present day, and Craig – who, at 38, is six years older than Connery was when he began playing the character – is getting credit for indeed making Bond more serious. Certainly, Craig's Liverpool-bred accent and gritty manner (despite some time spent at London's National Youth Theatre) are markedly different from Brosnan's more patrician portrayal in four films, from 1995's "GoldenEye" to 2002's "Die Another Day," the series' biggest box-office hit.

"I just didn't want to repeat anything that had gone before," says Craig. "But this was something I thought could be new and fresh. And I think they nailed it.

"Doing it from scratch was one of the appeals – I now have the chance to set something up. But that doesn't mean 'Casino Royale' doesn't seem like Bond. I want people to see this and say, 'This is a Bond movie, all the boxes are ticked.'

"I watched every moment of every movie avidly and sort of checked what was done wrong or what was done right. But then you kind of have to move on."

The new film is an adaptation of Ian Fleming's first Bond novel, from 1953, which had been done as a live TV drama in 1954 (with an Americanized Bond) and as a much-maligned film spoof in 1967 (co-starring Woody Allen). This latest "Royale" pares down the Bond formula – there are no wild gadgets – and keeps the story contemporary, with Judi Dench returning as M16 chief M. There's also sexy Bond girl Vesper Lynd (Eva Green), a crucial card game punctuated by action, and a scene, drawn from the book, of Bond being tortured that may make male moviegoers squirm.

"My father and [then-co-producer] Harry Saltzman wanted to make 'Royale,' but the rights weren't available," says Broccoli. When she acquired them in 2000, Broccoli says she obtained "the Holy Grail of Bond stories. People will learn why Bond is the way he is. And because of that, we needed an actor who could revolutionize the series, and do what Sean did: Explode off the screen."

Though names like Clive Owen ("Sin City"), Eric Bana ("Munich") and Ewan McGregor were thrown about, Broccoli says, "There was not a better actor for this on the planet than Daniel ... In the books, Bond is described as a 'coiled spring.' He has this underlying sense of violence, at any minute you don't know what's going to happen. And Daniel brings that to the character."

As for the man with the newly-minted license to kill, he's taking it in stride.

"You can never predict how things will turn out," says Craig. "But I do have a certain confidence about myself, and you just push forward with that and try and make the best decisions you can."

And how is he handling the Bond media juggernaut, a thunderball that often pummeled previous actors? "You know how when you go through something traumatic, your body releases a hormone that lets you forget? I may be in that now," Craig says. "At the end of shooting 'Royale,' there was noise about maybe getting the next out in 2007, for the '007' connection, and I was like, '[Expletive] leave me alone, I can't jump back so fast.' Then things slowed, for good reason.

"Now that this movie is just about to be released, of course, I'm like, 'Oh, [expletive] it, let's do another one fast.'"

7 QUESTIONS FOR THE NEW 007

His drink: "Guinness keeps me going ... I could go on that all night. As for real drinks, I actually am a keen vodka martini drinker. Always was. I mix a mean one."

His kind of woman: "The one I'm with now. I won't say who, but she's gorgeous, and looks after me, and that's really the issue." (Craig's previously been linked with Sienna Miller and Kate Moss.)

Favorite car: "Since I've driven the Aston Martin DBS in this film, I'd have to say that one. It's really a very special motorcar."

Way to beat the other guy: "Using your brains."

Favorite gadget: "Not a television remote. Gotta be an iPod ... can't live without 'em, can we?"

Preferred way to get around: "I love trains, comfortable, with a good sleeper carriage. They're very romantic."

Fold 'em or bluff when you get a bad hand? "Depends on what stage of the game you're in. If it's too late, you may just have to go all in."

Fisher sues former bandmate for royalties

AP — Two former '60s rock stars appeared before a music-loving judge on Monday for a showdown over authorship of one of the decade's most iconic songs.

The organ strains of Procol Harum's "A Whiter Shade of Pale" sounded through Court 56 of Britain's High Court as the band's former organ player, Matthew Fisher, sued an ex-bandmate for a share of copyright in the multimillion-selling song.

Fisher's lawyer, Iain Purvis, said the song "defined what is sometimes called the Summer of Love in 1967" and had achieved cult status.

He said Fisher had composed the organ melody, and particularly the eight-bar Hammond organ solo, which gives the song its distinctive baroque flavor.

Purvis said the solo "is a brilliant piece of work and it is crucial to the success of the song."

"Our case, in essence, is that Mr. Fisher wrote the entirety of the organ tune," he said.

Fisher is suing Procol Harum singer Gary Brooker and publisher Onward Music Ltd. for a co-author credit and a share of the song's copyright and royalties.

Brooker, who is credited as the song's author with lyricist Keith Reid, says the pair wrote the song before Fisher joined the band in March 1967.

Brooker has said the melody was inspired by Johann Sebastian Bach's "Air on a G-string" and "Sleepers Awake."

The song, renowned for its mystifying lyrics beginning "We skipped the light fandango, turned cartwheels cross the floor" topped the British singles chart for five weeks and was a top 10 hit in the United States.

Fisher, now a computer programmer, left the band in 1969. Brooker, 61, still tours with Procol Harum. The two sat facing the judge and did not look at one another on the first day of the five-day hearing.

Judges are not always familiar with popular music, and Purvis noted that "one always risks in these cases a 'what are The Beatles' moment" a reference to a famous but possibly apocryphal story of a judge who purportedly asked that question during a case in the 1960s.

PS3's Japanese debut a big success

BY YURI KAGEYAMA
THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Sony's PlayStation 3 made its highly anticipated debut in Japan on Saturday, marking the first launch of what's expected to quickly become a global sellout.

Throngs of people lined up for several hours around Bic Camera, an electronics retailer in downtown Tokyo, to get their hands on one of the video game consoles. It sold out even before the store opened at 7 a.m., and buyers were turned away.

Plagued with production problems, Sony Corp. has managed to ready only 100,000 PlayStation 3 machines in time for its debut in Japan. When it goes on sale in the United States on Nov. 17, some 400,000 PS3 consoles will be available there. The sales date has been pushed back in Europe until March.

"Standing in line today is the only way to make sure I got one," said Takayuki Sato, 30, among the buyers who queued up at Bic Camera, snaking around the building in a complete circle.

The enthusiasm was so great, clerks with megaphones asked the crowd to stop pushing, warning that all sales would end if there were any injuries.

Powered by the new "Cell" computer chip and supported by the next-generation video format, Blu-ray disc, the console delivers nearly movie-like graphics and a realistic gaming experience.

Game makers like Sony must retrieve the returns for the exorbitant development costs for the machines by selling software. But developing games for PS3 is a costly and time-consuming task because the machine is loaded with cutting-edge technology. Only five games were on sale for the PS3's Japan launch date.

Sony expects to lose $1.7 billion in its gaming division in the fiscal year through March 2007.

The red ink is coming at a time when the Japanese electronics and entertainment company, known for the Walkman portable audio player and "Spider-Man" movies, is struggling to stage a comeback.

While the PS3 debut in Japan was a success the consoles release in Europe was post-poned until spring.

Fans gamble with Guns and Roses

BY MIKE KERWICK
THE RECORD (HACKENSACK, N.J.)

Jacoby Shaddix has a habit of scribbling out lyrics on napkins, on hotel scratch pads, even on airplane tickets. He stores this collection of potential lyrics in a bag, returning to the ink-covered fragments when it's time to compose a new album.

"Inspiration strikes whenever it strikes," Shaddix said in a phone interview last week.

Some of the material the Papa Roach frontman jotted on those scraps of paper made it onto the band's fourth album, "The Paramour Sessions." Some material he culled from the band's three-month stay at the Paramour Mansion, a 14-bedroom house oil heiress Daisy Canfield once called home.

Canfield died in a car accident and is buried on the property. Shaddix ventured down to her grave site while the band was staying there.

"I brought pen and paper down there and started writing," Shaddix said. "It flowed out of me. Four-to-five pages straight. Writing and writing and writing. It was just a breakthrough creatively. Moments like that you've got to take advantage of, let it come through you."

Lately, Shaddix and Papa Roach have been the opening act for Guns N' Roses. The problem with playing the undercard on a Guns N' Roses show is wondering whether the main event will show. Axl Rose, the volatile lead singer of Guns, has been known to toy with his fans.

"They go onstage a little late every night," said Shaddix, who grew up playing air guitar to Guns N' Roses. "They still show up. For us, it's cool. If they go later, we get to play longer. We'll play an hour."

The other challenge is convincing the fans who came for "Paradise City" and "Welcome to the Jungle" to settle into their seats early for "Last Resort" and "To Be Loved."

"We know not everyone is there to see Papa Roach," Shaddix said. "We are the underdogs on this show. We've got to work hard on winning these crowds over."

They spent time in Europe before joining Guns for this tour. Shaddix said if the reception the band received over there is any indication, fans are getting into the new album.

"Musically this album is Papa Roach at our most rock 'n' roll," Shaddix said. "Lyrically, I'd say this album is an amalgamation of all of the band members' lives. Songs about me, songs about [drummer] Dave [Buckner], lyrics about [guitarist] Jerry [Horton]. There are parts of all of us in this album."

And sure, Shaddix admits, there was a moment of hesitancy to join Axl on the road.

"For a second, we thought, 'What if he doesn't show?'" Shaddix said. "[Then we thought], 'What if he doesn't and we rock the show and that's it?'"

UMass seeks revenge

The Minutewomen defeated Vermont on Friday night despite Tamara Tatham's season-opening struggles. She fouled out of the game, scoring just two points while turning the ball over six times.

concern to me. When we do get the stops on the defensive end it's important we limit their offensive rebounds and only enable them one look at the basket."

The Wildcats will have their hands full tonight as they attempt to deal with containing UMass co-captain Kate Mills. The 6-foot-1 junior was named Atlantic 10 Co-Player of the Week after registering her fourth-career double-double last Friday against the Catamounts.

Although they haven't yet tipped off their regular season, UNH was able to knock off Bishop's University — a team that UMass lost to this preseason — in their own season tune-up. They bested the Gaiters rather handily, 64-36, but UMass was unable to beat their Canadian counterparts, falling 60-58.

That remains trivial to Dacko, who refuses to look anywhere but forward.

"Winning this game will give us two wins under our belt entering next week's [Seton Hall] tournament," she said. "Not only would it keep us moving in a positive direction, but it would be an affirmation to our kids that they're learning and getting better. It's early and we still have a lot of work to do, but everyone is working really hard right now."

A win tonight could be the first step to pointing the Minutewomen in that direction.

Turnovers a problem in opener

"Anytime we can get a win without Tamara having significant contributions, UMass women's basketball is doing pretty good" said Dacko. "It comes with growing. We need to take care of the basketball, we need to be able to handle the pressure. We're a work in progress, and we've got some [talent].

"We might be small in numbers but we're mighty in strength and determination. We're going to learn everyday, I wish we had two more weeks of practice but we don't, we've got New Hampshire now on Tuesday."

Walking Wounded

Avoiding injuries will be particularly critical for the Minutewomen who only have 11 players on the roster.

Junior forward Alisha Tatham left the game in the first half with an elevated pulse, and was not admitted to return after an examination from a team physician.

"She's our best defensive player," said Dacko. "I applaud our team for going out and being able to execute without Tamara having a good game and Alisha being out of the game."

Sophomore point guard Sakera Young briefly came out of the second half with a shoulder injury, an area that seemed to bother her in the exhibition against St. Bishop's.

Freshman backup Kim Benton filled in for the ailing Young, draining a critical three to start a 16-3 UMass run ... UMass clearly dominated the inside game on Friday, evidenced by the 33-12 advantage in free throw attempts. The Minutewomen tallied 24 points off free throws, while the Catamounts managed seven ... UVM was particularly dismal from three-point range, sinking 5-23 from the perimeter.

Junior Whitney McDonald came off the bench in the Minutewomen's season opener against the Catamounts. She gave UMass six points and pulled down five rebounds in the 60-48 win.

Five A-10 players crack top 50 in scoring

Coastal Carolina went down 79-46 to the Musketeers.

Xavier had three players reach double figures in scoring, and 10 Musketeers got on the scoreboard by day's end. Coastal Carolina shot a dismal 35 percent from the field and was just 54 percent from the charity stripe.

Guard Stanley Burrell posted 19 points in Xavier's season-opening win over Coastal Carolina. The Musketeers were preseason A-10 favorites.

Last year's A-10 Rookie of the Year Tommie Liddell was a rebounding machine for the St. Louis Billikens Saturday, coming down with 17 boards. He added eight points in the Billikens' 79-55 win over Quincy. Liddell was ranked tenth in the A-10 in rebounding last year with 6.9 RPG.

The sophomore guard's 17 rebounds ties him for first in the nation in rebounds per game with Colorado's Jermyl Jackson-Wilson.

Liddell's previous career high in rebounds in a contest was 12 against Temple.

Missing in Action

The Temple Owls were aware they would be heading into this season without longtime head coach John Chaney. New head coach Fran Dunphy can put another name on the missing list.

Senior Wayne Marshall will sit out the entire 2006-07 season to concentrate on academics and to recover from dizzy spells he experienced last year. Marshall averaged 7.2 points per game and four rebounds last year for the Owls.

Where did all the scoring go?

When the St. Joseph Hawks open their season tonight against Fairfield, it will do so with little to count on from the scoring department as coach Phil Martelli prepares to put one of his youngest groups on the floor in 2006-07.

The Hawks return only one starter from last year's 19-14 squad, junior Rob Ferguson, who averaged just over 10 points a game. St. Josephs heads into the 2006-07 campaign with nine freshmen and sophomores. Martelli and company were picked to finish eighth in a preseason coach's poll.

In Good Company

Five A-10 players rank in the top 50 nationally in points per game. Dayton's Brian Roberts scored 29 points in the Flyers' 78-62 season-opening win over Austin Peay. Roberts' 29-point performance ranks him eighth in the nation.

Teammate Marcus Johnson ranks 39th in the country with his 23-point performance. Johnson's 23-point outing is the most by any Dayton freshman in their debut.

UMass' Rashaun Freeman had 25 points in the Minutemen's drubbing of Dartmouth, 98-61, at the Mullins Center, good for 21st nationwide.

George Washington senior Carl Elliott had a career-high 25 points in a 70-57 win over Boston University.

Double Vision

The double-double club got its first four members prior to Monday's slate of games. Rhode Island Rams' Kahiem Seawright got his season off to a resounding start Saturday with a career day. He pulled down a double-double in Rhody's 86-62 win over Stonehill. The sophomore forward had 20 points to go along with 10 rebounds.

Not to be outdone was UMass freshman Tiki Mayben, who registered 12 points and dished out 11 assists. Freeman gave him some company, scoring 25 points and pulling down 10 rebounds for his 31st career double.

St. Bonaventure's Michael Lee posted his second-career double-double with 20 points and 10 rebounds in St. Bonaventure's 98-95 loss to Chicago State.

tions are tops on the Tiger defense. The A-10 named him its Defensive Player of the Week – this is the first time he has received this distinction.

At the forefront of the Tiger offense was sophomore quarterback Sean Schaefer. The Tigers high-powered attack allows Schaefer to spread the ball around to his receivers. On Saturday, he threw for 259 yards and a score.

The touchdown came in the game's first quarter. Schaefer found Demetrius Harrison open in the end zone for a 14-yard touchdown pass. Harris caught five balls for 82 yards on the day.

The Tigers victory moves them back into the top 25 in the Sports Network's I-AA College Football Poll they sit at No. 24 after falling from the top 25 last week. Richmond finds itself out of the Top 25 for the first time all season.

Playing for Pride

On Nov. 19, 2005, the Massachusetts football team rolled into Hempstead, N.Y. to battle the Hofstra Pride. The Minutemen were 6-1 in the A-10 at that point in time and a win would have put them in the NCAA Tournament.

The Pride scored two second-half touchdowns and defeated UMass 21-10. The Minutemen didn't qualify for the NCAA Tournament. Seniors like Shannon James and Serge Tikum left UMass without a chance at a National Championship in their final season.

In that game, current New Orleans Saints rookie sensation Marques Colston caught eight passes for 171 yards for Hofstra.

When Hofstra visits Amherst this Saturday, the Minutemen will play with payback on their minds as they look to put an exclamation point on an outstanding regular season.

Conversely, the Pride will be playing for just that. Hofstra enters Saturday 2-8 overall and 1-6 in the A-10. They have lost six-straight games since their last victory over William and Mary on Sept. 30.

The No. 3 Minutemen may have the A-10 title in hand already, but what happened the last time Don Brown's squad opposed Hofstra ensures that UMass will ignore the Pride's poor record.

The postseason and a possible National Championship are irrelevant right now. All season long the Minutemen have preached their mantra of taking the season one game at a time, something they'll surely do against the Pride.

Ramirez, Verlander named 2006 Rookies of the Year

By Mike Fitzpatrick
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Hanley Ramirez of the Florida Marlins won a tight race for NL Rookie of the Year, and Detroit Tigers pitcher Justin Verlander took home the AL award Monday.

Ramirez beat out Washington Nationals third baseman Ryan Zimmerman by four points in balloting by the Baseball Writers' Association of America – the closest NL vote since the current format was adopted 26 years ago. The speedy shortstop got 14 of 30 first-place votes and finished with 105 points. Zimmerman received 10 first-place votes and totaled 101 points.

Three of the top four NL finishers were Marlins. Second baseman Dan Uggla came in third, getting the other six first-place votes, and pitcher Josh Johnson was fourth.

One of the first congratulatory calls Ramirez got was from Uggla, his double-play partner and good friend.

"I'm so happy," Ramirez said. "I want to thank each one of my teammates, because every day they gave me the energy to play in the big leagues."

Verlander easily won the AL honor after his closest competitors in a race dominated by pitchers were sidelined late in the season because of injuries. The hard-throwing right-hander, who helped the surprising Tigers reach the World Series, was listed first on 26 of 28 ballots for a total of 133 points.

Boston closer Jonathan Papelbon came in second with 63 points, and Minnesota lefty Francisco Liriano finished third.

"I was pretty excited. I was actually outside washing the car. I totally forgot that today was the day it was announced," Verlander said. "It was pretty fun just to be a part of this rookie class."

The 23-year-old Verlander, who went 17-9 with a 3.63 ERA, became the first starting pitcher to win AL Rookie of the Year since Dave Righetti of the New York Yankees in 1981. The last Tigers player to receive the honor was second baseman Lou Whitaker in 1978.

"It's a nice tribute to him and his teammates," Detroit manager Jim Leyland said in a telephone interview from his home in Pittsburgh. "Usually when you accomplish something like this, it's a combination of earning it with your play and with teammates making contributions. Winning usually helps, too."

Ramirez gave the Marlins their second Rookie of the Year in four years, joining ace pitcher Dontrelle Willis, who played a little prank on his teammate by calling in unannounced during Ramirez's conference call with South Florida reporters.

"I just called in to say congrats I love you. Keep doing your thing out there," Willis said.

The 22-year-old Ramirez, acquired from Boston last November in a deal for Josh Beckett and Mike Lowell, batted .292 with 17 homers, 59 RBIs, 119 runs and 51 stolen bases. Ramirez also hit 46 doubles and 11 triples.

Voters select their top three choices and points are tabulated on a 5-3-1 basis. Before 1980, writers voted for just one rookie.

Zimmerman, who actually appeared on more ballots than Ramirez (29-27), hit .287 with 20 homers, 110 RBIs and 47 doubles. He also played strong defense at third base.

"To tell you the truth, you can't be disappointed, because you had a great year," Zimmerman said. "I knew it was going to be a really close vote, and that made it kind of easier. It was a tough year to be a rookie, because there were so many good ones."

Previously, the closest NL election was in 1982 when Steve Sax of the Los Angeles Dodgers edged fellow second baseman Johnny Ray of Pittsburgh 63-57.

Six Marlins received votes, the most for one team on a rookie ballot. Pitchers Scott Olsen and Anibal Sanchez were also mentioned, along with outfielder Josh Willingham.

"Nobody was talking about winning Rookie of the Year in the clubhouse," Ramirez said. "No egos."

Other winners from Detroit were pitcher Mark Fidrych in 1976 and shortstop Harvey Kuenn in 1953.

Former Red Sox farmhand Hanley Ramirez was awarded the National League's Rookie of the Year award yesterday.

Minutewomen seeking revenge

Sophomore Sakera Young scored three points and dished out three assists against the Catamounts on Friday night. The point guard is expected to start tonight after missing time against UVM with an injury.

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Leaving the Mullins Center with the same result as the men's team would make for a great home opener for the Massachusetts women's basketball team (1-0) tonight. A win against a New Hampshire team that beat the Minutewomen, 59-43, last season would make it even sweeter.

"We really just have to defend our home court," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "They defended their own against us last year and we have to return the favor. It would be nice to give them a little payback."

Despite the Minutewomen holding the edge in career meetings between the schools, 18-15, it was the Wildcats that were able to prevail at Lundholm Gymnasium last December.

This time the Wildcats will have to deal with playing on the home floor of UMass, which is not something they've been able to do well in the past. Only four of the 15 all-time victories by UNH over the Minutewomen have come away from Durham.

The Maroon and White will see a very similar New Hampshire team this year, as the four leading scorers from the 2005-06 season are back. That group of players led the Wildcats to a 15-13 record, and is poised to top that mark this season.

The inside play of UNH will be something to watch for as the top two scorers from last year will once again patrol the paint. Both seniors Danielle Clark and Ray Williams ended their junior campaigns being named to the All-America East Second Team.

Williams was able to earn that honor despite starting in only five games. She was relegated to coming off the bench and it was a situation that she thrived on. Her 11.5 scoring average was only second to Clark's 15.1, and she led the team in both rebounding (6.3) and shot blocking (1.1).

Despite playing forward – a position not typically known for good shooters – the duo of Williams and Clark are some of the deadliest shooters UMass will face this year. Clark was a sharpshooter from the three-point line – hitting 39.5 percent of her 86 attempts – while Williams found the net a staggering 60 percent of the time on her 215 shots.

Dacko remains worried about their accurate shooting stroke, but it's the game-changing ability of their point guard, Whitney Edwards, that has most of her attention.

"I'm more concerned about us keeping the ball in front of us and not letting Edwards penetrate," she said. "Whitney can really do the damage on their team. She penetrates and always finds the open players. We worked on our transition defense during practice in preparation for what she does."

Coming off their season-opening win over Vermont, the Minutewomen seek to pick up where they left off on the defensive end.

"We practiced yesterday at 6:30 a.m. and we worked a lot on our defense," Dacko said. "This game will come down to our transition defense. Their slashing is a bit of a

Junior duo ready to lead the way

Tabbed as the tandem to lead the Massachusetts women's basketball team, junior forward Kate Mills (Atlantic 10 Women's Basketball Co-Athlete of the Week) and junior guard Pam Rosanio preformed to expectations this past Friday in the season opening win over Vermont, 60-48.

W. Basketball

Shooting a combined 12-for-22 from the floor and 14-for-20 from the free-throw line, Mills and Rosanio combined for 38 of 60 UMass points. Mills pulled down 13 boards for her fourth career double-double, while Rosanio grabbed nine rebounds.

Mills and Rosanio accounted for 43 percent of the team's 1,607 points last season. This year, UMass coach Marnie Dacko expects even greater things out of the pair.

She says that Mills has the opportunity to be dominant.

"She's talented. I just want her to continue to get better and better," said Dacko. "I'd like her to take 20 shots a game. She's a black hole, when the ball goes inside it doesn't come out. She's got the green light inside and outside."

Finding a way to further utilize Mills in the offense will be a key to future success for the Minutewomen.

While Mills may be the most dominant player on the floor, Rosanio seems to be the vocal leader. With her tenacious, full throttle style of play, Rosanio found herself on the floor and at the line frequently Friday night.

All bad things must come to an end.

The Maroon and White failed to win a non-conference road game last season, posting a 0-6 record. With their victory at UVM on Friday, the Minutewomen are now one for one in those matchups this season.

The last time UMass won a season-opening road game was in the 1991-92 campaign, a 44-40 victory in New York against St. Francis. That broke a streak of nine-straight losses in such games.

The Minutewomen improved to 17-22 all-time in season openers, and are now 10-3 all-time at UVM.

A Work in Progress

Pegged as a key to success before the season, the Minutewomen failed to take care of the ball on Friday. Luckily for UMass, its opponent shot only 26.5 percent from the field. The Minutewomen committed 25 turnovers, more than the 15 that Dacko set as a target. Senior forward Tamara Tatham had a team-high six giveaways along with two points and one steal in 31 minutes.

After UMass clinches, playoff picture blurred for rest of A-10

By Joe Melone
Collegian Staff

It's over. It's all over.

The Massachusetts football team (9-1, 7-0 Atlantic 10) clinched the A-10 Championship outright with its victory over the Maine Black Bears Saturday afternoon. UMass could finish with the same record as A-10 South leading James Madison (8-2, 6-1 A-10) with a loss Saturday against Hofstra, however the Minutemen own all the tie breakers over the Dukes.

The Dukes fell to Villanova (5-5, 4-3 A-10) on Saturday, 21-20, in Pennsylvania. The Wildcats held JMU to just 87 yards on the ground, but the Wildcats three touchdowns all came on ground scores.

Matt Dicken and DeQuese May combined for 76 yards on 24 carries and all three of the Villanova scores. Dicken ran for two while May added the other.

The Dukes carried a 20-14 advantage deep into the game's fourth quarter. Villanova started a drive at its own 20-yard line with 4:39 left on the clock. In a situation like this, down by six with less than five minutes remaining, some teams would abandon their game plan and start flinging passes all around the field – not Villanova.

They embarked on an eight-play 80-yard march, capped by May's 16-yard scamper. The drive left 1:21 on the game clock and James Madison gained possession at their own 22-yard line, but were unable to respond to the late Villanova score.

A-10 Football

James Madison is still likely to receive an invite to the NCAA Tournament but will not be as high a seed as they would've been before Saturday's loss.

Rams Rolled

In 2005, the New Hampshire Wildcats (7-3, 4-3 A-10) defeated the Rhode Island Rams (4-6, 2-5 A-10) by a score of 53-9. The Rams couldn't get anything going in the matchup – fumbling 11 times and losing six of them.

When UNH traveled south to URI's Meade Stadium on Saturday, the Rams had to be thinking revenge. But UNH had other plans.

The Wildcats routed the Rams 63-21 in front of the 2,937 in attendance.

UNH's quarterback, Ricky Santos, threw for 271 yards in the victory, he also ran for 53 yards. His touchdown total for the day was five. He ran for three – including a four-yard touchdown dash to kick off the game's scoring.

His two touchdown tosses both came in the game's second quarter when UNH scored 28 points and put the game away.

Santos' performance was enough to earn A-10 Offensive Player of the Week honors. The junior has now won the award three times this season and 10 times in his career.

Freshman running back Chad Kackert received the A-10's Rookie of the Week award. The Californian collected 228 all-purpose yards including a four-yard touchdown run late in the fourth quarter. He contributed most on special teams returning four kickoffs for 109 yards. He caught one ball for 40 yards as well.

The Wildcats' poor conference record diminishes their playoff aspirations, however there is still a chance the Wildcats could find themselves playing after Thanksgiving. In order for that to happen they must beat Maine this weekend.

What a difference a month makes

One month ago, the Richmond Spiders (5-5, 3-4 A-10) were in second place behind James Madison in the A-10's South division.

The Spiders have lost their last four games – the most recent a 31-7 drudging at the hands of the Towson Tigers (7-3, 4-3 A-10). Richmond turned the ball over three times in Saturday's battle. All three of these turnovers were interceptions thrown by quarterback Levi Brown – it was Brown's first start of the season.

Towson sophomore linebacker Drew Mack intercepted a pass in the second frame and returned it 49 yards for a touchdown – extending Towson's lead from seven to 14. He also recorded seven tackles and intercepted another pass late in the game's third quarter to end any comeback hopes for the Spiders.

Mack also defended two passes in the game. His four intercep-

Up and down weekend nets Goldwire honors

Leemire Goldwire tied his career high with 26 points against Hofstra on Saturday. The feat earned him Atlantic 10 Player of the Week.

Sunday proved to be a bittersweet day for Charlotte 49ers' junior Leemire Goldwire. Less than 24 hours after leading the 49ers to their first win of the year Saturday against Hofstra, 88-82, and being named the year's first A-10 Player of the Week, Charlotte fell to the North Texas Mean Green, 90-72. Charlotte has now started the last six seasons at 1-1.

A-10 Basketball

Goldwire matched his career high in points with 26 Saturday and went 2-5 from beyond the three-point line. The junior was 12-12 from the free-throw line, including 10-straight free throws in the final 67 seconds to seal the team's first win of the year.

North Texas had five players in double figures on Sunday and shot an impressive 57 percent from downtown. Goldwire had 13 points on 4-9 of shooting in the defeat. The junior was named A-10 Player of the Week last season when he had back to back 20-point outings against Dayton (23) and Rhode Island (20).

Not so close

A-10 teams got off to a stellar start last week, going 9-2 in their first 11 games and outscored their opponents by 164 points in those nine wins, an average margin of victory of 18.2 points. Fordham's first victory of the season was not one of those blowouts.

The Rams barely squeaked by the Sacred Heart Pioneers on Friday, 70-68. Sophomore forward Chris Bethel led the Rams in scoring with 15 points, including the two go-ahead three throws with 2:12 to play. Bethel also recorded six rebounds.

Chanticleers, meet the Musketeers

Coastal Carolina did the honors of kicking off the defending A-10 champion Xavier Musketeers season Saturday. If that's the only thing people remember about the Coastal Carolina's season opener, the Chanticleers will be relieved.

Collegian Athlete of the Week

This week's standout athlete is Kate Mills. The junior led the way for the Minutewomen in their 60-48 season opening victory over Vermont on Friday night. She recorded a double-double against the Catamounts posting 19 points and 13 rebounds. It was the fourth double-double of her career.

Sports Fact of the Day

Donovan McNabb's 84-yard touchdown pass to Donte' Stallworth was his second such pass of 80 or more yards this season. Ron Jaworski was the last Eagle to throw two 80-plus yard scoring passes in a season. He did it in 1985.

Hussein death sentence brings mixed emotions

UMass students share mixed emotions on the death sentence of former Iraq leader, Saddam Hussein, which was announced on Nov. 5, 2006. Hussein faced tribunal for only one of his crimes against humanity– leading the execution of 148 men and youths from Dujail in 1982.

By Stella Cernak
Collegian Staff

Millions of people across the globe rejoiced as Iraqi judge Raouf Rasheed Abdel-Rahman read the death sentence to former dictator of Iraq, Saddam Hussein last Sunday.

Hussein, who faced the tribunal for just one of his several crimes against humanity – the reprisal against the Shiite town of Dujail – was found guilty and sentenced to death by hanging. His crimes included leading the execution of 148 men and youths from Dujail after his attempted assassination in 1982 and the torturing of over a thousand townspeople.

According to an Associated Press article printed last week, after hearing his sentence, Hussein, flabbergasted, muttered a variety of exclamations mocking the court. While in the restraints of court officials, he accused the court of being "puppets of the occupiers" and even went as far as mocking the judge shouting, "Go to hell, you and the court!"

One of the most memorable of Saddam's displays, coupled with a raised forefinger and a tight grip of the Koran, was the repetitious chanting of the traditional Muslim phrase, "God is great!"

The former dictator is not the only Iraqi up in arms about Sunday's death sentence, as riotous behavior in the streets of Iraq proves that a number of his followers are in distress as well. The Muslim minority group, the Sunnis, in Iraq who favor Hussein, reacted with anger to Sunday's sentence, while the Shiite majority group met Sunday's news with celebration and joviality.

Wolfgang Brauner, UMass professor and political scientist, emphasizes the fact that Iraqis have far more important issues at this point to focus on than the Hussein trial.

"The trial will not affect the war very much, as most Iraqis today are more concerned with security, survival, the ongoing civil war and the economy," Brauner said.

Regardless of what is to come, many Americans, including President Bush, have instead focused on the current achievements Saddam's verdict provides.

"Had it not been for the sacrifice

Ellen Story speaks about life in politics

By Holly Seabury

Ellen Story, Massachusetts State Representative.

Last Sunday marked the first day of National Hunger, Homeless, and Darfur Awareness Week. In order to alert faculty and students about this important week, several organizations at the University of Massachusetts have scheduled three main events.

Yesterday, a question and answer session was held in the Campus Center honoring State Representative Ellen Story as the guest speaker. Story discussed the newly elected legislature, including Deval Patrick, and also talked about her inspirations to becoming a politician.

Story asked those who came to see her about their hometowns and who their representative was. She graded her audience as having a "medium" knowledge about their legislature.

Story said that "the vast majority of people don't know who I am or what I do," and that being registered to vote comes hand in hand with being informed.

"You all have to be registered to vote," Story said. "Voting is a privilege and a power, and there are way too many people out there – college students, to be specific, who are not registered voters."

Story also spoke about her growing up in Texas and attending the University of Texas. There, Story realized, segregation was an unjust concern of hers. She discussed her adolescence as a white female, troubled by the Texan society's unfairness

MASSPirg raises awareness of Darfur crisis

By Frank Vitale
Collegian Staff

A man holds a machete for defense after fleeing the conflict on the eastern border of Sudan, Saturday. The United Nations said it was sending a team to assess how to protect refugees from a spillover of fighting in Darfur.

According to the U.S. State Department, anywhere from 70,000 to 400,000 men, women and children have lost their lives in the Darfur region of Sudan since violence started there about three and a half years ago.

Millions more have been displaced, as a result of the genocidal actions of the Arab-controlled government in Khartoum against the black Sudanese. The crisis has also begun to spill over into neighboring Chad.

To raise awareness about the Darfur crisis, the University of Massachusetts chapter of MASSPIRG (Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group) is organizing a series of events from Nov. 13th through the 17th. The week will also focus on the global issues of homelessness and hunger.

Included in the week of events is The Darfur Panel Discussion on Nov. 17th at 7 p.m. in 601 Herter Hall. The event will feature three speakers co-sponsored by the UMass African Student Association, the Muslim Student Association, Western Massachusetts Save Darfur Coalition and the MASSPIRG Darfur Campaign.

The first speaker, Mohammad Ibrahim Elgadi, is the co-founder Darfur Alert Coalition, a group of grassroots Sudanese-American activists. Elgadi will summarize the conflict in the Darfur region of Sudan.

Magda Ahmed, Elgadi's wife, is the second speaker and the co-founder of the Western Massachusetts Save Darfur Coalition. She is also the regional coordinator for the Refugee and Immigrant Health Program of the Massachusetts Department of Public Health, as well as a member of the Amherst Human Rights Commission. She will focus on Darfurian women and children and how the conflict affects them specifically.

The last speaker is Professor Julie Caswell, Department Chair of the College of Natural Resources and the Environment at UMass. Holder of a PhD from the University of Wisconsin, she has worked with the United States Food and Drug Administration, The United Nations Food and Agriculture Organization and the Natural Academy of Sciences. Professor Caswell will speak about hunger in both Darfur and the world in general.

Also slated to speak is Representative Ben Story, D-Amherst. She will discuss student activism on Nov. 15th at 7 pm in Room 917 of the UMass Campus Center.

Tables set up by MASSPIRG will also be set up in the Campus Center throughout the week to raise awareness.

Dance marathon to raise funds for children's health

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts is joining over 80 colleges and universities across the United States to raise money for the Children's Miracle Network (CMN) with the first annual UDance. The event will be presented by the Fraternity and Sorority Community at the Curry Hicks Cage on Nov. 17th.

The overnight dance marathon is aimed at raising awareness of the current state of pediatric health in the nation and across the globe, as well as raising funds for the Baystate Children's Hospital. The Greek community at UMass is hoping to raise $30,000 directly for the Children's Hospital, part of the Baystate Medical Center located in Springfield, Massachusetts.

According to the Office of Fraternities and Sororities the funds raised will go towards purchasing equipment and supplies to assist in the care of patients at the hospital. Over the past 20 years CMN has raised more than $9 million for the Baystate Children's Hospital, home of the regions only intensive pediatric care unit.

Baystate attributes the success of its rooftop playdeck, where children being treated can spend time with their families, watch movies and create arts and crafts projects to CMN, according to the Baystate Health Web site.

People will also receive a chance to hear stories from several children currently being treated at the hospital, either in person or via video. They will be there with their families who have received care at Baystate and will speak on their

UMass alum gives advice on internships

Suzanne Morse, former White House intern and U.Mass alum.

University of Massachusetts alum Suzanne Morse constantly performs a tight wire act, being on the frontline of damage control and trying to remain honest at the same time in her journalistic work. Her early preparation for this line of work was what the current public relations spokeswoman for O'Neill and Associates was the basis for her lecture Monday at Bartlett Hall.

Morse, who received her Bachelor's degree in journalism from UMass, spoke to a group of journalism and political science majors about her experiences as an intern at the White House under the Clinton administration. She told students how to increase their chances of gaining a coveted internship in the nation's capitol.

Morse worked in the radio division at the office of media affairs, helping coordinate the President's weekly radio address and setting up other radio interviews with politicians.

Morse had practical advice for students on how to succeed in getting their foot in the door in the nation's capitol. She told students to stay informed of the day's events and to avoid being cynical of politics by becoming engaged in the political process. Morse also stressed the importance of making connections while at school.

During her time in Washington from January to April 1995, Morse witnessed turmoil and turbulence, most notably the Oklahoma City Bombing attack. She had more lighthearted moments when she was hit by a door by ABC political reporter George Stephanopoulos.

"That was a really odd experience," Morse said of the terrorist attack in Oklahoma. "It really transformed the whole experience for me. It was impor-

HTM program at UMass gains more success

By Amber Vaillancourt
Collegian Staff

The University of Massachusetts boasts the fourth highest Hotel and Tourism Management program in the country of nearly 250 programs. But one may question how the program could continue to improve and remain competitive with other programs around the country.

The success lies in the efforts of the program to administer a transformation of the Lincoln Campus Center into a "top-of-the-line food and beverage teaching and research" facility, a $5 million dollar project led by the Hotel and Tourism Management Department of the Isenberg School of Management.

The project began in January 2006 and is essentially complete with the exception of minor clean-up and landscaping reclamation.

Stephen Lobik managed the project. Cambridge Seven Associates were the designers and architects for the project, and DA Sullivan was the contractor.

The 11th floor of the Campus Center will house all food and beverage labs in one place and will include a design that will make it a real teaching and learning facility. Since the 1950's, the Hotel and Tourism Management Department have worked in labs located in Skinner Hall and Chenoweth.

The facility will not only include three state-of-the-art laboratories, but also a 200-seat dining room.

In the Basic Food Lab, students will learn in the core course about the science of food production in addition to product identification, yield testing, cooking, and preparation methods for all food groups.

The Quantity Food production Lab will teach another core course where students will practice restaurant operations management where they will plan menus, establish standards of operation, rotate through various positions associated with restaurant operations, as well as kitchen and dining room management skills. Students will also be able to learn the similarities and differences with various restaurant food service segments including casual dining and hotel food and beverage.

For those who aren't students of the program, the dining room will be open to the university community during certain weeks of the semester, where HTM students will have a "real world" setting to hone their skills.

Elective courses such as Banquet Planning and Management will also be offered because of the resources the Quantity Food Production Lab offers.

The Beverage Laboratory will be used to teach students about wines, beers, and spirits, as well as non-alcoholic beverages while focusing on the concepts and principals associated with beverage management.

The J. Willard and Alice S. Marriott Foundation donated one million dollars to fund a room, the Marriott Dining Room. In this room students will learn and practice the concepts and principles associated with dining room service including American, French, Russian and Buffet-styles.

Oral contraceptives increase risk of breast cancer

BY RYAN RICHARDSON
COLLEGIAN STAFF

According to a meta-analysis published in the Mayo Clinic Proceedings in October, the use of oral contraceptives is linked to an increased risk for breast cancer in premenopausal women. The risk is small but significant, especially when they are used before the first full-term pregnancy.

The meta-analysis examines the results of a number of studies that looked specifically at premenopausal women, most of whom had been diagnosed with breast cancer after 1980. The study comes on the heels of a change in the classification of oral estrogen-progesterone contraceptives to a group 1 carcinogen by the International Agency for Research on Cancer in 2005.

An editorial accompanying the article by Dr. James R. Cerhan of the Mayo Clinic, noted that the increase of risk is incredibly small. Oral contraceptives are not carcinogenic across the board; other studies have indicated that oral contraceptives can reduce the risk of ovarian and endometrial cancer.

According to an article from Medscape.com, one in five cases of breast cancer are diagnosed in women younger than 50 in the United States, and breast cancer is the most common cause of cancer-related death in women ages 20 to 59. The prevalence and impact of breast cancer on women's health led to the proclamation of October as National Breast Cancer Awareness Month.

Oral contraceptives were approved by the FDA in the 1960s, and their patterns of use have changed over the intervening decades as their use has become more acceptable. According to Cerhan the study shows that oral contraceptives should be examined more closely for their impact on human health, both positive and negative, but the editorial doesn't urge physicians to stop counseling their patients to use oral contraceptives, which are extremely effective in preventing pregnancy when used as directed.

A previous meta-analysis published in a 1996 issue of the Lancet found that there was a small increase in the risk of a diagnosis of breast cancer linked with the use of oral contraceptives and within 10 years of stopping treatment. The study found that there was no significant excess risk 10 years after stopping use of oral contraceptives. While there is a slight difference in the perceived influence of oral contraceptives in the two analyses, they looked at different populations and several different studies.

Meta-analysis is an important tool for research in science and medicine because it is often difficult to perform studies on large numbers of people, which can create errors in sampling. This is more difficult than simply adding the results together and recalculating the results because many studies use different methodologies and are focused on finding different information. Meta-analysis can also help to control for errors in the original studies, they also allow for the reinterpretation of older studies in light of new evidence and understanding.

A recent study shows an increase risk of breast cancer in premenopausal women who use oral hormone contraceptives within 10 years of stopping treatment.

Romanians say 'Borat' producers misled them

BY WILLIAM J. KOLE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

GLOD, Romania—The name of this remote Romanian village means "mud," and that's exactly what angry locals are throwing at comedian Sacha Baron Cohen.

Cohen used Glod's Gypsies as stand-ins for Kazakhs in his runaway hit movie, "Borat: Cultural Learnings of America for Make Benefit Glorious Nation of Kazakhstan." Now offended villagers are threatening to sue the film's producers for paying them a pittance to put farm animals in their homes and perform other crude antics.

Residents and local officials in the hardscrabble hamlet 85 miles northwest of Bucharest said Tuesday they were horrified and humiliated to learn their abject poverty and simple ways were ridiculed for a movie now making in millions at box offices worldwide.

"We thought they came here to help us — not mock us," said Dana Luca, 40, sweeping a manure-stained street lined with shabby homes of crumbling brick and corrugated iron sheeting.

"We haven't got anything here. We haven't got running water. We can't even bathe," she said. "We are poor people, but we are still people."

Nicolae Staicu, leader of the 1,670 Gypsies, or Roma, who eke out a living in one of the most impoverished corners of Romania, said he and other officials would meet with a public ombudsman on Wednesday to map out a legal strategy against Cohen and "Borat" distributor 20th Century Fox.

Staicu accused the producers of paying locals just $3.30-$5.50, misleading the village into thinking the movie would be a documentary, refusing to sign proper filming contracts and enticing easily exploited peasants into performing crass acts.

Only five villagers have jobs at a nearby sanatorium and a stone quarry, Staicu said. The rest weave baskets, grow apples, pears and plums, gather mushrooms in the dense Carpathian Mountain forests rising above the town, or raise a few scrawny chickens.

With no gas heating or indoor plumbing, most keep warm with wood stoves and drink from wells. Horse-drawn carts far outnumber automobiles on unpaved, badly potholed roads, and mangy stray dogs growl and snap at strangers. Acrid fires smolder in trash piles on the outskirts of the village, and children — their clothing worn and torn — play in yards littered with stumps, scrap metal and other bric-a-brac.

"These people are poor and they were tricked by people more intelligent than us," he said. "They took one of our 75-year-old ladies, put huge silicone breasts on her and said she was 47." Another man they filmed to look like the poorest person in the world, and one of our men who is missing an arm had a plastic sex toy taped to his stump."

"We are suing because they were not truthful," added Staicu, who said he saw parts of "Borat" and was disgusted.

"They did not film reality," he said. "We've really had enough of this."

Neither Cohen's agent in London nor 20th Century Fox's offices in Los Angeles immediately returned phone messages Tuesday from The Associated Press.

The mood in Glod, meanwhile, was tense and volatile, with crowds of angry, shouting villagers repeatedly gathering around reporters.

One man was seen slapping his sister, who had appeared in the film, and slamming the gate to his ramshackle home shut to keep her from being interviewed. At another point, a resident threatened news photographers with a stick, and another pelted their car with rocks.

People in the former Soviet republic of Kazakhstan, where the mustachioed Cohen's character hails from as a TV journalist on an adventure across America, also have decried how they are depicted in the film, whose opening scenes were shot in Glod.

Two members of a fraternity at a South Carolina university who appear making drunken, insulting comments about women and minorities also are suing 20th Century Fox and three production companies, claiming the crew liquored them up in a bar before filming and told them the movie would not be shown in the United States.

Not everyone in Glod is upset. Sorina Luca, 25, excitedly described how she was given $3.30 to bring a pig into her home and let the producers put a toy rifle into the hands of her 5-year-old daughter for one scene.

"I really liked it," she said. "We are poor and miserable. Nothing ever happens here."

But a 23-year-old woman who gave her name only as Irina said she felt bewildered and dismayed that Glod's poverty was reduced to a parody.

The smash success of "Borat," she said, just rubbed salt in Glod's collective wounds.

The film remained the No. 1 weekend draw at U.S. movie theaters for a second week, grossing $28.3 million, according to the latest figures released Monday.

"They made us put a cow in our living room, and they made it defecate and urinate in the house. Everyone's angry because they didn't pay them the way they should have," she said.

"They're making a lot of money — but they've made us a laughing stock."

Study: blame minority woes on government and media

BY HOPE YEN
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—Flawed government policies and negative stereotyping of minority men have limited their economic opportunities, a new study says. It urges improved health care and education for minorities and less media consolidation.

The study by the Joint Center for Political and Economic Studies, a research and policy group that focuses on issues that affect minorities, examined the impact of U.S. policies on men of black, Hispanic, Asian and Native American descent.

It said the media and entertainment industries overrepresent minorities as criminals and whites as victims and law enforcers. Blacks are twice as likely as white defendants to be subject to negative pretrial publicity, it said. For Hispanics, three times as likely.

Meanwhile, federal laws such as the No Child Left Behind Act have hurt minorities by driving good teachers away from high-poverty schools to better-funded ones where whites are more highly represented, the report contends.

"We have a duty to stop now and reverse course," says the report, which was commissioned by a group led by Oakland Mayor-elect Ron Dellums.

It comes as Democrats seek to plot a legislative agenda after regaining control of Congress in last week's elections for the first time since 1994.

Democratic congressional leaders have pledged to raise the minimum wage and step up oversight of government agencies.

On another subject the report addresses, the Federal Communications Commission is reviewing the hotly disputed issue of whether to ease government rules to allow for more media consolidation.

Two FCC members, both Democrats, have criticized the idea of consolidation under fewer owners as a threat to minority and niche programming.

The Dellums commission is opposing FCC proposals that would allow media conglomerates to own more broadcasting stations.

Dellums, a Democratic former congressman, said government leaders should be mindful of the plight of lower-income people after the devastation of Hurricane Katrina exposed racial and class divides.

"If you look at this election, not only Iraq but Katrina was on the minds of many voters," said Dellums in a telephone interview. "Katrina exposed the stark reality of the vulnerability of urban life."

"We will have to address the ques-

Hussein verdict brings optimism

of our men and women in uniform, this verdict would never have happened," President Bush said.

Although many have approached Saddam's sentence with similar optimism, others such as Senator Harry Reid, see little correlation between the U.S.—Iraqi war and Saddam's trial.

"The verdict brings long deserved justice for the Iraqis," Reid said, but makes note that the Iraqis have "traded a dictator for chaos."

UMass students have met the verdict with mixed emotions, feeling either surprised, happy or some sort of mixture of both. Some, like UMass student Allison Phillips, were not left in shock from Sunday's news.

"I wasn't very surprised to hear the Saddam Hussein death verdict. I think that most people expected him to be found guilty of crimes against humanity, and feel safer with him being sentenced to death," Phillips said.

Although many students agree that justice for Saddam is indeed a step in the right direction, others, like UMass student and political science major Erin Casey, are opposed to the methods in which the Iraqi court will proceed in doing so.

"There is no doubt in my mind that Saddam was an evil and horrible human being," said Casey. "However, I can't understand how killing someone as punishment for murder makes sense. Overall, I feel it just sends the wrong message and in a lot of ways I feel like sending him to prison to live out the rest of his life will eventually make him realize the atrocities he committed."

Professor Brauner also addresses the issues which have emerged in Saddam's trial itself.

"This is a controversial issue on the level of the court and the trial itself. However, the results are better than most feared, yet still lacking in international standards, as Iraq is one of the few countries (including the U.S.), which still practices capital punishment."

Such a split in a country already torn with divisions could have proven disastrous when met with Saddam's verdict. Yet, officials claimed that violence had not escalated from their usual levels.

The same cannot be said for the future of violence in Iraq, which is still left up in the air. Some, such as Missouri Representative Ike Skelton, have a dismal standpoint on a peaceful future for Iraq.

"Holding Saddam Hussein accountable for his crimes against the Iraqi people is a necessary and significant achievement," said Skelton. "But I fear that the verdict will have no affect in quelling the violence in that country, and may very well inflame sectarian violence in some areas, particularly among Sunnis."

Vitaya Wisethrat, a Muslim cleric in Thailand, where Islamic insurgency now booms within it's southern regions, agrees with Skelton's dim outlook on Iraqi peace.

"The hanging of Saddam Hussein will turn to hell for the Americans," said Wisethrat. "The American people will actually be in more danger with the death of Saddam."

tant to see how the President reacted."

One moment that sticks out for Morse is former President Clinton's weekly radio address with First Lady Hillary Clinton right after the Oklahoma City Bombing attack with some of the children of federal employers who had lost their lives in the bombing.

Morse also admitted that internships have received a bad rap lately due to the recent Mark Foley page scandal, the Chandra Levy murder, and of course, President Clinton's affair with former intern Monica Lewinsky.

Morse said she was genuinely surprised when she found out Clinton had an affair with Lewinsky, responding to a student who raised the issue of the Lewinsky scandal in a question and answer session after her talk.

"I could have walked across the room right up to President Clinton and punched him in the face, and he wouldn't have known who I was," Morse said.

"These internships have been a bit denigrated and have put a bad light on internships," Morse added.

Twelve years after Republicans regained control of both Houses of Congresses, Democrats returned the favor in this year's mid-term election. Morse was in the capital shortly after the mid-term elections when Republicans took control of the Legislative branch, but told students that a student's party affiliation should not deter him or her from pursuing a Washington internship.

"At the end of the day it's still a tremendous experience," said Morse.

experiences battling health problems.

Speakers from members of both the University and the Greek community will present information at the event on pediatric health issues across the country and the globe, adding to the 'around the world' theme of the event.

Individual countries will be represented through costumes, decorations, local music and a short one to two minute choreographed dance each by a UMass fraternity or sorority.

Performances from a number of different dance teams and acting groups from the UMass community have also been planned, along with games, raffles, contests and prizes. Food for the event has been donated by local businesses and vendors in the Amherst area.

The event is open for all members of the UMass community as well as interested members of the greater Amherst area. Donations for CMN can be made at the event or on-line at the UDance website.

Nationally, fraternities and sororities earn hundreds of thousands of dollars each year for CMN. The non-profit organization works with fraternities and sororities from across the country, sponsoring dance marathons along with other events to raise money for pediatric hospitals affiliated with CMN. Along with the Baystate Children's Hospital CMN raises funds for the Franklin Medical Center in Greenfield, the Baystate Mary Lane Hospital in Ware, and the Baystate Visiting Nurse Association and Hospice in Massachusetts.

Gambling sites drop

NEW YORK—Internet gambling sites saw a drop in traffic last month as President Bush signed a measure aimed at banning most online wagering in the U.S.

Measurements of online traffic by Nielsen/NetRatings show that the number of unique U.S. visitors to any of 10 Web sites tracked dropped 56 percent from September.

Nielsen/NetRatings said the decrease followed a year of steady growth — and there still was a growth of 19 percent recorded in October compared with the same month in 2005.

On Oct. 13, Bush signed a port-security bill that included the online gambling provision, which seeks to clarify existing laws that had addressed gambling by phone. It also creates new criminal penalties and prohibits Internet gamblers from using credit cards, checks and electronic fund transfers to settle their wagers.

toward African-Americans and Hispanics.

After graduating from the University of Texas, Story traveled to South Africa where she lived for a year. There, she noted, the segregation between Africans and Europeans was "far worse" than what it had been in Texas.

"The way some people are unfairly treated was what got me into politics," said Story. "Living outside the United Sates opened my eyes, and I highly suggest to anyone to take an opportunity to do the same if you can."

Story also discussed the new legislature that was elected last Tuesday. She spoke highly of Deval Patrick, calling him a "friendly new face in the office." Story briefly summed up Patrick's childhood, education, and coming into office. As the first Democratic governor in fourteen years, Story strongly believes Patrick will make a huge difference for public education.

"My highest priority right now is to get money for this campus," said Story. "This is a fine university and I strongly advise students to get to know who their representatives are. Let them know you're keeping an eye out, because if you don't pay attention, there are some politicians out there who want nothing to do with the commonwealth."

National Hunger, Homeless, and Darfur Awareness Week also includes two upcoming events, sponsored by MassPIRG, African American Student Association, Muslim Student Association, Hillel, and Western MA Darfur Coalition.

On Wednesday at 7 p.m. in Herter 601, a panel will be held on genocide in Darfur featuring two Sudanese activists and UMass Resource Economics Professor Julie Caswell. On Thursday at Mt. Holyoke College, Reverend Gloria White Hammond, organizer of Million Voices for Darfur, will speak. Students wishing to attend this event are to meet at the Haigis Mall at 6:30 p.m.

tion of the plight of young men of color as the crime rate rises, as the school dropout rate continues to rise, as the poverty rate continues to rise," he added.

According to the report:

—Minorities generally receive inferior health care because they can't afford medical insurance and health facilities are either subpar or nonexistent in their communities.

— White families are more than twice as likely as black families to be upwardly mobile; black families are more than twice as likely to be downwardly mobile. The report attributes higher unemployment rates for minorities in part to poor schooling, discrimination and a mismatch between where they live and where jobs are.

—Minority youth, who make up 23 percent of all Americans aged 10-17, comprise 52 percent of the prison youth population.

The commission recommends that Congress make it a top priority to establish universal health coverage — and that all states extend health coverage to all uninsured children through the age of 18 who are not covered by state Medicaid or other insurance programs.

The report calls on the government to increase the minimum wage and the availability of student loans, and to re-examine sentencing requirements that imprison nonviolent offenders for long periods.

Labor groups such as the AFL-CIO also are committing to help, with plans to offer job training, create distance learning centers and provide mentoring by role models including former NFL players. The program will begin in New Orleans — which bore the brunt of devastation from Katrina — and then be expanded to other major cities.

EDITORIAL OPINION

"I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." -Voltaire

EDITORIAL@DAILYCOLLEGIAN.COM

Stop the cruelty

Andrew Freeman

When my remake of "The Lion King" gets approved by Disney, it will open with Simba learning the nature of the world — oppression. He will learn about how the antelopes exploit the grass, and the lions oppress the antelopes, but the lions die and are forced to assimilate into the dominant culture of grass. This truth will be summed up in a jubilant song called the "Circle of Oppression."

If this sounds familiar, you have probably had some classes where themes of oppression, dominance and victimhood were discussed. These concepts can be useful in analyzing human interactions, allowing us to perceive exploitative relationships, but they can be taken too far.

Recognizing the existence of oppression, and thereby acknowledging the humanity of the persecuted, is critical to overturning it. Slavery would never have collapsed in the United States without abolitionists loudly proclaiming the humanity of the enslaved, and fighting for their natural rights.

However, the study of oppression can be taken to extremes, with harmful consequences for individuals and for societies.

Condemning a whole group for the actions of a few, also known as collective punishment, is deluded and dehumanizing.

First, it can lead to warped perceptions of reality. People, enamored with this new vision of human interaction, can find evidence of exploitation in everything. Thus "The Lion King" becomes a club of oppression, or a representative of Bourgeois ideology, regardless of the intentions of the filmmakers.

These warped perceptions can lead to stigmatizing entire groups of people. If a black male is called criminal and evil, most of us would agree it is racism. Yet, some would argue those words are true of a white male, because he is a representative of the dominant patriarchy and is inherently oppressive.

Condemning a whole group for the actions of a few, also known as collective punishment, is deluded and dehumanizing. It leads directly into intolerance and hatred. Individuals are viewed as oppressors, regardless of their actions or beliefs. The confluence of these negative emotions can turn into violence and new oppression.

Another danger when one becomes obsessed with oppression is the tendency to glorify the victim. This occurs because one wishes to counter the negative perceptions of the victimized individual or group. The danger is that this victimhood becomes desirable. Rather than empowering the victim so that they rise out of their degradation, the glorification of victimhood can encourage the victimized to continue their status.

No better illustration exists for this point than the conflict in Israel and Palestine. Palestinians are viewed across the world as oppressed, and many trumpet their woes and express solidarity with them. At an Anti-war rally this Monday in front of the Student Union, speakers repeatedly mentioned the suffering of the Palestinians. As I left, chants of "Intifada, Intifada" began.

There can be little doubt that the Palestinians are suffering, but encouraging their terrorism is not the way to end this suffering. A disgusting irony lies in the fact that people decrying war would support the Intifada. This movement destroys Palestinian children as effectively as any war, urging them to blow themselves and their victims apart. Anyone who truly cared about Palestinian life would deplore these tactics, not applaud them.

The most important realization any person concerned with society can have is that its problems are not going away. Much progress can be made – the United States has markedly improved from its slaveholding, Indian-slaughtering days – but hatred, inequality and oppression will persist to varying degrees as long as humanity does. That should not stop us from seeking to marginalize these influences, but wholescale eradication of them is impossible.

There is an unfortunate tendency among social reformers towards Utopianism, the belief that, with only more education, or better organization, or a bloody revolution, a problem can be cured forever.

Human history has taught us, however, that no utopian society works, and the effort to build one is usually exceedingly destructive. The Bolshevik Revolution in Russia, the product of a bloody civil war, merely traded the oppression of the tzars for that of the Communist Party. On the whims of Stalin, the Soviet Union killed millions of people – with estimates of over six million in the Ukraine alone. Yet, no amount of slaughter could realize the Communist utopia, nor prevent the Soviet Union from dissolution.

No revolution has succeeded in overturning the circle of oppression. The vagaries of human nature have been with us forever, and they will likely remain. The existence of oppression does not excuse us from ignoring it. On the contrary, it should be resisted and marganalized. But in fighting oppression, we must avoid becoming oppressors.

Historical slap in the face

Brad Leibowitz

In less than a decade, as an American people, we have gone from a country set up to protect the rights of the individual to a country in which our basic rights as citizens have been systematically stripped away layer by layer. How is it that our current state of affairs has come to pass? In a nation built on the notion of always remembering the past, so it may never happen again, how is it we have forgotten exactly what got us here…the principle of unabridged liberty.

In the past eight years, somewhere along the way, we as citizens have lost sight of what once made us great. We have replaced our lost greatness with officials who see fit to strip us of our basic human rights. If that's not enough, for all the protests which have been staged, for every speaker who has stood against the powers that be, as a collective American voice we have not yet had the power to make a change. Well, now's your chance.

On Nov. 7th, we all had a chance to strike the first blow. Yet, before I delve into the state of our current affairs, I present you, the reader, with a little ironic history. Before the founding of this nation 171 years ago, and 184 years before the election of our first president, on Nov. 5th, 1605 a man by the name of Guy Fawkes, an English soldier, tried to set right the wrong doings of his government.

For all those out there who don't know who Guy Fawkes was or what he did, on Nov. 5th, 1605 he carried out the Gun Powder Treason Plot. Fed up with the actions and policies of his government, he plotted to blow up Westminster Palace during its formal opening session. He planned this action in accordance with the opening speech to be given by King James the first to his House of Lords and House of Commons (our current day Congress).

Are you starting to see the irony which I am hinting at? If not, here are some more fun facts for your displeasure.

I don't know if you, my reader, have been following the news as of late, but if not, I have some very displeasing news for your eyes. On Tuesday, Oct. 17, 2006, President Bush, backed by a vote from the majority of Congress (65-34 Senate, 253-168 House of Reps.), signed into law the "Terror-Detainee Bill" which holds the power to suspend your fundamental right of habeas corpus.

Your life and liberty have now become a matter which is to be decided by our sitting president.

I hope you're not wondering, but sadly if you are, the writ habeas corpus is your, "protection against illegal confinement, such as holding a person without charges, when due process obviously has been denied, and bail is excessive." This right has now been passed into the hands of our president for his consideration. Your life and liberty have now become matters which are to be decided by our sitting president.

For lack of a better explanation on the topic, on the same day the bill was passed, the sitting Executive Director of the ACLU, Anthony D. Romero fired off on the "Terror-Detainee" bill calling it a law which represents none of the values held by Americans.

Furthermore, he stated the bill is an awful abuse against the rights of an individual concerning the proper treatment of prisoners. "The president can now, with the approval of Congress…authorize trials that can sentence people to death based on testimony literally beaten out of them," he said.

I ask again, how is it, in a country which was designed to hand the citizens the power and take it away from the powers that be, the equation has been reversed? As an American people, we have watched the system turn against us right before our eyes. If this weren't bad enough, to go along with it, we have turned a blind eye and done nothing to revoke it. Finally we arrive at the irony of our voting date(s).

Historically, election dates take place on Nov. 2nd (presidential), or the first Tuesday in every other November (midterm), which are conveniently located right before and right after Guy Fawkes Day. Now, it could be just me, but think about it.

Our Founding Fathers were all closely tied to British rule and thus British ancestral history. Our revolution, taking place in the latter half of the 18th century, is only 171 years removed from the Gun Powder Treason and Plot. This leads me to believe that our electoral voting dates were set up intentionally to remind us all of Fawkes and what he stood for…the principle of unabridged liberty. This very simple notion of unabridged liberty is one which we have all seemingly forgotten.

From this moment on, we have two years until the next major election to strike another blow. When you reach those poles recall a poem credited to John Wilson, "Remember, remember, the 5th of November. The Gunpowder Treason and plot; I know of no reason why Gunpowder Treason should ever be forgot," and nor should you.

A cloudy spirit clouds the lungs

Greg Collins

Tomorrow the 30th Annual Great American Smokeout will take place across America, including here on the UMass campus. The nation-wide initiative, intended to help people stop smoking, encourages individuals to end the habit on the third Nov. 21.

We are confronted daily with temptations and urges, such as drinking excessively, using harmful substances and driving dangerously, which yield positive or negative consequences from indulging in these desires. In this case, the effects of smoking on a person's physical and mental well-being epitomize the dark ramifications of indulging in such a habit.

Yet completely abstaining from these temptations or desires, which may potentially lead to negative consequences, such as permanent health problems, disregards the possibility that human beings should live to be happy. This happiness is attained by committing virtuous deeds.

Previously, I held a no-holds-bar approach to condemning smokers, but I have changed my outlook after considering opportunities in which it would not only be morally permissible, but also virtuous, to engage in these temptations. For instance, smoking a cigar after a high school or college graduation ceremony, or after winning a big championship game, is not inherently misguided. Rather, it recognizes the past academic or athletic accomplishments of the individual. To acknowledge and celebrate a person's accomplishments is virtuous and should be commended.

However, this is not the case for those who smoke regularly. Undisputed facts within the medical community reveal the deleterious effects of chain-smoking. But individuals should also reexamine whether smoking frequently is consistent with his/her pursuit of happiness.

When we make harmful choices we turn a blind eye to the possibility that we are all children of God.

I believe God created man and gave us the gifts of both physical attributes and a soul. The former includes the gift of our eyes to see, our mouths to talk and our ears to listen. Our Creator provided these gifts to every human being, regardless of race, ethnicity or socioeconomic background, to enable us to interact externally with other human beings through verbal or visible communication. These gifts are undervalued by people who engage in harmful behavior, such as damaging one's own health. Our lives would not be as fulfilling without being able to talk and listen to a friend, a grownup or teacher for guidance.

Yet, the second gift, the soul, is more important when evaluating the usefulness of smoking, as well as alcoholism or substance abuse, and when determining whether these actions are consonant with happiness. Our God-given soul allows us to feel compassion, sympathy and remorse towards those less fortunate than us, but it also enables us to distinguish making useful choices from harmful ones.

In ethical terms, usefulness means the tendency to promote happiness through virtuous deeds. When we make harmful choices we turn a blind eye to the possibility that we are all children of God. This rejection restricts our God-given abilities to make moral decisions based not on cost-benefit analysis, as economists tell us, or pure pleasure, as utilitarians say. Instead, it is based on principles of happiness through the pursuit of good deeds, such as maintaining a healthy body.

To harm the physical component of our gifts through the use of harmful substances, like nicotine, is a sin. I believe it is mocking God when we make these wrong choices while knowing full well what the right ones are.

What is more of a sin, however, is harming our soul because we do not use our gifts to pursue happiness. Rather, we fall into the traps of dark temptations. Because God provided every human being with a soul, all individuals are capable of transcending the limitations of these urges.

The argument has been made that human beings should be provided the freedom to commit actions and engage in habits independent of external control, such as government restrictions or peer guidance. While it is true that freedom is a desire in and of itself, it is not the only goal for mankind to pursue.

Abusing freedom, like chain-smoking, misses the mark as much as unjustifiably restricting freedom. It is not a stretch to say that while smokers or substance abusers partake in these habits, they are not willing to recognize the self-destructive aspects of these actions.

A weak mind falls into the traps of temptations and urges without seriously considering the consequences, and makes no effort to change harmful habits. Perhaps even a more accurate example of a weak mind is one which recognizes self-destructive aspects of these actions, but still does not do anything to try to improve the situation.

Hopefully, on Thursday many people will realize that stopping smoking would be a reaffirmation of the unique essence of their very own souls. If they do this, then it would restart their quest for happiness.

Armed and ready

Last Saturday, I had the pleasure of attending the midday face-off of UMass and Maine at the McGuirk football stadium. It was, by all accounts, a fantastic game. The weather was perfect, and tension was high as we made our bid for the playoffs. It was incredibly exciting, and I had never been happier to cheer on my school team as they clinched a victory. My fervor for the game, however, was somewhat distracted by something that appeared in the end zone halfway through the final quarter.

I was very surprised to see, lying in wait near the goal-posts, a handful of uniformed officers, two canine units and two officers in riot gear, guns at the ready.

Now, I know this game was sort of a big deal for our school, but it wasn't the sort of thing that united the whole campus together in celebration. The turnout for the game itself was good, but I wouldn't be surprised if the majority of the people who read this had no idea that we even won this game.

I could understand having extra officers on duty, or even units waiting in the parking lot in case things went wrong. Bringing fully armored patrolmen with dogs onto the field during the game was totally unnecessary and incredibly insulting to the students in attendance at this game.

The University police seem to think that we students are incapable of socializing in groups of more than five people without exploding into a violent rage. Evidently, we are unable to control ourselves, even at a community event with alumni and children present.

Evidently, we are unable to control ourselves, even at a community event with alumni and children present.

Why do these fine officers remain convinced that we're always on the verge of a riot? Why can't they just face the fact that not every event on campus is going to turn into the World Series? Maybe they really get a kick out of waving around those tazers.

I wasn't the only person who noticed this extra show of force. As I mentioned before, there were quite a few alumni at this game. A few of my fellow students were asked if there was always this strong a police presence at sporting events, and if they always wore riot gear.

I'm not sure, given our recently purported title of "most violent campus," that UMass wants to project the image of a campus that needs a fully armed riot squad at every football game. Especially not to alumni, who give us money. We'd really hate for them to leave the game with a sour taste in their mouths, imagining Southwest as a police state.

We hear all the time that we don't have enough school spirit. That we don't support our teams, game attendance is lousy and we should all be more excited about being part of our school.

It really sends a counter-intuitive message to the general student body when we are told to be more enthusiastic about our sports teams, and then simultaneously have pepper spray aimed at us when we're joining in their victory. How are we supposed to show school spirit when any over-exuberant celebrating could be interpreted as inciting a riot?

I feel at its core, this event really sums up the attitude of the University toward the student body as a whole. They don't trust us. They don't trust us to take responsibility for ourselves and be adults in any way.

You can see it manifested all over campus. "My Student Body" reminds us in a nagging, motherly tone not to drink or use drugs. All-freshman dorms hold your hand until you're ready to step out into the real University community.

Left and right, we're shown that even though we are in our first years of adulthood, in an environment where we can finally make our own decisions, we're still just kids in the eyes of the University. We're just kids who can't go to a football game without a chaperone in riot gear.

Better with budget

Nick Milano

Deval Patrick centered his campaign for governor on hope. His upbeat slogans, advertisements and speeches swayed the electorate to believe in hope for better times. His campaign posters read, "Together We Can." The only question is, together we can…what? He made few clear policy statements, especially concerning the budget during his campaign because his huge lead on the rest of the field made it unnecessary. Now that he is the governor-elect, the major issue determining the success, or failure, of his term will be the budget.

Democrats are notorious for spending taxpayers' money and then raising taxes when they need more to spend. Massachusetts has the distinction of being one of the most Liberal states in the union, and spending on Beacon Hill can run wild at times. Over the last four years, Mitt Romney has made sure the legislature did not plunge the state of Massachusetts further into debt. When he was voted into office, the state was in a terrible financial state. Since then, he worked with, without, and against the state legislature to reign in the superfluous spending.

By cutting expenditures he called "nice to have" but unable to finance, Romney was able to restore economic integrity in Massachusetts without having to raise taxes – a true achievement in a state where the elected officials think tax first. The state was able to support necessary programs during these troubled times by using the state's rainy day fund, money set aside for emergency spending.

Due to a strong economy the fund has since been refilled, but already Democrats have attempted to take money from it to cover excessive spending. This spring Romney made budget cuts that were overridden by the Legislature. The Legislature then attempted to pay for the extra spending by withdrawing money from the emergency fund.

By cutting expenditures he called "nice to have" but unable to finance, Romney was able to restore economic integrity in Massachusetts without having to raise taxes – a true achievement in a state where the elected officials think tax first.

Romney blocked this and his veto withstood a challenge, but somewhere money had to be found to pay for the spending. Thus, this past week, Romney used his executive powers to cut $425 million of the very same expenses he cut in the spring. The Legislature would have spent nearly $500 million from the rainy day fund without a plan for refilling it. This system of checks and balances is absolutely necessary in this state.

In January, the state will return to one-party rule by swearing in its first Democratic governor in 16 years. The last time the State House was controlled completely by Democrats, they were unable to manage the economy. Spending reached new highs, and when revenues dropped, taxes skyrocketed. The economy was failing, and as Jeff Jacoby wrote in the Boston Globe last week, "the Bay State was on the verge of fiscal collapse." As a result, over the next four elections, Republicans won the governor's seat to maintain a divided government.

With the Democrats maintaining much more than a two-thirds majority in both the House and Senate, Patrick will have no problem pushing through legislation and will face little, if any, serious opposition. The problem will not be persuading the public to accept Patrick's ideas, but ensuring the state does not plunge into economic misfortune reminiscent of past Democratic failures. Like children who require parental supervision, Democrats in Massachusetts need a guiding force to prevent excessive spending.

While there are no indications Patrick is going to sit quietly in his corner office on Beacon Hill and let the legislature have its way with our money, there is also nothing to suggest he will continue to represent the careful nature of the outgoing administration. More likely than not the state's spending will rise regardless of anything Patrick does because of the new universal health insurance plan.

His job will require him to keep a keen eye on the status of the state economy. If revenues continue to fall, as Gov. Romney has already implied, and spending rises, the state could be facing a precarious economic situation. The last time Democrats controlled both the legislative and executive branches, they were unable to cope with such a problem. Have they learned from their mistakes, or is disaster about to strike again?

'All-out revolution'

Michael Dennis

So, apparently, there is hope after all. Nov. 7 was, without question, a monumental and historical day for the Democratic Party. An organization that has had no say in the United States government since 2000 is suddenly in the driver's seat, with the handcuffed and disconsolate Republican Party slouched in the back. Prior to Election Day, many expected that Congress could very well be repainted blue, but few were willing to guarantee a Senate takeover to boot.

With victories in the Virginia and Montana Senate races (including the ouster of high-profile incumbent Republican Sen. George "Macaca" Allen), the unthinkable has happened, and the Democrats have overtaken both houses. George W. Bush is now very much a lame duck president, and the resignation of Donald Rumsfeld is but the first wall to come crumbling down from the White House.

The Republicans have attempted, in their decade of control, to bill themselves as the party of inclusion, and to fancy themselves as uniters and not dividers. Clearly this is not the case, as the United States has developed a choking atmosphere of political polarization and oppression under the guidance of Bush.

The Republicans have refused to work with the Democrats on virtually every issue, from the Iraq war to abortion, and opposing opinions have been merely sneered at in Washington. (One can't help but laugh at Bush's recent declaration of a newfound commitment to bipartisanship as a result of the election results.)

Along with his allies, the president has taken advantage of his party's control at virtually every possible opportunity. He has pushed through nominations of blatantly biased individuals, such as Supreme Court Judge John Roberts, and his appointed woefully unqualified buffoons to key positions, such as FEMA Chief Michael Brown and United Nations Ambassador John Bolton (try as he might, his comical moustache can't hide his contempt for the U.N.).

George W. Bush is now very much a lame duck president, and the resignation of Donald Rumsfeld is but the first wall to come crumbling down from the White House.

The GOP is also apparently the party for Christians, yet you'll be hard pressed to find anyone locking morality or common compassion more so than the likes of Karl Rove and George Allen. They merely use God for political gain, just as they use the American flag and the concept of patriotism to further their dubious goals. One can't help but feel sorry for those who are dedicated to the Republican Party for all the wrong reasons, whether it be the pregnant young rape victim who voted for Bush because of his supposed religious convictions, or the Young Republican college student who sees no problem with federal higher education funding, yet works two jobs to pay for school.

Perhaps most of all, this gargantuan sea change will prompt a shift in the way the Right has controlled the political discourse in our nation. The atmosphere for much of the past six years has been predicated upon fear. Scare tactics were the basis of Bush's reelection campaign in 2004, in which he constantly cited the attacks of "September the eleventh," and not-so-subtly insinuated that under John Kerry, Americans would not be safe from another attack.

(All the while, Kerry meekly allowed Bush to set the tone and revert focus from real, tangible issues to a watered down rhetoric of patriotic unity – but that's another story.)

Understand, however, that as huge as a political victory for the Democrats as this all has been, it should, most of all, be seen as a referendum on the voting process in the United States. People came out in droves, and made a statement about their unhappiness with the direction of the nation. No matter what precious nuggets of rhetoric and scare tactics the Republicans come up with – among them, the ridiculous notion that the terrorists are happy about Democratic victories – for once, they can't argue with the results.

Perhaps the most remarkable trend in these midterm elections was the number of states in which decidedly Conservative referendums passed, yet seemingly in spite of anti-gay and anti-abortion sentiments, voters still elected Democratic senators and representatives. In two pivotal races, Virginia and Wisconsin voters elected Democratic senators and congressmen, respectively, while voting to ban gay marriage.

This tells us that while there are still Conservative social sentiments among many voters (especially in Southern states), they're no longer willing to simply throw their votes towards Republicans based on these issues. Real concerns, such as the economy and an unwieldy and nightmarish war in Iraq, have finally become the focal point of elections – much to the chagrin of fear merchants like Karl Rove.

On Nov. 7, it wasn't just a shift in power that took place, it was an all-out revolution. But make no mistake, the Democrats aren't solely responsible for the upheaval. Rather, they're simply the beneficiaries of a changing political climate. It took quite a long time, but the nation has finally begun to reject a culture of fear and deception.

This is but the first step in restoring the United States as a peaceful ambassador to the world, and ending a bloody and directionless war in Iraq. Mercifully, the Democratic Party now has the keys to the car – let's just hope they know where they're going.

A healthy obsession?

Michelle Poirier

Facebook is a disease, and everyone has it. You may think you don't have it but if that is the case, you'll be deemed a social outcast.

When we were accepted to college, it was suggested that we get a Facebook account to make connections and keep in contact with people from our school. This was a great idea at first. We made connections with people we would be living with and people we would be taking classes with. I met my roommate through Facebook, as well as some of the people on my floor and in my Residential Activity Program, or for all you acronym people out there, my "RAP" (LOL).

But suddenly, it wasn't about whom you were living with. People were "friending" anyone and everyone, whether they knew them or not. It was all about numbers, how many friends you made, how many groups you joined, how many pictures you were tagged in.

It's pathetic really, competing for something so pointless. It's not like you walk around and compare how many friends you have to how many friends someone else has. It's not a game like "Tag," even if you are tagging friends in pictures. It's just a Web site.

Facebook has become a household word. You see people with cameras taking photos, and you can bet you will hear the uttered phrase, "that will make a great Facebook picture." In most cases it's true, that will make a great Facebook picture, but people do not care to hear about it. Facebook has become a new epidemic of technological culture.

It started out as a way to keep people connected in colleges, but now Facebook has morphed into more than a social Web site. It has become an Internet obsession. Creator Mark Zuckerberg has recently decided to let anyone join the Web site, just any old person regardless if they're in college or not. Now, anyone can join the Facebook world, and people have started to regard Facebook as the new MySpace.

It's pathetic really, competing for something so pointless. It's not like you walk around and compare how many friends you have to how many friends someone else has.

Personally, I think this is a bad call on Zuckerberg's part. Remember when MySpace was making headlines every other day because creepy 40-year-olds were trying to meet 13-year-olds? What if the same thing happens with Facebook? I'd like to think that there's still some safety on the Internet.

To make matters worse, the new "News Feed" on Facebook makes people feel too informed of everyone's lives. The new phrase associated with the "News Feed" is the "Facebook stalker," because now you know everything that's going on with everyone else, and it's a bit ridiculous.

Along with the "News Feed" is the "Mini Feed." Basically the "Mini Feed" is a smaller, personalized version of the "News Feed," but it pops up in people's actual profiles. Now, whenever anyone looks at your profile they'll know what you've been up to. It's such easy access for people to know all about you. Hmm, sounds kind of like another Web site we all know and love. A little site I like to call MySpace perhaps?

I mean people really don't care that Sally made five new Facebook friends, broke up with her boyfriend and joined two new groups. It's all pointless, useless information. But here's the catch, the "News Feed" is always there.

When the "News Feed" first came out, people across campus were up in arms about the invasion of privacy and the useless information they were being forced to see. I remember hearing people talk about it for weeks. I would walk into the Dining Commons and hear random people having very acclaimed. With that in mind, why do I have the distinct feeling the professors at the other schools know the material they are teaching better than my UMass professor?

emotional conversations about the "News Feed" and its window into everyone's lives.

Fortunately, after many complaints and after many Facebook groups were created to petition the "News Feed" (I am a proud member of the "Students Against Facebook News Feed (Official Petition to Facebook)" group) Zuckerberg made the "Mini Feed" optional. However, the "News Feed" is still alive and well, dishing out the latest gossip across the Internet.

The term "Facebook stalker" can also refer to people who sit at their computers for hours looking up people who went to their high school, or just about anyone for that matter. Maybe even that cute guy in your psych class. You can look them up on Facebook and find out all about them. Sure it's creepy, but people do it every day. I know if I see a cute guy in one of my classes I'll go on Facebook and find out what his name is. It sounds really stalker-ish, but it happens.

Even though Facebook can become horribly addicting, it really does help people get out there and be part of something. There are ads on Facebook all the time for different activities going on around campus.

And as ridiculous as some of the facebook groups are, i.e. "Chuck Norris can (insert impossible feat here)" there are a lot of groups formed to keep people together who all have the same interests such as "UMass Amherst Class of 2010." If you don't have a Facebook account, maybe you should get one, just to see what all the hype's about. Then you won't be a social outcast anymore. Become a part of the Facebook culture).

Contrasting four local campus classrooms

Luke Bloomfield

I will doubt anyone who says education is an exact science. From Western universities to Indian monasteries to military academies to Japanese high schools, the applied methodologies of education are as numerous and diverse as the institutions that apply them. Wherein some Buddhist schools' students are required to memorize 500 verses of ancient text, a French high school will put pressure on students as young as 14 to begin preparing for the Baccalaureate.

Just as some cars drive better than others, so too are some methodologies more effective than others. A school with a good environment will probably put forth a greater amount of high achieving adults than a school with a poor environment. However, there are so many factors to consider when comparing schools in general, socio-political conditions for one, that it would be foolhardy to address them as an entirety. Besides, it is more relevant to focus on something to which everyone here in the five-college area can relate.

I have taken a class at Mount Holyoke, sat in on an Amherst class and am taking a class at Smith right now. Thus, I have observed the teaching methods and conditions at four of the five schools. I did not go to Hampshire, though based on what friends who attend Hampshire have told me, I am not sure if it actually has classes.

At Smith, my class consists of 12 students in a small room. We sit at tables arranged in a square. The students take three sides of the square, and the professor takes the fourth – everyone has an equally clear view of the professor.

At Amherst and Mount Holyoke, the classrooms are arranged similarly. No one sits behind anyone else.

I will use a 300-level class I am currently taking at UMass as the fourth example. This class has eight people in it, less than all the other classes from the other schools. We sit at our desks in rows facing the teacher, who stands at the blackboard.

Suffice it to say I find it hard to concentrate when the closest thing to me is the back of someone's head and the furthest thing from me is the professor, whose words are supposedly important. Other students in this class agree it is hard not to become distracted.

Putting aside the physical layout of the classroom, I notice an obvious disparity between the actual teaching methods of each school. UMass is considered a good school, and the people it hires are highly

If each department could pay at least one more professor, perhaps I would not sit in a classroom with Ben Stein saying, "Anyone? Anyone?" twice a week.

In the classes at the other schools, the professors have a tight grip on the structure of each lecture. They speak for a block of time, then stop and open the class up for questions. At UMass, the professor relies more on student participation than on his ability to expound on the material. This results in lots of silence. Although a student is expected to come to class having read the assigned material, he or she does not come prepared to teach the material, which is what my UMass class amounts to.

A possible reason why my UMass professor does not seem as prepared to teach his class as the other professors is that he is being asked to teach something not precisely within his field. Could it be possible UMass spreads its faculty too thinly, thus requiring professors to step beyond their formal education?

Granted Smith, Mount Holyoke and Amherst are small, private schools, and UMass is a big, public school. There is more money in the small schools to spread around a smaller area. Nevertheless, does UMass really not have enough money to hire a few more professors? It was able to build several new residential halls at $92 million – roughly more than 3,000 first-year teaching salaries.

Also, for $1.2 million, new Astroturf was laid in McGuirk Stadium. If each department could pay at least one more professor, perhaps I would not sit in a classroom with Ben Stein saying, "Anyone? Anyone?" twice a week.

I have taken a few classes at UMass where the professors truly demonstrated their ability to teach well. It was obvious that the material they assigned to the class was material in which they were putatively fluent in and could lecture on it for days without stopping. These classes were irreplaceably valuable, though indeed far and few between. It is no surprise either that in these classes, all the students sat close to the professor and felt far more engaged and less inclined to be distracted.

From what I have gathered from friends either attending one of the other colleges or participating in the domestic exchange program, as I am doing by studying at Smith, the classroom conditions and teaching methods are much more conducive to getting an optimal learning experience. These factors run consistently through the colleges, whereas at UMass, it is seemingly hit or miss.

David Grisman Quintet headlines Northampton's Calvin on Thursday

BY LAUREN MOOSSETTI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Have you ever heard of a style of music called "dawg"? No? Well make your way to the Calvin Theatre this Thursday, Nov. 16 and check out the David Grisman Quintet and learn for yourself what this unique music style is all about.

David Grisman has been establishing this style of music for around forty years now and he has been using musical techniques such as swing, bluegrass, latin, jazz and gypsy. He is a professional mandolinist/composer and current leader of his quintet. He now has his independent record label, which is run out of northern California, called Acoustic Disc.

Even after being told that the mandolin wasn't a real instrument, he still opted to pursue it. Grisman became infatuated with folk music in the 1960's, the time of Bob Dylan. He has played with bluegrass music legends like Jerry Garcia and Peter Rowan. He has participated in multiple music groups in wide ranges of styles that have established his own unique skill. Since his musical calling, he has been a member in many bands like the Even Dozen Jug Band (Elektra,) the Kentuckians, and Old and in the Way.

Once he generated an interest in jazz during the late 60's, he joined a band called Earth Opera. He finally found his musical foundation when he joined the Great American Music Band.

According to a Jambase article by Kathy Foster-Pattan, Grisman makes a statement about his greatest musical influence.

"Well, if I could name one person, it's hard to do. I guess I'd have to say it's Ralph Rinzler. Ralph Rinzler was my mentor; he was a mandolin player and a musicologist and a folklorist and an amazing human being who happened to come from the same town in New Jersey that I did. I met him when I was two years old, when he was in my mother's junior art school class. My mom was an art teacher. When I was about fifteen years old and getting interested in folk music, there were three of us kids who wanted to start a folk music club. We went to my favorite teacher, and she recommended her cousin, Ralph, a professional folk musician, and he came to our junior high school English class with a mandolin, a guitar, and a five-string banjo and he kind of changed my life. He's the guy who discovered Doc Watson and ran the Newport Folk Festival and was head of the Smithsonian Folk Life Institute and engineered the purchase of Folkways Records for the Smithsonian and he did some amazing things. He was Bill Monroe's [of the "Blue Grass Boys"] manager and helped promote Bill Monroe in the early 60's, and I was fortunate enough to be a kid hanging out while a lot of this stuff was going on. He was also a great mandolin player. He played with the Greenbriar Boys, which was the first bluegrass band from New York City. He did a lot of amazing things. If I had to name one influence, it would be him."

Grisman has over a dozen CD's available after his 40 years of perfecting "dawg" instrumentals. If you can't make it to the show on Thursday you have the opportunity to catch him in Troy, New York, on Saturday, November 18 at the Troy Savings Bank Music Hall.

Ticket prices range from $22.50 to $35 depending on how close you would like to get to the band. To learn more about the David Grisman Quintet, if you aren't convinced already, check them out at www.jambase.com.

The week in fashion
Accessorizing (and improving) your style

BY KELLY MCGUIRE

Everyone knows that accessories can spruce up an outfit, right? Wrong! Lots of girls are really in need of the 411 on how to make your average outfit anything but average. All it takes is a couple cute pieces of fashion jewelry, and your outfit goes from a zero to a ten in hipness in less than five minutes.

For example, take a pair of jeans and a long sleeve standard navy T-shirt from the Gap. This outfit, which is very plain and simple, can be spruced up with a few fun accessories. Let's start with some chunky bangle bracelets. You can find these at any department store. Aldo accessories store, or even online at the Claire's accessories website. The best part about these funky chunky bracelets? They're super cheap and super durable; perfect for those rough nights out on the town.

Another great accessory is earrings; any type will do. But, if you've got a cute printed dress or skirt that needs something [illegible] amp it up, some stenciled [illegible] earrings (urbanoutfitters.com has some filigree teardrop ones for only $18) can put you right up on the mark with some of the hottest trends for accessories fashion. Even better – dig into your mother and grandmother's boxes of old vintage jewelry and I bet you'll find some cute pearl or colored ball post earrings, which, believe it or not, are back on the market. A pair of cute red ball posts go great with any black, beige, or blue top.

My personal favorite? For long or short hair, wearing either a headband or scarf in your hair with a plain colored top has become each an "in" look this season. However, instead of putting the headband or scarf at the start of your hairline, right by your forehead, the new style is wearing it right on the top of your head, in the middle of your hair line. Here's the trick on how to get the look: start by pulling your hair back in a low ponytail. Take the headband or scarf and secure it on the top of your head (if you're using a scarf, bobby pins usually help keep it in place). Then, slowly pull the ponytail out and let your hair hang loose. If you have bangs or some shorter layers in the front, pull them out and let them hang over your ears and a little bit in front of your face. It's a great look when you don't have too much time to spend on your hair. Cute and simple, that's my

Holiday wreaths and therapy tours

Warm fall of and greetings. This week's feature at the Durfee Conservatory is the Tropical Rain Forest room. House Three of the conservatory. Our own Tropical Rain Forest room is an ideal relaxing space, unlike any other on campus. The rainforest collection features colorful fruiting banana trees from China and Burma, Hawaiian Papayas, South America Arabica coffee plants and Carambola fruit from Korea and Southeast Asia, just to name a few. In one corner of the greenhouse room you'll find the bamboo garden, one of Durfee's oldest stocks, stemming from the 1870's. You can actually walk under the tall shoots and meditate on a beautiful stone bench in the gardenia grove. Spend a few minutes in the house and you'll notice the air is rich in moisture and oxygen, enough so you'll soon experience a lovely, rejuvenating sensation. You'll leave feeling cleansed and pacified. Try it after a test or a particularly unpleasant day of classes. The classical music that's often playing in the room and the soothing trickling of the pond add to the mood.

Afterwards, you can stroll through the house examining its exotic array of tropical flowers, grasses and trees; each one labeled with an informative plaque. Much of the collection comes from the original Durfee houses. The large trees that border the central pond are over fifty years old. Sprouting here and there from the folds of trees and the larger ferns you'll find newly planted and colorful bromeliads. Be sure to find the beautiful and new Bird of Paradise that's on the verge of blooming. Cross the bridge over the pond and watch all the fish, or feed them if you have a quarter for the dispenser. It's surprising and fun to see how many different kinds of fish you can coax from the pond's shady recesses. See how many turtles you can find too. You'll see them lounging on the rock pillars in the middle of the pond, a perfect image of serenity. You might even be lucky enough to see a tree frog or two, new to the house this year.

Durfee has a treat this week for all of you who are searching for some peace of mind. This Friday, November 17, at noon, Director Armand Prevost will be giving a Horticultural Therapy tour of Durfee, featuring plants from various parts of Durfee's collection. The tour will feature the theme of "plants and humans in relation to 'de-stressing' and creating a better focusing of our surrounding environment" according to Armand. He'll explain how inhalation, touch and sight can all be stimulated for calming effects by specific plants in the collection. Don't miss this opportunity to learn some of nature's secrets!

Also this week Durfee is gearing up for its annual holiday plant and wreath sale, which runs from now until winter break. Durfee volunteers are being trained to make fresh, decorated holiday wreaths and holiday baskets for our patrons to buy. Stop in to watch the process and to get your very own. Of course, there will be holiday plants as well, all perfect gifts to bring home this winter. A bit more personal and unique than something from the Stop and Shop, don't you think? Don't underestimate how much a parent or relative will appreciate a plant or wreath from your school. It's like bringing home a bit of your life here at UMass for them. All proceeds will go to benefit Durfee, and remember – it is the only way Durfee gets money!

Though the next week is short for us, Durfee will be open Monday through Friday, excluding Thursday only, for your enjoyment.

Now, everyone needs hats, gloves and scarves for the winter. But, instead of mixing and matching the trio, you can find some cute sets that will go with any outfit you wear. The Gap, Old Navy, and H&M all have beanie hat, scarf, and gloves sets for reasonable prices (starting as low as $19.99 per set). A solid color such as a beige, blue, red or brown will be much more wearable with any color you have on. If you want to go funky though, try a printed set to wear for special occasions. Wool serves as the best material for these sets: it's long lasting, warm and comfy!

Pashmina's are one of the cheapest and most wearable all season round. These shawls are great to throw on to keep your neck and warm against the chill of severe winter weather. Where can you find them? On about every corner of every block of 5th Avenue in New York City. They sell for about five dollars each, in any color you could imagine. If you can't make it to NYC to do a little vendor shopping for some winter scarves, no big deal, go online to www.peachcouture.com, where you'll find silk, suede, fur, cashmere, and any other kind of Pashmina you want, each for a very reasonable price. (Hurry! If you go and visit the website now, they are having a special promotional sale—$9.95 per Pashmina!)

Jewelry and other accesories are the new "in" for fall fashion season.

Accessories are vital for every season and don't you hot fashionistas forget it. You wear the accessories, they don't wear you.

Rock your style.

Junk food wars in school

A New Jersey high school student picks at her sandwich. New food regulations in certain cafeterias have teachers who keep an eye on students' eating habits.

BY GIOVANNA FABIANO
THE RECORD (HACKENSACK, N.J.)

HACKENSACK, N.J. – Everyone agrees that french fries cooked the traditional way, in the deep fryer, aren't the healthiest of foods.

But should the all-American staple and its counterpart in grease, the cheeseburger, be banned from school cafeterias?

With many school districts making sweeping changes to conform to new nutritional guidelines and policies, some schools are taking a hard line against sugary and fatty foods, while others believe in giving children options.

Across the country, two camps have formed around this debate: Should schools impose healthful meals on kids or allow them to make their own choices?

Proponents of food regulations point out that as more individuals and institutions lobby for healthy food options, more manufacturers are reformulating their products and providing nutritious alternatives.

Patty Hulbert would prefer if her two daughters, ages 7 and 9, had no choice but to order healthy lunches at Lafayette Elementary School in Wayne, N.J.

"I'm not there to watch what they're picking, and if kids are left to choose on their own, they'll pass up the healthy foods for the unhealthy ones just because they're there," Hulbert said.

Hulbert and her family changed its eating habits last year, when 9-year-old Brittany was diagnosed with diabetes.

These days, Brittany tries to make the best lunch choices, but it's a daily challenge.

"When they serve French toast sticks with syrup for lunch, I'll try to take something else, or else after school when I come home, I eat," Brittany said. "But there's a whole rack of chips and candy, so the rest of the kids eat that instead of the bowl of fruit."

Nutrition experts believe that eating healthful foods at a young age carries over to adulthood.

Though Mahwah High School in New Jersey still serves fries, the school lunchroom also has a deli counter and a full salad bar.

"I think kids by nature will select the things they like even if they're not healthy, so we should provide healthy meals for them," said Principal John Pascale.

At Elmwood Park (N.J.) Memorial High School and Middle School, Principal Richard Tomko said it's important to give his students choices.

The school lunch, provided by Pennsylvania Food Service, consists of a wide variety of foods, including salads, wraps, fresh fruit, hamburgers, fries and pizza. In line with the new regulations, the portions are smaller as opposed to "super-sized."

Tomko said his philosophy on several aspects of education, including dress code and discipline, also applies to nutrition.

"Everything we do, we have to prepare students to make choices in their adult lives, and it's the same with eating," Tomko said.

"We see the kids for almost the same amount of time their parents do, so we try to coax them into making healthy choices, but we shouldn't forbid them to have certain foods," he said.

Instead of limiting choice, the school offers healthy alternatives and administrators try to do their part by keeping an eye on students' eating habits.

"We feel strongly about controlling obesity and staying healthy, so when we're walking around the cafeteria and we see the same kid eating french fries or pizza every day, we take them aside and make some suggestions," Tomko said.

Erik Peterson, spokesman for the School Nutrition Association, said schools shouldn't stop serving foods that are generally seen as unhealthy, instead, they should remove the bad ingredients.

Family Guy is for eyes, not thumbs

BY NICK RUDMAN
DAILY BRUIN (UCLA)

LOS ANGELES — "Family Guy" is a show that has certainly been better known for its superb comedic content than its decidedly average look. To ardent fans of the show (myself included), this is not a problem. We'll take funny jokes over slick animation any day.

It's interesting, then, that in "The Family Guy Video Game," what stands out is not the "content" (the writing and the plot), but the appearance. As perhaps expected, the game resembles a 3-D version of the show -- but the sharp lines and bright colors of the world of "Family Guy" make for a gaming experience that, at the very least, is visually engaging.

But just because it's fun to look at a perfect reproduction of the streets of Quahog doesn't mean it's fun to play through them. Repetitive, often frustrating gameplay combines with story lines and dialogue (which should be a major strength of this game) that feel rehashed and reheated from the show to form a mostly disappointing final product.

"The Family Guy Video Game" lets the player take control of three characters -- Stewie, Brian and Peter -- each of whom is working towards his own typically skewed goal. Also, each has his own special ability: Stewie can shoot enemies with his ray gun, Brian can don disguises and sneak around, and Peter can unleash a number of hand-to-hand combat moves to dispatch the townspeople of Quahog, who he thinks are being brainwashed by TV's Mr. Belvedere.

While controlling the funniest main characters is novel, their respective storylines feel too similar to material that has been featured on the show in the past, such as Stewie's quest to stop his half-brother Bertram from taking over the world (sound familiar?). The content is adequate, but taking into account what the writers of "Family Guy" are capable of producing, it could be hilarious.

A story that relies too much on the show's ideas wouldn't hurt the "Family Guy" video game so much if the actual act of playing the game was more enjoyable — or even a little enjoyable. Although some situations really put the subversive spirit of the show to good interactive use — such as Stewie's periodic ability to use mind control on characters such as Quagmire -- the game ultimately gets bogged down in frustrating side-scrolling conventions. It's fun to fight your way through the many incarnations of Lois in Peter's brain once, but not three or more times, which is what it will take. A poorly constructed point-of-view system that often doesn't let the player see what's coming next and mind-boggling "rules" for dispatching enemies (why can Peter kill an old lady with a punch but not a devastating triple-kick?) don't help things.

The "Family Guy" video game is not offensively bad; it just could be a lot funnier, and more significantly, much more fun to play. Sure, this game might not create any new fans of the show, but remember -- two years ago, we were living in a world without "Family Guy." If the existence of a mediocre side-scroller is a necessary by-product of having new episodes of the show, that's fine with me. But when it comes to deciding what to put in my PS2, I'll stick with a "Family Guy" DVD.

"It's great to get a couple of wins under our belt," Mills said. "It's definitely going to be a confidence-builder. We're going to look back at these games throughout the season and say, 'Hey, when we stayed composed good things happen.' So, this is great for us."

"I think now we have high expectations of what we can do on the court and if we don't get things done then we'll be very disappointed," Mills added. "But I feel like right now we're going down a great road."

Helping carry UMass down that road is 5-foot-5 freshman Kim Benton.

The pint-sized point guard doesn't have the overwhelming stature of your typical college hoops player, but what she lacks in height, she more than makes up for with her mean jump shot.

Benton registered 11 points in her first collegiate home-opener, draining four of the seven field goals she attempted. For the second straight game she was a wizard from behind the perimeter as three of those four buckets went for three points.

"It feels great. This is a huge game because they killed us last year, so all day we were talking about it and were ready to go," Benton said. "We're all really happy but we have a lot to work on. We have a lot of weaknesses. Our defense was OK, but we still need to work on that. But, with a W, it works out."

"We came into the game knowing we wanted to get this win," Alisha Tatham said. "We just wanted to make sure that we had a good start to our season. It gives us more confidence."

The junior guard sank two of five attempted shots (including a three-pointer) and went 1-for-2 in free throws, tallying six points.

The Brampton, Ontario native also used her 5-foot-11 frame to pull down five boards on the night.

"I think [my performance] could have been a little bit better," Tatham commented. "I had a few turnovers, but I tried get on the boards a lot more, so I was happy about that. I just tried to take shots when I was open. I was trying to do whatever the team needed."

Despite their happiness over the victory, however, Dacko, Mills, Benton and Tatham all brought up the very same thing: the team needs to make improvements.

"We're a work in progress," Dacko said. "We got a lot to do. We could use a lot of improvement. By no stretch are we good right now."

The Minutewomen hope to touch up on some weak points for the upcoming weekend where they will face Navy, followed by the winner of the Seton Hall-Howard game in the Aeropostale Basketball Classic.

After losing four-year starting point guard Katie Nelson to graduation, the tandem of Young and Benton need to step up and fill the critical position. So far, the duo of underclassmen has played well, Young demonstrating her defensive abilities, and Benton with the hot hand off the bench.

The rookie from Springfield, Pa. is not unfamiliar with playing at a high level; after leading her Cardinal O'Hara High School to a No. 15 USA Today national ranking and back-to-back league championships.

"It's kind of a big adjustment, but not really," said Benton. "I played with four other Division I players so I'm used to sharing the ball. I wasn't the best player on my team . . . so it was easy to come [to UMass] and adjust to not being the best player on the team."

Before the season, UMass coach Marnie Dacko highlighted the strength of the team as the inside game, and playing off that inside game to open up scoring opportunities on the perimeter. Both UVM and UNH failed to compete with the Minutewomen inside, and Benton recognizes that her role on the team is to distribute the ball effectively and stick to the game plan of penetrating and setting up high-percentage shots in the paint.

"Right now my role is coming in off the bench and controlling the game and not turning the ball over, and if I'm open, hitting the shot," she said. "Basically just playing the game I know how to play."

Benton is fully aware that her game has plenty of room for improvement at this early stage in the season.

"Defensively, I have to work on pressuring the guards and on offense, knowing the right decisions to [distribute] the ball effectively," Benton said.

The point guard position will be a flexible one, as Mills, and junior guard Pam Rosanio both have the ability to bring the ball up the court.

Junior guard Alisha Tatham is confident that the Minutewomen have the depth and talent to fill the critical point guard position.

"I think [the point guard position] is going to be really huge," Tatham said. "I think [Sakera Young] is improving on her leadership, and I think Kim is coming in and doing a great job as a freshman. If [they] are making sure that everyone stays together on the floor and rallies together, then they will be successful."

Benton's pedigree only furthers the confidence that her teammates and coaches have for her continued growth and improvement.

"I think she's a winner," said Dacko. "She came from a great program, she's had great coaching in her blood and she understands the game. For her size, she makes up for it in her heart, and she can knock [them] down when it's important."

If Benton continues stroking threes like she has in her first two career games, her height will be the last thing on anyone's mind.

Cahoon downplays early national ranking be the game-winning goal.

During the game, the goal was credited to Braun, with the assist going to Fenton, but after the game, the official score was changed, and the goal was given to Kevin Jarman, who had tipped the puck in front of the net.

The play was difficult to see because of the traffic in front of the net, but the score went to the books as Jarman's second goal of the season, with Braun getting his second assist.

Jarman was heard outside the locker room after the game saying he felt bad about the situation, but had honestly tipped the puck.

The occurrence probably would have disappeared in the stat sheets, but the same thing happened Friday against Northeastern.

Again, Braun sent a slap shot from the point that beat Northeastern goalie Brad Thiessen for the game-winner in the third frame. Braun was on the stat-tracker as having earned his first career goal again.

However, further review showed that sophomore Chris Davis had actually redirected the shot in front of the net, and Braun's goal was changed again to an assist.

Two freshmen getting regular time – Martin Nolet and Will Ortiz - have each scored a goal this season (excluding freshman netminder Dan Meyers), so Braun and center Brett Watson are the only rookies still waiting for their first moment of glory.

FUN AT THE PODIUM

Cahoon had some fun after Friday's game with two of his players at the postgame press conference. Davis and goaltender Jon Quick were sitting next to Cahoon talking about the win.

The pair fielded a number of questions about the team being in first place in Hockey East, the improvement over last season's rough start, and the possible jump into the spotlight of the national rankings.

Cahoon, clearly trying to cool the buzz about the early success, interjected twice to answer questions, drawing chuckles from everyone in the room.

After Quick and Davis both spoke about the improved start to the season, Cahoon chimed in, saying, "And I need to remind everyone that we're only one-fifth of the way through the regular season…It's a nice start, and that's all it is. We've got a lot of good hockey ahead of us."

Responding to another question about the recognition of being nationally ranked, Cahoon jumped in quickly, asking his players, "You mind if I answer this one fellas?"

The pair laughed as Quick said, "Yeah, go ahead coach."

With past experience handling the pressure of success (UMass reached the Hockey East finals at the end of the 2003-04 season), Cahoon is trying his best to dispel any thoughts of looking too far ahead or becoming overconfident before anything has been accomplished.

RETURN TO THE TOP

Right winger Alex Berry returned to the ice for the first time this season after sitting out the first six games due to an undisclosed violation of team rules.

Cahoon clearly was not concerned with his forward being rusty. Berry played on the first line along with center and captain Matt Anderson and left winger P.J. Fenton. He did not earn any points in his first game back, but he did get one shot on goal.

Freshman Will Ortiz and junior Zech Klann had seen time on the top line before Berry's return. Ortiz returned to the third line, where he had played most of the season, with Watson and Kevin Jarman.

Klann played Friday's game on the fourth line with assistant captain Mark Matheson and sophomore Scott Crowder.

Berry is the final player on the early-season list of suspended skaters to return to action. Jon Quick, Mark Matheson, and Chris Capraro were all held out of games this year for undisclosed reasons.

Quick and Matheson missed a single game, the season opener against Sacred Heart. Capraro missed four games, returning for the first game of a home-and-home series against Providence, a game in which the senior notched a pair of goals and an assist.

UMass to focus on smarter swimming

By Joe Mellone
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The light at the end of the tunnel for both the men's and women's Massachusetts swimming and diving teams is the Atlantic 10 Championships, slated for Feb. 21-24 in Buffalo, N.Y.

The St. Bonaventure Bonnies unseated the Minutemen last season from their position as A-10 Champions – this was the first season UMass failed to claim the title since the 1999-2000 season. UMass coach Russ Yarworth blamed the team's loss on a smugness that developed after winning five-consecutive conference championships.

"Part of the problem was definitely the complacency of champions," Yarworth said at the beginning of the season. "That won't be a problem this year; I've been training them hard since they got here."

The cure for this smug approach in the pool was to train – and train and train. Not just from meet to meet, but from practice to practice. The Minutemen (2-1) needed to become better swimmers, the times weren't necessarily all that mattered – becoming smarter swimmers was of the utmost importance.

"One thing I always preach to them is to become students of the sports," Yarworth said. "I've got a group of kids right now that is real engaged in the sport and desperate to improve."

There certainly hasn't been any hangover of this complacency. The Minutemen's only loss this season came from the Army Black Knights, 155-145 – last season Army pummeled the Minutemen 178.5-64.5.

FRESHMAN FIRSTS

Freshman Andrew Willbrant's victory in the 200-yard backstroke Saturday certainly raised some eyebrows. A weak Terrier backstroke unit allowed Yarworth to utilize senior backstroke specialist Evan Swisher's talents elsewhere.

Willbrant finished the race at 1:58.41 to register his first collegiate victory.

At the beginning of the season, it was unclear whether or not Willbrant would be available to the Minutemen.

"We're still waiting for [Willbrant] to clear eligibility due to an error at his high school," Yarworth said before the season. "But Andrew is showing us some real promise in the pool."

With his first victory under his belt, Willbrant's confidence should start to rise, providing UMass with an even deeper backstroking unit.

Not to be outdone, freshman Kathryne Chaliklis also collected the first win of her career in the 100-yard freestyle event against BU. Her time of 54.76 seconds bested that of teammate Allison Volpe.

Chaliklis has consistently finished in the top three spots of races this season. However, UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb foresaw the emergence of Chaliklis as a top performer this season.

"Kathryne Chaliklis, in a variety of events, can step right in and be one of our top performers," Newcomb said. "She's very versatile and should be able to step in and do a lot of good things for us."

MINUTEWOMEN DIVERS REACH NEW DEPTHS

When the 2006-07 season started, everyone in the A-10 knew Karen Upperco would be one of the conference's best divers. She won A-10 Most Outstanding Diver her freshman season and has only improved since.

Before Saturday, the sophomore was yet to suffer her first defeat as a sophomore. However, something positive certainly came from the loss at BU.

Senior Mary Jenkins finished in second place behind BU's top diver Alex Crerar. She lost the one-meter dive by just .3 of a point in her best showing of the season.

Upperco's dominance this season is a main reason for the Minutewomen's success, but the consistent contributions from Jenkins have certainly factored into the team's accomplishments as well.

Senior Melissa Pond's solid contributions to the UMass team score this weekend also must have pleased UMass diving coach Mandy Hixon. Heading into the weekend Hixon knew BU's divers would pose the toughest task of the young season. Upperco's loss had to be a disappointment for Hixon, but the performance of the rest of her divers is a huge lift for the Minutewomen squad.

Minutewomen can't be beat

UNH no match for undefeated UMass

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

Sam the Minuteman was there. The band was there. The Maroon and White cheerleaders were there as well. Almost everyone associated with what makes up the essence of UMass athletics was on-hand as the Massachusetts women's basketball team opened its home schedule with a 60-38 trumping of New Hampshire last night.

The Minutewomen are now 2-0 on the year – the first time they have done that since the 2002-03 season.

"I'm happy that we came out and established ourselves on the boards as well as defensively," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We controlled the boards. I think they thought they were going to come in and walk all over us. That was a team that beat us a year ago pretty badly, pretty easily."

The defeat that Dacko is referring to is the 59-43 whooping that UNH unleashed on the Minutewomen on Dec. 4 last season, handing UMass its 13th loss of the disappointing 11-17 season.

Junior forward Kate Mills led the Minutewomen by going 5-for-10 from the field and 6-for-7 from the free throw line, totaling at 16 points.

She used the 36 minutes she played to her advantage, adding five offensive rebounds, five defensive rebounds and three blocked shots on the night.

Benton stars with 11 points off the bench

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

Standing at just 5-foot-5, freshman point guard Kim Benton is the shortest member of the Massachusetts women's basketball team. Forgive the spectators if they have failed to notice that particular statistic. Her sweet stroke is just too distracting.

Against UNH last night, Benton came off the bench in relief of sophomore point guard Sakera Young, tallying 11 points, four assists and two rebounds in 23 minutes of play. After sinking two of three attempts from behind the arc in the season opener at UVM, Benton went 3-for-5 from long range last night in the Minutewomen's 60-38 victory at the Mullins Center.

Benton is only one piece in the early success story of the Maroon and White bench. Along with junior center Whitney McDonald and sophomore guard Stefanie Gerardot, Benton and the second unit had outscored UNH's bench 16-0 by the end of the first half.

Contributions like that from the bench will be particularly important from the Minutewomen, as they only carry 11 players on their roster.

While junior forward Kate Mills put up her second double-double in as many games, Benton garnered the most attention after the final buzzer sounded. So far on the young season, Benton is 6-for-11 from the floor (good for a .545 percentage, tied with Mills for best on the team) and is a particularly unpressive 5-for-8 from

See BENTON on page 8

Junior forward Kate Mills recorded her second straight double-double in last night's 60-38 win over New Hampshire at the Mullins Center. Mills had a game-high 16 points and 10 rebounds, and was 5-for-10 from the field in the Minutewomen's home opener.

Former manager gets his due

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Every athlete who has sat on the end of the bench appreciated the end of Saturday's Massachusetts men's basketball game. With 19 seconds left in regulation, Dante Milligan ripped down a defensive board and the Minutemen took off for the offensive end. By that time, the game was over. UMass had a 96-61 lead over the Dartmouth Big Green and fans were filing out of the Mullins Center. But the crowd began to stir when the ball entered the offensive end. Matt Pennie, the team manager from last season who walked onto the squad this year, was on the floor, and the crowd desperately wanted a basket from the new guy. They got it. With one second left, Pennie hit a fade away jump shot from the left baseline, putting a nice polish on a big win in the season opener.

Mayben grabs Co-Rookie of the Week

The Atlantic 10 named UMass freshman guard Tiki Mayhen the Co-Rookie of the Week after his 12-point, 11-assist performance in Saturday's season opener against Dartmouth. Mayben shared the honor with Marcus Johnson from Dayton. Mayben shot 5-of-9 from the floor and gathered two steals and one rebound in the game. Mayben's 11 assists tied a Mullins Center assist record set in 1998 by Monty Mack.

Lasme up to old tricks

Senior co-captain Stephane Lasme led the Atlantic 10 in blocks last season, averaging 3.9 blocks per game for the 2005-06 campaign. Against the Big Green on Saturday, Lasme got off to a similar start. In 21 minutes of action, the big man scored seven points, grabbed six rebounds and registered five blocked shots. Lasme has recorded five blocks or more in a game 15 times and registered seven such games last season as a junior. Lasme has tallied 236 blocks for his career, 100 behind the all-time leader, Marcus Camby. Lasme recorded 108 blocked shots last season and it will take a similar effort this year to reach Camby's mark. Lasme's 108 blocks last season were second all-time for a single season, behind Camby's 128 blocks that he tallied during the 1995-96 campaign. Senior co-captain Rashaun Freeman had an efficient opening night. He went 12-of-16 from the field, scoring 25 points and grabbing 10 rebounds. It was the 31st double-double of his career. Freeman notched 11 double-doubles last season, the last being against Dayton on Feb. 25. Saturday was the 20th time Freeman has scored over 20 points in a game. He had seven 20-plus point games during the 2005-06 season. His 10 rebounds on Saturday made it the 33rd time Freeman has pulled down 10 or more rebounds in a game.

Life tees off

Last season, James Life took 202 3-pointers and made just 61 of them, totaling 30 percent on the year from behind the arc. This season, Life made his trigger-happy debut on Saturday when he took seven 3's and made five of them. Freshman Ricky Harris made his UMass debut on Saturday, and scored eight points in 12 minutes of play backing up Mayben at the point. Harris went 3-for-5 from the floor and snagged one rebound. Harris will see his minutes reduced this weekend when Chris Lowe returns from his suspension. UMass utilized both a half-court trap and a full-court trap against Dartmouth Saturday, and UMass coach Travis Ford emphasized that his team will do more pressing this season because of the new manpower. The Minutemen showed a full-court, man-to-man press as well as 1-2-2 half-court trap. Ford threw some defensive wrinkles, putting Lasme at the top of the defense one time because of his length and athleticism.

Different lineups

Ford featured several different lineups on Saturday, and with the transfers and freshmen he has a lot of shuffling to do over the next couple of weeks. Mayben, Gary Forbes, Etienne Brower, Luke Bonner and Harris are all playing games together for the first time. It will take some time for everyone to fall into a rhythm and for Ford to find a rotation that he feels comfortable with. Harris, Mayben and Forbes shared the point guard duties. Harris and Mayhen rotated in for James Life at the two guard when Life needed a breather. Forbes and Brandon Thomas shared time at small forward, and Thomas saw limited time as the power forward when the Minutemen went small with their lineup. Bonner, Lasme, Freeman, and Dante Milligan manned the power forward and center positions on Saturday night.

See W. BASKETBALL on page 8

UMass Basketball

Senior walk-on forward Matt Pennie hit a jump shot at the final buzzer in Saturday's 98-61 season-opening win over Dartmouth.

Senior forward Stephane Lasme had a game-high five blocked shots in Saturday's win. He now has a total of 236 blocks in his UMass career.

Minutemen ranked No. 20 in the nation

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

All that hard work is paying off early in the season for the Massachusetts hockey team. The Minutemen are beginning to receive recognition around the nation as a force this season.

On Monday, the Mass Attack broke into the USCHO/CSTV Division I men's poll. No. 20 UMass defeated Northeastern 2-1 Friday to improve its record to 5-1-1 overall and 4-1 in Hockey East. The Minutemen replaced Colorado College (5-4-1), which was idle over the weekend.

UMass Don Cahoon has stressed that the rankings are meaningless this early in the season since the team first received votes two weeks ago. However, he is proud of the accomplishment.

UMass is the fifth member of Hockey East to join the Top 20. Maine (1), Boston College (7), Boston University (9) and New Hampshire (10) have been ranked since the preseason.

The Maroon and White also received consideration in the USA Today/USA Hockey Magazine's men's hockey poll. UMass was the 20th vote-getter in that poll as well, although the poll only ranks the top 15 teams.

So Close From So Far Away

Defenseman Justin Braun seems to have done everything right so far this season for the Mass Attack. The freshman has tallied four assists in seven games working in the second line of defensemen with junior David Leaderer.

However, two of his assists were originally ruled a goal, which would have been the first of Braun's young collegiate career.

On a third period power play against New Hampshire, Braun sent a laser from the point that beat goaltender Kevin Regan for what would Sophomore Topher Bevis and the Minutemen are now ranked No. 20 in the nation. The Mass Attack is riding a three-game winning streak.

Sports Fact of the Day

Brandon Webb's victory total (16) is the lowest by a starting pitcher who won the Cy Young Award in a full season. Pedro Martinez (1997) and Randy Johnson (1999) held the previous lows with 17 wins.

Earthquake hits coast of Japan

Japan's Meteorological Agency officer Takeshi Hachimine points to the earthquake's centre on a map of Russia's Kuril

A woman points to seismograph readings. A huge earthquake shook an isolated island chain north of Japan, triggering a Pacific-wide tsunami warning.

By Matt Belliveau
Collegian Staff

Thousands of people living along northern Japan's Pacific coast were forced to flee their homes Wednesday after a tsunami alert warning of waves up to seven feet high was issued following a powertul underwater earthquake.

Crisis was averted after reports showed the quake sent waves no taller than 16 inches to the shores of Japan's northernmost island of Hokkaido.

The waves got progressively smaller, though the Japan Meteorological Agency said one measuring 23 inches hit Tokachi port in south Hokkaido almost four hours after the quake. All tsunami alerts and watches were called off at 11:30 a.m. EST.

The Pacific Tsunami Warning Center said sea level readings indicated a tsunami was generated but had not observed any major waves along the coast.

The alert was sounded shortly after a massive earthquake with a preliminary magnitude 8.1 hit the Kuril Islands just north of Japan early Wednesday morning, local time.

Temblors of magnitude 7 or higher are generally classified as major earthquakes, capable of widespread, heavy damage.

The land has seemingly dodged a disaster similar to the 9.1-magnitude quake that hit off the coast of Indonesia on Dec. 26, 2004, caused a tsunami that left more than 280,000 people dead or missing in 12 countries around the Indian Ocean.

University of Massachusetts geochemistry professor John Rhodes said while the conditions were similar to Indonesia, numerous factors come into play in the cause of a tsunami.

"Not every earthquake, even if it's underwater, causes a tsunami. To produce a tsunami, a lot depends on the nature of the movement in the earthquake," said Rhodes.

Anti-Feminist speech disrupted by students

A lecture by Dr. Mike Adams, "How to Win friends and Irritate Feminists" was interrupted by protesting students.

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

Dr. Mike Adams got under the skin of many women when he came to UMass Wednesday to deliver his lecture "How to Win Friends and Irritate Feminists." But by the end of the night, the spotlight was focused on a male member of the audience.

Members of the audience, which included members of the Radical Student Union and the Independent Socialist Organization, interrupted Dr. Adams' lecture on many occasions, even asking Dr. Adams to "shut up" on one occasion.

A number of males who were dressed in women's clothing in protest of Dr. Adams' views on women's role in society, and his harsh criticism of feminist movements at universities for taking advantage of harassment speech codes to silence their critics.

The sporadic interruptions and tension throughout the speech culminated, however, when Charles Peterson, a member of the Independent Socialist Organization, did not adhere to the question and answer format after Dr. Adams had finished his lecture.

Peterson took the microphone and began to go off on a number of issues that he disagreed with Dr. Adams on, but

Frat Row demolished, deal is imminent

UMass alums celebrate razing

By Eric Athas

Frat Row is officially no more.

The five houses on North Pleasant Street have been demolished, and the sale of the parcels to the University of Massachusetts is imminent, according to an official involved in the deal, who celebrated the demolition this past weekend.

The houses, which were built in the 1890's and early 1900's, were razed one-by-one over the last three weeks. The razing is part of a purchase-and-sales agreement between UMass and Alpha Tau Gamma, Inc., the company which currently owns the land. After ATG, Inc. seeds the land, the University will buy it for $2.5 million.

"All of the houses are gone," said Jim Mulcahy, treasurer of ATG.

The history of the century-old Amherst houses

The recent demolition of the five houses on North Pleasant Street brings the University of Massachusetts one step closer to owning what is known to many as Frat Row. The five buildings were constructed over 100 years ago, but the land will eventually be used to build a classroom/office building, according to UMass officials. Below is a timeline of the history of the five houses on North Pleasant St.

Circa 1865

The land was owned by Mount Pleasant Seminary, which was a private school. The school owned all of the land from East Pleasant Street to North Pleasant Street. Shortly following the Civil War, the seminary went out of business.

1890s-1905

Professors bought the land and built the five houses.

1930

After the Great Depression kicked in, the professors who owned the land decided to rent the houses out to fraternities and sororities. The Alpha Tau Gamma fraternity members were one of the fraternities which lived in one of the houses.

1940

The Alpha Tau Gamma fraternity forms a non-profit corporation.

1940

ATG, Inc. purchases 375 North Pleasant St. house.

1969

ATG, Inc. purchases the house at 387 North Pleasant St.

1970

1976

ATG, Inc. purchases strip of land that connected 387 to 401 North Pleasant St., which was owned by a professor.

1985

1987

ATG, Inc. purchases the fifth and final house at 395 North Pleasant St. The company then decided to begin renting the houses out to other fraternities and sororities.

Early 2000

ATG, Inc. contemplates knocking down all five houses and building one Alpha Tau Gamma house, which would house members of its fraternity.

2002

Instead of building a new house on North Pleasant Street, ATG, Inc decides to pursue the purchase of the house located at 118 Sunset Ave. because of the size and superiority of it.

Student becomes physical in protest

By Chris Cluff
Collegian Correspondent

North Carolina professor of Criminology and frequent conservative columnist for TownHall.com Mike Adams spoke yesterday to a group of students in a speech entitled "How to make friends and irritate feminists."

During the question and answer portion of a speech hosted by the University of Massachusetts Republican club, tensions between students protesting the event and the Republican club erupted when a student from the Republican club forcibly removed a microphone from a member of National Socialist Organization who was using the opportunity to promote an upcoming rally. Students on all sides of the political divide were upset by these actions, feeling that it put the whole event in a bad light.

"I think it's a dang shame that we couldn't have a dialog," said Berra Denow, a first year student from Hampshire College who came to protest the speech.

Denow, who considers himself to be a progressive democrat, feels that while that the majority of the students protesting Adams' speech were there to take part the debate in a calm and reasonable manner, a few were not.

"It's about freedom of speech, and changing people's minds is about having a dialog. The best thing you can do for your side is to represent yourself well, and I think most of the people in this audience were doing that, there were just a few crazy people who came up, ranted and got off topic, and I think that's a dang shame," said Denow.

The UMass Republican club was not happy about the actions that took place either. The secretary of the UMass Republican Club, Brian Gwozdz said "a member from our club, Ben Duffy, grabbed the microphone out of his hand, which I feel was wrong."

New voting machines under close watch

By Debleena Mitra
Collegian Staff

One of the most controversial topics in this year's mid-term election is the use of electronic voting.

Direct recording electronic (DRE) voting machines make up a computer-based system allowing citizens to vote by simply pushing a button or, in some cases, touching a screen.

These machines are replacing the paper system that requires a voter to manually fill out a ballot and submit it into a sealed ballot box.

According to the Wall Street Journal, "55 million voters will be casting ballots on new voting systems this election, and 22 million of them will be using touch-screen machines."

The new electronic method presents many opportunities but also introduces threats that could potentially ruin an entire election.

One result of electronic voting is that it would speed up the electoral process. Votes of the congressional and gubernatorial elections will be tallied up by the computers almost immediately and results can be known very soon after polls close.

The Congressional Research Service's 2001 report Voting Technologies states that "systems in which ballots are counted electronically as they are submitted in the precinct can probably produce the most rapid results."

Another helpful aspect of electronic voting is that it may be able to help disabled voters cast their ballots in private instead of needing assistance to fill out the paper.

"Tens of millions of Americans can and will vote secretly and independently if, and only if, they use a touch-screen voting machine," said Vice President of American Association of People with Disabilities Jim Dickinson.

The process of electronic voting was first experimented with in the 1970s. However after the "hanging chad" debacle that occurred during

Graduate Lounge serves up relaxation

By Derrick Perkins
Collegian Staff

Directly responsible for the day to day operation and steady success of the Graduate Lounge at the Lincoln Campus Center, Assistant Manager of Retail Services Andrew Boyle is trying to foster an atmosphere of responsible drinking and provide a location for University faculty, students and staff to relax without having to leave campus.

"What we are looking to do is provide all 21-plus members of the campus community with a place they can go and relax, have a beer and enjoy that sort of social atmosphere that you get at a pub," he said.

Boyle has implemented a number of policies designed to maintain a responsible drinking environment at the Graduate Lounge, including carding anyone who enters the strictly 21-plus zone and holding a zero tolerance policy towards the bartending staff when it comes to not adhering to either the law or the rules set down by Retail Dining Services.

Wristbands are used during any all-ages events held in the lounge, such as the weekly poker tournaments, to prevent underage drinking. Boyle plans on eventually bringing in an ID scanner to the lounge and cites and presence of both the state police on campus and an in-building security force at the Campus Center as methods of added security.

"It's just vigilance," Boyle said. "And hiring professionals and having a staff that is dedicated to making sure that people are not served when they are too intoxicated or making sure that people who are not 21 are not let into the premises."

Boyle also cited the proximity of the lounge to bus stops and the central location on campus as an added advantage to maintaining a safe environment for the patrons of the bar.

The Graduate Lounge inside the Lincoln Campus Center attributes the bar's steady success to the overall atmosphere of the bar, a combination of the laid-back feel of a bar and the collegial environment of the campus.

Syringe found on High school grounds

3:00 p.m.

A syringe was found on school grounds at Amherst Regional High School on Mattoon Street by a school nurse. It was later destroyed.

Car fatally strikes deer

5:00 p.m.

A 1999 Toyota Camry struck a deer on East Pleasant Street. The deer jumped in front of the vehicle and destroyed the fog light of the car. The deer was left immobile and was relieved of its pain and suffering.

Cars collide on Triangle St.

6:32 p.m.

Two cars collided at the Triangle Street intersection. The vehicles, a 1996 Ford Taurus and a 2003 Honda Civic, were both slightly damaged. No one was injured.

Woman denied entrance into Delano's

11:47 p.m.

A female attempted to find a way into Delano's Bar on North Pleasant Street with a California license that was supposedly someone else. The female proceeded to bang on the door of the bar, demanding she be let in after the doorman asked for a backup identification. The doorman asked the female to leave, call the police and come back the following day. The female has not yet contacted the police.

2:19 a.m.

Randall Douglas Grenier, 26, of South Hadley, was arrested for unarmed assault, intent to rob, intent to commit a crime and assault and battery. Grenier was brought home from a house party in Ware by a male and two females, one of whom he had met online. At the party, Grenier became loud and unruly, and was asked to leave. On the ride home, Grenier attempted to grab one of the females and steal her cell phone, so she would not call the police. He also tried to steal the driver's wallet. Grenier was dropped off on West Street, where police arrested him and brought him from the Amherst Police Department to the Hampshire County Jail and House of Correction on Rocky Hill Road.

cally active areas, and the country accounts for about 20 percent of the world's earthquakes of magnitude 6 or greater.

"That whole western side of the Pacific has a lot of earthquakes," said Rhodes.

A 7.8-magnitude earthquake off Hokkaido in July 1993 produced a tsunami with waves of up to 30 meters and killed at least 185 people.

In October 2004, an earthquake with a magnitude of 6.8 struck the northern prefecture of Niigata, killing about 40 people and injuring more than 3,000. In that quake a high-speed bullet train, renowned for a record of being free of major accidents, was derailed for the first time when it was hit by the quake, although there were no fatalities.

The Japan Meteorological Agency issues tsunami warnings even when only tiny waves are expected and the country's most heavily populated coastlines are fitted with loudspeakers to order tsunami evacuations. Hirokawa, a coastal town in western Japan, holds annual shouting competitions for tsunami warnings.

UM hosts environmental lecture

By Alyssa F. Marcus
Collegian Correspondent

The Environmental Institute at University of Massachusetts finished its Fall 2006 Environmental Lecture Series Monday with a talk entitled, "Are High Energy Prices Good for the Climate?"

The lecturer, Richard G. Newell, a senior fellow at nonprofit research organization Resources for the Future, spoke extensively about today's oil and gas prices. For example, he said that every $10 per barrel of gas equals 25 cents at the pump.

The current price of gas is about $60 per barrel, and the cost has tripled since 2002. However, according to Newell, this is not the highest that gas has ever cost.

"Current oil prices are not at their historic peak, which was in 1981 after the Iran-Iraq war and the Iranian revolution. Oil prices peaked there at about $87 per barrel," said Newell.

Newell explained that there are several causes for the rise in price, such as the slow surfacing of new supplies and a limited surplus production capacity.

Typically, the capacity is 2-4 million barrels per day. Over the last three years, it has only been 1-1.5 million barrels per day.

However, Newell also explained that hurricanes Katrina and Rita are not to blame for the rise in gas prices, as many people think.

"The biggest impact of that actually wasn't on crude oil markets. Even though virtually all of the oil production in the Gulf of Mexico was shut down, it had very little effect on global oil prices because the U.S. contribution to the global oil market is not that large," said Newell.

Newell says that one of the effects of the energy price increases is that the demand for energy has been reduced, which is good for the climate. Another effect is an increased investment in conventional and alternative supply sources.

The talk lasted for about 45 minutes, with a few questions at the end. There was also a short reception afterward.

The Environmental Institute's Spring 2007 Lecture Series will be on Food Systems and the Environment.

Senior member of Resources for the future, Richard G. Newell.

Conservative speech cut short

Ben Duffy, a member of the UMass Republican Club, which was referred to by one student as the "goon squad," made physical contact with Peterson after he was asked numerous times to ask a question, but refused.

After Peterson refused to relinquish the microphone or ask a question, Duffy made contact with Peterson and forcefully ripped the microphone from his hands. It was at this point that Dr. Adams left the podium and abruptly ended the question and answer session, leaving many students still in line behind Peterson to ask a question.

Duffy asked not to be quoted.

"I wanted to point out numerous illogical inconsistencies [in his speech]," Peterson said. "This is a man who is a racist and who hates women. To go up there and assert that women should not be in control in their reproductive systems ... and the fact that the whole title of the meaning was how to piss off feminists."

"It looked like it was going to break into something very violent," Dr Adams said. "When I saw there was going to be a physical confrontation, I started to walk out. I'm usually tipped off about these things. I didn't get the sense there was going to be this much protest."

"I think at all of our events we are prepared for such things," said Laurie Bebitis, president of the UMass Republican Club, when asked to comment on the interruptions throughout Dr. Adams' speech. "It was past his time to have the microphone in his possession."

A major point of contention for many who attended Adams' lecture was when he asked why there was a Planned Parenthood center in every black city. He also claimed that there had been 51 million abortions since Roe v. Wade had been passed in 1973.

"At least they won't have to grow up in a world with you," yelled out one member of the audience in response to Dr. Adams.

Adams ended his lecture after a student refused to surrender a microphone during a question and answer session yesterday.

Graduate lounge recieves praise

"It is on campus and it is within walking distance," Boyle said. "You are not trying to drive uptown or drive down Route 9."

Boyle has seen business at the Graduate Lounge reach between $500 and a $1,000 a night this semester, depending on the day of the week. Continued success at the Graduate Lounge could, as Boyle hopes, transform the location into a long-term home for members of the campus community, including students, faculty and staff.

Alison Higgins, one of the full-time bartenders at the Graduate Lounge, attributed the bar's steady success to the overall atmosphere of the bar, a combination of the laid-back feel of a bar and the collegial environment of the campus.

"[The Graduate Lounge] encourages more unity on campus," Higgins said. "It allows students to meet for projects and get to know other people better."

"It is on campus, they have cheap drinks and you can get some homework done," said senior resource economics major Nelson.

Sebastian Betrolito, a graduate student at UMass from Belgium, called the lounge "a great place to meet people."

"They welcome you here directly," he said, speaking of both the lounge staff and its regular patrons.

By selling a variety of imported beer like Guinness and Grosch, Boyle is catering to the large number of foreign students and faculty on campus, like Betrolito.

The lounge has been modeled in the style of a European pub, according to Boyle.

Assistant Manager of Retail Services at the new Graduate Lounge, Andrew Boyle, has seen business at the Graduate Lounge reach between $500 and a $1,000 a night this semester, depending on the day of the week.

Voting machines get mixed reviews

the 2000 presidential election, many have been searching for an alternative method for casting ballots that will avoid any ambiguity in the voter's intent.

Many are fervently protesting the new electronic system. Several grass roots organizations have formed with the sole purpose of monitoring the electronic-polling stations and reporting any problems that could possibly lead to a fair recount.

One such group, the Election Protection, has established a call center for disgruntled voters to call and file any complaints they had about the electronic process.

The Wall Street Journal reported on a group called New Yorkers for Verified Voting. The group was founded by a retired software engineer who claims he has no affiliations with any one party and simply intended to supervise the voting in his home county of Saratoga and use his background to check for fraud. Ultimately, these groups want to ensure that a fair election was held and be able to provide evidence for any problems that may later arise.

Voter Action, another group against the new system, has already sued California electronic voting machine maker Diebold Inc. over the issue of software security that could have affected the presidential election in 2004.

Software security is one of the biggest concerns of those who oppose electronic ballots, who are concerned that votes consolidated over the Internet are subject to hacking and tampering.

Partisanship can also be a factor, as some software programs may be encoded to predetermine a certain election's results, which Diebold, Inc. was accused of doing. In 2003, the chief executive of Diebold, Inc was caught saying in a letter that he was "committed to helping Ohio deliver its electoral votes to the president [in 2004]," according to CNN.

On Tuesday night there were many computer glitches that had been reported and voting was delayed in several states, according to CNN. Judges in a few states allowed voting station hours to be extended while other districts closed the poll even with delays and interruptions.

In more than 100 precincts in Indiana, paper ballots were brought out for use because the touch-screen voting machines were not working, according to CNN. Some New Jersey republican voters complained that they were not able to vote for their senatorial candidate, Tom Kean, because the machine was already programmed to vote for his democratic opponent, Robert Menendez.

Students react to speech protest

Gwozdz went on to explain that the reason for the question and answer segment was for people to be able to ask questions relating to Adams' topic, not to make statements.

Gwozdz explained "a man came up, and made a series of statements regarding two or three policy decisions that, In my opinion, had nothing to do with free speech or feminism, and after that made an announcement about an Iraq war occupation speech, or something to that effect, and Ben Dully grabbed the microphone out of his hand, and the speaker proceeded to leave."

Many people expected there to be some sort of outburst during Adams' talk, but few were prepared for it to heat up so quickly. Before Adams had even entered room 101 in the campus center, some students who weren't affiliated with the Republican club came over to a large group of gay rights supporters, many of whom were in drag, and asked them to remain calm during the speech, to refrain from interrupting Adams while he spoke and to wait until the question and answer segment to challenge whatever Adams had to say.

Many of the participants at last night's event were content to wait until the question and answer segment to voice their opinions, but there was jeering from both the protestors and the UMass Republican club throughout Adams' talk. Whenever Adams mentioned anything about bigotry or racism, it was answered by calls from the crowd of "You're a bigot!" and so on, which in turn would be answered by the Republican club with cries of "Look who's talking!" and "Oh, nice one!"

Adams chose to leave the room as soon as things got out of control, but continued to talk with students and answer questions in the main hallway outside of room 101.

Man shoots self in groin

WICHITA, Kan.—A botched kidnapping ended with one of the assailants shooting himself in the groin, Wichita police said. The man had just stuck the gun back into his waistband when it fired, shooting him in the left testicle.

He cringed, causing the gun to fire again and strike him in the left calf.

When the shooting ended, the 23-year-old man managed to walk himself into the hospital for treatment, police said. He and his two accomplices, ages 18 and 20, were arrested for aggravated attempted kidnapping and conspiracy to obstruct justice.

The men were attempting to kidnap a teen in a dispute over stereo speakers, police said.

A look back at the history of the frat houses

Jan. 3, 2003

In an e-mail to Chancellor John V. Lombardi, ATG, Inc. offers the five pieces of property on North Pleasant St. to UMass for $3 million.

Jan. 13, 2003

2003-2006

The Department of Capital Asset Management, which negotiated with ATG, Inc. on UMass' behalf, offers ATG, Inc $1.512 million for the land. ATG, Inc. rejects the offer.

DCAM offers ATG, Inc $1.825 million. ATG, Inc. rejects it.

DCAM offers ATG, Inc. $2.1 million ATG, Inc rejects it.

DCAM offers ATG, Inc. $2.5 million, with the stipulation that the company demolishes the houses and seeds the land. ATG, Inc. accepts.

The five houses on North Pleasant Street have been demolished, and the sale of the parcels to the University of Massachusetts is imminent, according to officials involved in the deal.

March 10, 2006

Officials from both sides meet in the Chancellor's office and shake hands, solidifying the deal.

April 27, 2006

The Massachusetts Daily Collegian reports that two fraternity presidents and one sorority president living in 389, 401 and 387 North Pleasant St. were told they would not be living in their houses following the Spring 2006 semester.

Sept. 6, 2006

September 2006

UMass signs a purchase-and-sales agreement to buy the parcels on Frat Row.

Oct. 24, 2006

The house at 395 North Pleasant St. is demolished. The other four follow over the following two weeks, and destruction is completed by Nov. 11.

NJ rep. calls for voting paper trail

By Donna De La Cruz
Associated Press

WASHINGTON—Citing the disputed vote in a Florida congressional district, a Democratic lawmaker on Wednesday urged Congress to approve his measure requiring a paper trail for electronic voting.

Rep. Rush Holt, sponsor of the bill, said the inaccuracy of electronic touch-screen voting machines "poses a direct threat to the integrity of our electoral system." The New Jersey congressman argued the Florida district, in which more than 18,000 votes have gone uncounted, has exposed the system's flaws.

Florida law requires a recount in all five southwest Florida counties in the 13th Congressional District. But scrutiny is focused on Sarasota County, where touch-screen voting machines recorded that 18,382 people—13 percent of voters in the Nov. 7 election—did not vote for either Republican Vern Buchanan or Democrat Christine Jennings, despite casting ballots in other races on the ballot. That rate was much higher than other counties in the district.

Rep. Robert Wexler, D-Fla., said he found it "unfathomable" that more than 18,000 people would cast votes in other races but not in the congressional race. He added there's a host of theories that could explain what happened to those votes, but without a paper trail no one knows the truth.

At a news conference with Holt, Wexler blamed Florida's lack of a paper trail law on the "irrational stubbornness of Gov. Jeb Bush," who he says has refused to consider any such regulation.

An unofficial recount of the five Florida counties on Wednesday showed Buchanan with a 401-vote lead over Jennings in the race. The Associated Press' unofficial election night count had the total at 373. Buchanan has declared victory; Jennings has not conceded. The race is one of a handful of races across the nation that remained unresolved in the days after Election Day.

Republican Rep. Katherine Harris, the woman at the center of the disputed 2000 presidential election, has represented the House district. She did not seek re-election to make a bid for the Senate, which she lost.

Holt contended that even after the votes are recounted and a winner declared the absence of a voter-verified paper trail will fuel doubts about the results.

Holt also said at least one electronic voting machine in New Jersey's Ocean County counted votes twice, and some were also added to vote totals for the Senate, county freeholder and county sheriff races in Lakewood, according to a published report.

Holt's "Voter Confidence and Increased Accessibility Act" had the support of 219 House members before last week's election and now has 221 bipartisan co-sponsors, his office said.

The bill would require that all voting systems produce a voter-verified paper record for use in manual audits; ban the use of undisclosed software and all wireless and concealed communications devices in voting systems; and establish procedures to be followed if there is a discrepancy between reported results and audit results.

Attention: Mr. Wayne J. Griffin

Hello Sir,

I hope this letter finds you well. Our campus is just teeming with construction projects as I write this letter to you. Before I became an engineer some 18 years ago, I worked 16 years in the private sector as a General Contractor laying block, pouring concrete foundations and floors, erecting steel, roof framing, building residential, commercial and light industrial structures. One thing that I did learn at any early age was the importance of putting together a good team to build a project. I went out and found a good electrician, plumber and site work contractors who I could depend on and get the job done. Now that I am at UMASS--Amherst I find this to be just as important now as it was to me then.

First of all I have only high praise for your Project Management team - - - - - * - - - and - - - - - - - - - who worked along with us and the Dimeo Construction Company Management Team for this $92.3 Million New Student Residences Project on Eastman Lane. They conducted themselves as consummate professionals and were a pleasure to work with. As you know, this was a fast-paced, fast-tracked construction project with a schedule that was extremely demanding that required long hours and sometimes 7-day work weeks for weeks on end during some extremes of weather both hot and cold as New England is sometimes that cruel.
Not only were they credited with contract work but also with the successful management of Telecom and Security subcontractors also working on site.

I also have very high praise for the efforts of your Project Foreman Mr. - - - - - - - - I found - - - to be extremely hard-working, organized, dedicated and tireless individual with a good sense of humor of which I feel is very important in our arena of work. As a result of - - - hard work, dedication and expertise, the project was completed on time. I also found - - - developed a good rapport with both of the Town of Amherst Wiring Inspectors who have a reputation of being extremely thorough and tough. Independently, of all other things, this fact speaks volumes to me. He consolidated a solid foundation of our team in the field and I wish to thank him personally for all his efforts. He worked well with other contactors on site and subcontractors performing related Security and Telecom contracts. As a result of his performance I feel that we had an efficient, effective, smooth-running team operation in place in the field. It also cannot be overlooked that he managed a large amount of individuals in the field each day, far beyond that of other contractors on site.

I also would like to single out the efforts of Mr. - - - - - - - - , - - - - - - and - - - - - - - - with their individual monumental efforts and expertise provided to us upon this project.

I have not written many letters of this nature in my lifetime, but it is with great pleasure that I give all of these fine individuals my endorsement for future work upon the University of Massachusetts—Amherst Campus. I hope you will consider bidding more work coming up on campus in the near future.

In closing, I want to thank you for taking the time to read this letter and listen to me rant and rave on about the importance of team-building for success. I have enjoyed working upon this project with all of your personnel. I had certainly been blessed quite handily with a plethora of young, enthusiastic and talented individuals to work with on a daily basis.

Most humbly and sincerely yours,

Feeling a little sad?

Chris Reardon

Miserable. That's the only word there is to describe this past Monday for me. Obviously most people hate the first day back from the weekend, but this one was particularly awful. The weekend was great – perhaps too much fun, considering I spent almost the whole time sleeping during the day and partying at night. A typical weekend for a University of Massachusetts student, right?

Not quite. When I sat down to write this column at 4:30 this afternoon, I realized my problem. It was dark outside, and it had been days since I'd seen any substantial amount of sunlight.

No wonder bears hibernate. According to an article in USA Today, seasonal affective disorder (with the appropriate acronym SAD) affects an estimated 15 million people in the United States, usually during the winter months, when sunlight is at a minimum and cold weather keeps people indoors for longer periods of time.

According to the National Mental Health Association Web site, symptoms of SAD include the typical symptoms of depression like overeating (and associated weight gain) and oversleeping. These symptoms enter remission during spring and summer and begin to show up again during the chilly fall months.

Scientists believe that SAD occurs as a result of an increase in the sleep hormone melatonin, which is produced mostly in the dark, or a decrease in the mood hormone serotonin, which is stimulated in the light, according to CNN. This would explain why people suffering from SAD often sleep more and experience mood problems.

This disorder can be particularly harmful to us college students, who are often forced to spend hours, or days, indoors doing homework and cramming for tests (especially around this time of the semester). Our motivation can be totally shut down because of the lack of sunlight. It doesn't help that most of us are away from our families and unable to spend as much time with them during the holiday season as we'd probably prefer.

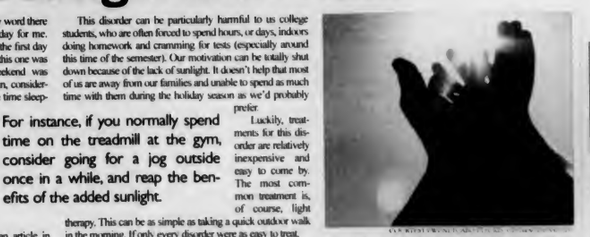
For instance, if you normally spend time on the treadmill at the gym, consider going for a jog outside once in a while, and reap the benefits of the added sunlight.

Luckily, treatments for this disorder are relatively inexpensive and easy to come by. The most common treatment is, of course, light therapy. This can be as simple as taking a quick outdoor walk in the morning. If only every disorder were as easy to treat.

There are also complicated light boxes that people live by, and Wellbutrin XL is the first prescription drug to be approved for the treatment of SAD. Yet, there's no denying the benefits of a few simple lifestyle changes that will not only greatly improve your mood, but will also improve your physical health and appearance.

For instance, if you normally spend time on the treadmill at the gym, consider going for a jog outside once in a while and reap the benefits of the added sunlight. If your diet consists mostly of carbohydrates and sugary foods, think about adding some more protein – especially fish. Protein is said to help improve mood, according to an article published by the Detroit Free Press, and is a much healthier option than a piece of cake.

Of course, some chocolate is enough to improve anyone's mood – dark chocolate is particularly good for that purpose and also has antioxidant value, according to Prevention.com. The same can be said of red wine.



Remember, though, that alcohol is a depressant and can lead to dependence when people start using it as self-medication. Not that I don't partake in the occasional drink, but it simply isn't a proper treatment of SAD (no matter how much I wish it was).

So, if you start feeling a little moody in the coming months, or if your friends start avoiding you because you have a worse attitude than you normally do, think about some of the treatments I've discussed here. The good thing is that most of them have no negative side effects and will only serve to improve your livelihood as a whole.

If you try going for a walk, or changing your diet, and your mood does improve, then all the better. But if these treatments don't work and your mood does not improve throughout the winter, then I'd suggest speaking to a professional about medical treatments. Good luck and keep your chin up.

Free to think, and walk

Kaitlyn Silva

I'm unsure as to whether it was caused by my craving for food of poor nutritional value during midterms or my pathetic existence in general, but I couldn't wait to take a break from all of my studying and grab some food at the Dining Commons.

That all quickly changed, however, when I finally got a glimpse of what was waiting for me just outside the entryway. They stood in a straight line, blocking the way until they were able to sputter a quick sentence and shove a neon pink flyer into the hands of passers-by. The person standing in the middle of this human barricade was holding up a sign, urging me to vote "yes" on a certain issue or to choose a random someone for a certain position.

I was able to pass by with ease after assuring a member of the wall that I had already voted, which I hadn't. In fact, I had only learned of these elections a couple of hours beforehand. I knew I would vote once I got inside, but I was going to vote my way.

It's ridiculous to believe that lobbying the day of an election will really sway the votes. While others are entitled to their own points of view, attempts to press these opinions upon innocent strangers are ridiculous and often futile. Rather than feeling reassured by approachable lobbyists with an important message, we feel as if we're being attacked by an onslaught of pressure.

There is no harm in holding a sign and showing support during election time, but couldn't they do it off to the side? The problem with these lobbyists is they become an annoyance rather than a group you can approach.

Rather than throwing themselves in your face, it should be your choice to go to them and inquire about the issue for which they are lobbying and pick up a flyer if you so choose. This method results in a better context for discussion and understanding than the human barricade method, which makes you want to go back to your dorm and order something instead.

Who came up with the idea that Election Day was the best day to start reaching out to others?

Sadly, all that is being discussed is a small student election. It is nowhere close to being proportionate to the amount of lobbying occurring at the Midterm elections, when the future of Massachusetts is being decided.

However, we are aware of the issues and candidates in the Massachusetts Midterm elections long before Election Day. It gives us a little room to accept these ideas over time. It's also less bothersome. Most students are so unaware of the SGA elections that they aren't given enough time to think about the issues beforehand.

While the SGA elections obviously will not be advertised on a mass scale using expensive means, a bigger effort must be made to keep students informed. The exception to the previous statement is the annual spring election for the SGA president and trustee, during which students are subject to promotional overkill from all sides. For every other student race for office, all bets seem to be off until the lobbying begins during the final sprint, Election Day.

Who came up with the idea that Election Day was the best day to start reaching out to others? What were they thinking? All of the University members who are interested in voting in student elections do their best to be informed. By the time they step up to the voting area, they already know what's going on and how we plan to vote.

Even when they do not have any knowledge of an election, they can still vote on the popular issues because every individual at this University knows what they want to get out of their education and college life in general. They will vote to reflect these opinions. How could a row of fellow students squawking at them as they pass truly change their ideals?

America is supposed to be a country filled with free thinkers. However, it seems we'll do anything to get others to conform and follow our own personal choices. Can we still be considered free thinkers if we are pushing our ideas down on others in an attempt to take away their right to think freely?

Those of us who stand as student lobbyists should think about this before the next election. There is a fine line between encouragement and harassment, and we must tread upon it carefully.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

NOT A MATTER OF TRUST

I think it's absurd that some people consider it an "insult to the student body" to have extra police force at a football game. Hellooooo? It's called a precaution. There is always a risk for riots when you clinch your conference for the first time in quite a while.

Especially when, and correct me if I'm wrong, we're the most violent campus in the country. Ever hear of the phrase "stop it before it starts?" Those police officers did nothing to you personally. They did not interrogate you. Their dogs did not sniff you. Their riot masks did not hurt you.

So what is the big deal? If no police were there, and a riot did break out, you would be glad they were present. The fact of the matter is, there were children and alumni there. We have to show an effort to protect our students and other fans.

It's not an issue of "trust," it's an issue of protection. Just last weekend, a friend of mine was at the UMass v. UNH game, and had her 9-year-old son get yelled at by UNH alumni who told the boy to "move to another area where you belong."

There were no police officers around, and they felt unprotected. Why don't you rebels against the UMPD put a lid on it and be glad they're even taking the time to hold back our sometimes violent actions. I'd rather be safe than sorry, wouldn't you?

'PRIDE AND PREJUDICE'

In Joshua Wilder's column "Superior to the South?" he explores a common perception that some Massachusetts residents have. Namely he addresses the perception that Massachusetts, and by association, Massachusetts residents, are superior to all or most other places and people (he referred mostly to Mississippi).

I am not interested in attacking anyone's pride in his or her home state. I think pride in your neighbors and where you live is a good thing. However, Wilder's apparent conclusion that Massachusetts is superior to other places based on a lack of racism in Massachusetts is naive and misguided.

While, in the past three years, I have yet to meet a resident of this state who is openly racist against black Americans, it is a gross misstatement to assert that racism and bigotry do not have a real presence in this state.

Long ago, the majority of people in this state decided to be actively intolerant of racism toward black people. For this, the people deserve recognition, if not praise. But for those of you who think that means most or all racism and bigotry are gone from this state, I extend an invitation.

Head out from under the protective umbrella of "the Liberal Mecca that is Amherst" and take off the rosy colored glasses you grew up with. Head out into the surrounding towns of western Massachusetts, venture into the rich suburbs of Boston and eastern Massachusetts, visit the urban centers of Chicopee and Springfield.

When you get there, take a page from Borat's book (though I recommend you don't film it) and trick people into telling you what they think, or just listen long enough to learn, what people really believe. But be warned, you may be disillusioned by what you find.

I've lived and worked in northwestern Massachusetts for a number of years now, and I've taught in the school systems of Chicopee and Springfield. In my experience, there is a large minority of people who are bigots and racist toward some segment of the population.

In Greenfield, some people tend to be bigoted toward Indian, Pakistani and Russian immigrants. In Springfield suburbs, there is prejudice toward Hispanic residents. In more Liberal areas, bigotry against Christians approaches prevalence. And almost everywhere I've been there are a significant number of people who still hold that people who are not heterosexual are somehow subhuman.

I am speaking of Massachusetts. With that in mind, how much does it matter that there are very few people who are racist against black people in this state? If there were very little racism and prejudice against anybody except black people in Mississippi, would Massachusetts still be better?

You'll note that in the examples above I've written of minorities. Without any sort of meaningless statistical proof, I assert that racism, bigotry and prejudice in the present day are almost always perpetuated by a minority in this country. Even in Mississippi, this is true.

However, this perpetuation is rarely successful unless enabled by the majority. Perpetuation of racism and bigotry is enabled by people who do not actively work to stop it. Action must be taken by the majority to stop racism and bigotry here and in Mississippi.

By all means, take pride in your state. Take pride in yourselves and in your neighbors, but don't do it because of an illusion of perfection. Open your eyes and your minds. There is still work to be done.

Mr. Duffy, it seems, chose not to watch the Midterm Midlacular. If he did, he might have recognized in his own partisan pablum a joke Stephen Colbert made regarding the recent elections. Now that the Democrats are in power, it must be their fault we're losing the war in Iraq. If Mr. Duffy wants to convince me that the Democrats are going to lose us the war on terror, he'll have to try harder than putting a straight face on satire.

Mr. Duffy, if you think the Democrat position on Iraq is unclear, let's examine the alternative position. The Democrats recognize that this war will be long and hard, whereas almost immediately upon entering Iraq, the administration declared that their mission was accomplished and that any violence in Iraq was already in its last throes. Mr. Duffy would have us believe that this means the Democrats are defeatists, but to me, this situation indicates much more strongly that Republicans are liars. Nice try, Mr. Duffy.

The Democrats want to change the structure of the war in Iraq as soon as it is strategically sound, whereas the administration wanted to wait until the Iraqis stood up on their own (whatever that means). Mr. Duffy seems to think that, unless we let our troops serve as glorified human shields for an inept Iraqi government still working out the kinks, we lose.

Sending hundreds of troops home in body bags only to find out that our actions in Iraq have made it more terrorist-friendly sounds like losing to me, though. Nice try, Mr. Duffy.

If the Democrats believe the war is "un-winnable," Mr. Duffy, maybe it's because the people who got us into this war had "no coherent position" on how to win it in the first place. So, Mr. Duffy, I think you should try to consider who got us into the position we're in now instead of trying to browbeat your opponents into submission.

Because, Mr. Duffy, it isn't nice to try to promote your political party above all else – but more importantly, it isn't going to win you any battles, at the voting booths or in the Middle East. It is the road that makes the home.

Boston band comes to Valley

BY ALLIE ROTH
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Parker House and Theory never set out to be a jam band. They never set out to write the songs they do. They never set out to be a musical act with one principal leader. Instead, they formed based on the theory that a democratic songwriting process and impulsive live shows would lead to success. Because they were anything but ordinary, Parker House and Theory were able to forge ahead toward success in the music scene.

When Parker House and Theory formed in 1999, they were just five Emerson College students who came together by chance.

"We caught each other at open mic nights and met through friends," recounts Colin during a recent interview with the Massachusetts Daily Collegian. Eric-Jon, Carlos, Marcos, Andy and Colin started playing together and each brought different musical preferences to the table. For example, while Colin and Carlos have a background in jam-bands and Led Zeppelin, Andy enjoys the soulful recordings of D'Angelo. Marcos is more of a fan of the epic rock sound by bands like Queen and the Police while Eric-Jon enjoys singer-songwriters.

Drawing on the ways their musical circles intersected, they found a unique sound; an infusion of funk-jam rock with an inclination towards vocal give and take.

As a band, they are anything but typical. In the studio, they record in a structured fashion. But during their live shows, they regress beyond standards and explore the jam-band feel.

The extended jamming, typical to bands considered "jam," is more of a by-product of the excitement and merriment the band participates in on stage than a resounding characteristic.

Carlos and Colin explain that they will extend songs beyond the standard recorded version depending upon their mood. They take songs and go with the flow in whatever direction fits – whether through solos or crowd participation mechanisms.

"We write a song and then have a blast with it on stage," they said. This unpredictable attitude and engaging of fans is one of the reasons Parker House and Theory have experienced such a degree of success.

Their song writing process is democratic. All five musicians take a stab at writing and composing each song on an individual and group basis. The songwriting styles of each separate member compliment each other. The individual ideas and musical inclinations blend together cohesively.

Colin and Carlos said that there are disagreements, but the end product is well worth it. This theory about songwriting makes the whole experience more fulfilling.

"When we all do agree, it's an incredible moment," they said. One thing they do agree on is the genius of John Mayer and how his new album "Continuum" shows a drive toward going in his own direction as far as the music he writes and creates. The band found recent agreement on the topic of Huey Lewis and the News and their unique style of music. The individualist attitude of Mayer and the "groovin', funky and rockin'" characteristics of Huey Lewis inspires

Former relationships make people grow

Jasmine Monteiro

Just last week I was talking to one of the graduate students I work with about relationships. Somehow we got into discussing the pros and cons, frustrations and so on. I told her I didn't understand guys, when they're younger they're immature, when they're older they're immature. It seems like you can't win.

But Stacy made me realize that you can. "You know what I call it?" she asked.

"ABM… you know what that means?" I laughed and shook my head. Her answer consisted of three simple words: "already been molded."

While I laughed about this idea, I couldn't help but think about how true it was. It seems as if we spend so much time with someone trying to shape and mold them into what we want. We never realize that it's not always an effective way of having a boy/girlfriend.

We all need and want separate things from a relationship, especially in college. People in different stages in college develop different feelings towards relationships. We want a relationship, we don't want one, we want to have fun with no strings attached. Different strokes for different folks, I guess you could say.

So if you know you need something that your significant other can't give you, why risk it? If you find yourself in a situation where you feel like you're teaching him or her rather than enjoying your relationship, you may want to rethink your intentions.

On the other hand, sometimes these types of relationships are necessary. How else do you think he knows exactly what to say and when to say it? They don't sprout that way naturally, I know that much. It often takes these failed relationships and many mistakes to become the best girl/boy friend you can.

There's a lot to learn from failure, so don't be afraid to mess up, while learning a very valuable lesson. There's always time to take it in, brush it off, then try not to make the same mistake twice.

But if you find yourself getting frustrated with someone saying, "Been there, done that," you need to decide if sticking around and teaching them the basics is in your best interest – or if finding someone more established and on your level is a wiser choice.

The fact of the matter is we all reach levels of maturity at different times – I think that goes without saying. Most of the time, this can be accredited to what happened in our past relationships. Some people like to forget the past in order to look fwrward, but it's important to realize that sometimes it's necessary to look back every once in awhile to remember how you get where you are.

If you're ready to be in a committed relationship, you need to look at more than just good looks and a bright smile. If you're in college, sometimes it's hard to be with someone who wasn't. If you've been in a serious relationship before, sometimes it's hard to be with someone whose longest relationship lasted three months. This is not always the case for everyone, surprisingly; however, it's your job to make that judgment call. Most importantly, don't ignore the signs.

Oftentimes, it just makes more sense to have a relationship with someone who has the same lifestyle as you. Otherwise, you'll find yourself trying to change them and turn them into something they're not, or that they're not ready to be. This is when the molding process gets messy. If you know what you want and you're not willing to settle, you may want to look for someone who's already been molded.

Campbell's former maid presses charges

Naomi Campbell might be spending more time in courtrooms than on catwalks these days.

The supermodel was due in a New York court Wednesday to face charges of assaulting a housekeeper one in a series of former employees who have said the supermodel is striking in more ways than one.

The latest allegation came just Tuesday, when former maid Gaby Gibson sued Campbell for the second time.

Gibson says the 35-year-old model hit her, called her names and threatened to charge her with theft after being unable to find a pair of Stella McCartney jeans.

Campbell's court date Wednesday stems from a similar accusation: She was unable to find a pair of jeans and allegedly blamed the maid.

In that incident, Campbell was accused of hitting Ana Scolavino with a cell phone in the model's Manhattan apartment after saying she stole the missing jeans. Scolavino was treated for a head injury.

Campbell, who is from London, faces up to seven years in prison and deportation if convicted in that case. Her lawyer, David Breitbart, has said a plea deal was possible, but he did not say what it might entail.

In Campbell's latest legal woes, Gibson's new lawsuit says "Campbell either kicked or punched the back of Gibson's head … while yelling discriminatory comments" as the maid searched the closet for the model's jeans.

Gibson worked for Campbell from November 2005 through January 2006. Her court papers call Campbell a "violent super-bigot" who disparaged her maid by saying, "You are not in the Third World any more, stupid," and "Romanians are not usually as dumb as you."

Breitbart denied Gibson's claims.

He said Gibson's first lawsuit was thrown out because papers were not filed within the legal time limit. Gibson's lawyer, Lambros V. Lambrou, said the new claim adds additional allegations and defendants. They include four companies owned by Campbell and her former publicist, Amanda Silverman.

The lawsuit says the publicist "disseminated false and defamatory statements against Gibson," harming her reputation. Silverman said she had no comment.

Lambrou said Campbell has been unfazed by her legal woes. He said she has been seen wearing a T-shirt saying "NAOMI HIT ME" on the front and "I LOVE IT" on the back.

Journalism alumna showcases documentary

BY MIRIAM BARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Last Monday night at the University of Massachusetts, alumna Aoife Nugent screened her new documentary "Buffalo Soldiers in the Heart of America," a film about a team of Jamaican migrant workers in the tobacco fields of a town in Western Massachusetts.

While living in Amherst, Nugent began to wonder about tobacco farms near the University, why Jamaicans came to work on them and if they were legal employees of the farms.

Eventually, these curiosities led to the production of this film. "Buffalo Soldiers" is a beautiful set of interviews with several of these workers, along with sweeping footage of the summer harvest, the period of two to eight months the men spend at the farms.

Nugent, a former journalism major, strode into the Bartlett lecture hall with the air of Paris or New York about her, a pure kind of artsy poise.

"It means a lot to me to come back to UMass … [and] to be able to share this film with you all," she said with a smile.

From her upswept hair to her vintage graphic-patterned jacket, Nugent's charms almost hide her edginess – but not quite. As she described the making of "Buffalo Soldiers," she kept challenging the audience to re-think negative stereotypes of foreign workers in the United States.

"These men are the most incredibly dynamic, thoughtful and proud men," she said.

After the film ended, there was a certain stillness in the room. George, Humphrey, Hans and Clinton, the four main stars of the film, are each such vibrant men that viewers become attached to them throughout "Buffalo Soldiers."

From impromptu reggae singing about Jamaica at dinner to lazy rain-days spent watching "Jerry Springer" on television, viewers enter into the highs and lows of their daily routine. They see the men form their own family, forging strong friendships as they support each other day to day. They also see them hide pictures of their children to try to avoid the pain of missing them.

From the point of view of the worker, the film presents an ambivalent attitude towards working in the United States. Though they appreciate the chance to earn money to send their children to good Jamaican schools, there are wrenching moments of loneliness that cause some to want to quit and return to their families.

"Life in Jamaica was so happy – all we needed was more money," said Humphrey wistfully.

They are legal workers, brought here under the H-2A visa laws to fill jobs that Americans don't take. They are treated with respect, paid well and housed in good conditions. But there is no shortage of potential foreign labor and their employers expect a lot from them.

Their work isn't easy, either. The tobacco plant is heavy and floppy – almost resembling giant bunny ears – and must be hand-picked. After the plant is chopped off with a machete, it is strung up to dry on wooden beams inside barnyards. The dried leaf is eventually shipped to the Dominican Republic to make cigar papers.

"We are helping this country grow, though they don't appreciate it," said George with a sigh. "No white person is gonna come and do this work."

The interviews are a testament to the character of each worker – the family men are here to make a few thousand

Walters looks back

Tonight and tomorrow night Barbara Walters will host a special titled '30 Mistakes in 30 Years.'

BY RICHARD HUFF
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

Make no mistake, Barbara Walters' two-night special "30 Mistakes in 30 Years" is not intended to be a look at the greatest interviews of all time.

"What is does give people," Walters said, "is a chance to see the greatest celebrities in off-guarded moments, both theirs and mine." Like Walters calling Arnold Schwarzenegger "Warren," or a bird pooping on Audrey Hepburn while the cameras rolled.

Clips for the two specials one airs Thursday at 10 p.m. EST, the other Friday at 10 are culled from the three decades of interview shows Walters has done since joining ABC.

She and producer Bill Gedde, who also produces "The View," came up with 30 so-called "mistakes," ranging from doing an interview with an overtired Mel Gibson to Walters asking celebrities when they lost their virginity.

"I don't think I ask about virginity anymore," Walters said. "And I probably don't ask about worth anymore."

For awhile, though, she did, and viewers will see the likes of Don Johnson and Johnny Carson respond to the question.

Other "mistakes" include riding motorcycles, dancing with Demi Moore at a strip club when Moore's film "Striptease" came out, and getting flustered when Clint Eastwood flirted with her during an interview.

While she's still doing the celebrity specials, such as her pre-Oscar show, Walters isn't in the day-to-day chase for the big names anymore. "Thank goodness," she said. "I was sick of booking and competing."

All the big stars go to Oprah Winfrey first, she said. And on "The View," it doesn't matter if a celebrity has appeared elsewhere first.

Ironically, while Walters isn't asking celebrities about their virginity on her specials anymore, that sort of personal query does come up on "The View."

"I love doing 'The View,'" she said. "That, to me, is just dessert, and now with Rosie [O'Donnell], it's great fun."

O'Donnell joined the show this year, and Star Jones and Meredith Vieira left, creating a new dynamic on the series.

"I think everyone on the program is better because Rosie's on – she's brought out the best in us," Walters said of "The View." "Rosie is aware there are other people on the show. She loves confetti. She loves showbusiness people. There's a different kind of energy."

Walter said the search for a new member of the "View" group is under way, but there's no timetable.

"With the four of us [Walters, O'Donnell, Joy Behar and Elisabeth Hasselbeck], we haven't had the need for one new person," she said.

Meanwhile, work has begun on Walters' next special, her annual show on the year's most fascinating people.

"We look for the people who have the most impact, not necessarily the most famous," Walters said, adding: "We don't do murders, or people of ill repute."

Jars of Clay deals with struggles on new disc

BY JOHN J. MOSER
THE MORNING CALL
ALLENTOWN, PA.

On its latest disc, "Good Monsters," Jars of Clay paddles back to the sound of "Flood," the song that went to No. 1 on the secular charts in 1995 and vaulted the contemporary Christian band into the vanguard of alt-rock acts that opened the door to mainstream success for the likes of Creed and P.O.D.

But guitarist Matthew Odmark says Jars' return to thudding, straightforward rock from the acoustic and electronic sounds that marked its more recent discs was far from a calculated business move.

"I think we were kind of surprised at the end of the writing to see how much of the material really was pretty rock 'n' roll in its approach and then, too, how excited we were about it," Odmark says during a telephone conversation from Atlanta.

The strong response to "Good Monsters" also was unexpected. CCM Magazine called it "the most profound album the Christian music community has released in years," with much of the praise directed at the album's lyrics, which speak of struggle and doubt rather than platitudes of positivity.

Odmark says the "starting point inspiration" for many songs was a quote by Irish philosopher Edmund Burke: "All that is necessary for the triumph of evil is that good men do nothing."

"Pretty unanimously across the record, that's a good jumping-off point for what the record is wrestling with sometimes on a global sense and sometimes in a very extremely personal sense," Odmark says. "And it really runs the gamut in an almost schizophrenic way, from wrestling with the brokenness and messiness of the world and the brokenness and messiness that's inside.

"It's not really a record that's going, 'Here's a diagnosis of problems and here's a prescription for how to cure them,'" he adds. "There are a lot of things both inside us and externally that are puzzling. Sometimes we get moments of clarity and moments of resolution, but sometimes just the overwhelming ache is way louder than any of the resolution. For us, our art has always been a way to express that journey."

Listeners also have rewarded the group's effort by making "Good Monsters" Jars of Clay's highest-charting disc since 2002's "The Eleventh Hour." The week after its release in September, it hit No. 58 on Billboard's albums chart, selling 15,000 copies. But "Good Monsters" also quickly fell from that lofty position and out of the Top 100 a week later.

Odmark, however, says album sales are not the measure of success they once were. "I'm speculating, but I feel what the people who are most progressively thinking about the music business are saying is that record sales have become less and less of an indicator of an artist's true impact," he says.

And Jars of Clay knows about sales. Since Dan Haseltine, Stephen Mason and Charlie Lowell formed the band at Greenville College in Greenville, Ill., in 1992 and won the Gospel Music Association Spotlight Competition in Nashville in 1994 (Odmark joined soon after), four of the band's seven albums have gone gold and three platinum. The group's self-titled debut sold 3 million copies.

But Jars of Clay hasn't had a platinum CD since 1999's "If I Left the Zoo." Odmark says part of the reason is that some fans, enamored with new acts, have simply moved on.

"We haven't been a new hand for a while," he notes. "But I definitely am proud of what we did on this record and feel like it was the right way to go for us. So I don't really have any apologies.

"I mean, I wish we were selling more records than we are. I'm sure everybody in the industry feels that way at some point. [But] I just think that there are plenty of artists that have incredibly vibrant careers that the charts don't really tell the whole story. There's so many other ways that artists are interfacing with their fans."

Jars of Clay has used its success to help charitable projects. The group has long supported Blood: Water Mission, whose 1000 Wells project aims to build clean water wells throughout Africa.

Coca-Cola, with the help of Dow Chemical and other corporations, has pledged a dollar for every copy of "Good Monsters" sold up to $100,000 to Blood: Water Mission.

Odmark says Jars of Clay was approached by Coca-Cola, whose "product lives or dies by whether or not they have reasonable access to clean water."

"And Coke is the second-most-known word in any language anywhere in the world," Odmark adds. "So we're excited about the partnership."

Legal workers support families dollars to support their children back home. From George's rants about the "unimpressive nightlife in Western Massachusetts" to Hans' on-screen reading of Psalm 30 (a prayer that comforts him on the hard days), viewers realize the complexity of their experiences.

In one of the most touching scenes of the documentary, the filmmakers ask friends George and Humphrey about their plans for the next harvest season. While Humphrey seems eager to return to Fairview Farms, George emphatically announces that he doesn't want to come back – he is going to work at another farm instead.

George, a fiery and talkative guy, clearly enjoys the camera-time as he expresses his frustrations with the job. As George is talking, there are subtle shots of Humphrey's face, which is suddenly streaming with tears as he learns that he won't see his friend again. George reassures Humphrey that of course, he will visit, saying, "To find good friends these days is hard."

So each summer, the men return despite the pain of leaving family and sometimes losing friends. As the Rastafarian Clinton quotes the late Bob Marley, they are the buffalo soldiers in the heart of America, "fighting for survival."

'Theory' all about equality

Parker House and Theory and influences them as they write music and pursue their passion.

As far as Parker House and Theory are concerned, nothing beats word of mouth. The band relies upon their intense drive to achieve success. They hit the streets and give out flyers to anyone with hands. They employ a devoted street team who works hard to promote the band.

The band members appreciate and reward these efforts of these devoted volunteers by hosting "PHamily Dinners." From time to time, the street team and the band congregates at someone's house. Colin gets to flex his culinary muscles by cooking for the hand and street team as if they were family coming together on Thanksgiving. This event shows how the band holds its street team in high regards as a central means towards achieving success.

In addition, their MySpace and Purevolume pages allowed them to extend their fan base. At the click of a button, fans are linked with the band's message, music, and tour dates. This pays off when at least one person at each show expresses coming upon the band on an Internet-based whim, according to Colin and Carlos.

Although they hope to achieve resounding success, Parker House and Theory admits that it is all about the music. They set realistic goals and take every opportunity to play.

They recorded an EP called "Soon" earlier this year and played with 311, Jurassic 5 and Badfish. Recently, they were named Best Funk-Jam Band at the Boston Music Awards, an honor they covet as truly complimentary.

Currently Parker House and Theory are touring the Northeast, making stops at college campuses and at other venues throughout Providence, Connecticut and Massachusetts. On Nov. 17, they will be playing at Pearl Street in Northampton with Zox and Tally Hall. This show will be a treat for anyone who likes music influenced by and infused with funk, rock and overall energy.

Parker House and Theory write each of their songs together. The direction of the band focuses on their mood at the time of creation, whether it is live or in the studio.

U2 wins lawsuit against Cashman

Irish rock band U2 emerged victorious in a court battle Wednesday against a former stylist who they claimed had taken important band memorabilia without permission two decades ago.

Lida Cashman had told Dublin's High Court that the band's frontman, Bono, had given her several items as gifts during the band's hugely successful Joshua Tree tour in 1987.

An iconic Stetson hat, a pair of metal hooped earrings, a green sweat shirt and a pair of black trousers all worn by Bono were among the disputed items Cashman claimed she had been given.

But after a protracted legal dispute that saw Bono take to the witness box, judge Michael Peart ruled that on the balance of probability, the items had not been given to her as she had claimed.

The group's lawyer, Paul Sreenan, said they would not be pursuing costs against Cashman for the appeal.

Neither U2, who are currently on tour in Australia, nor Cashman were in court for the ruling.

A lower Irish District Court ruling last year rejected Cashman's defense and ordered her to return all the items to the band, whose net fortune is estimated in excess of euro600 million (US$800 million).

Simpson attemps to tell all in new book

BY MICHELLE CARUSO
NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

LOS ANGELES: Taking hypothetical to new heights, O.J. Simpson will appear in a two-part TV special this month to reveal "how he would have" killed his ex-wife and her friend 12 years ago "if he were the one responsible," the Fox network said Tuesday.

In the broadcasts, Simpson, 59, will be grilled in a "no-holds-barred interview" by Judith Regan, the publisher of his new book, "If I Did It," which hits shelves Nov. 30.

The special, titled "O.J. Simpson: If I Did It, Here's How It Happened," is set to air Nov. 27 and Nov. 29 from 9 p.m. to 10 p.m. EST on Fox, the network said.

In a video clip on Fox's Web site, an off-screen interviewer says, "You wrote, 'I have never seen so much blood in my life.'"

"I don't think any two people could be murdered without everybody being covered in blood," Simpson replies.

There was no word on how much Simpson will be paid for the home or TV special. Regan publicist Suzanne Wickham said she had no information about the book beyond what was contained in the Fox press release.

Lou Brown, the father of murder victim Nicole Brown Simpson, said he wasn't shocked to hear his ex-son-in-law was exploiting the tragedy. "I gave up on him many years ago," Brown, 83, told the New York Daily News on Tuesday.

As for Simpson's book title, Brown said he has "absolutely no doubt" Simpson killed his daughter.

After one of the most sensational criminal trials in U.S. history, Simpson was acquitted in October 1995 of the brutal knife slayings of Nicole Brown Simpson and her friend Ronald Goldman on June 12, 1994.

But at a later civil trial, the jury found the former NFL great responsible for both murders and ordered him to pay $33.5 million in damages to the victims' heirs – who haven't received a dime.

Simpson's lawyer Yale Galanter did not return calls Tuesday. Three weeks ago, Galanter denied the ex-Heisman Trophy winner was penning a tell-all book about the murders, according to the Goldmans' lawyer Jonathan Pollak.

Simpson releases a new book discussing how he would have committed the murder of his ex wife and Ron Goldman if he had done it.

'General Hospital' couple celebrates 25 years

BY CHUCK BARNEY
CONTRA COSTA TIMES

In the summer of 1981, Marc Levine was just another struggling young musician living in Los Angeles when he got invited to play in a wedding. Unbeknownst to him, it wasn't just any wedding, but a big-deal production for the daytime soap opera "General Hospital" featuring a couple of bright-faced love birds by the name of Luke and Laura.

"I had heard of the show, of course, but had never seen it," Levine recalls. "To me, it was just another gig. I had no clue that I was about to become part of television history."

He also had no clue that on Nov. 16 of that year, Elaine Ebner his future wife and a self-described "fanatical 'General Hospital' freak" would be riveted to those wedding scenes, along with her Ohio State girlfriends and about 30 million other viewers.

"It was what everybody was talking about at the time," says Ebner who, like many college students of her day, arranged her class schedule around "General Hospital." "It was kind of hysterical. You laughed at yourself and your friends for taking something so frivolous so seriously. But at the same time, you couldn't help yourself."

Twenty-five years later, memories of that pop-cultural touchstone are still vivid for many fans, thanks in no small part to TV programmers who are doing their best to keep them burning bright. On ABC, Luke (Anthony Geary), now sans his famous perm, and Laura (Genie Francis) have been reunited for a limited-run "General Hospital" story line, with a "commemorative" episode slated for Thursday.

Meanwhile, ABC's cable sibling, SOAPnet, has dedicated this month to retelling Luke and Laura's love story via vintage clips, marathons and an original special.

It's easy to see why the networks would want to aggressively celebrate the silver anniversary. Luke and Laura's wedding was one of television's greatest water-cooler moments. Nowadays, the 43-year-old "General Hospital," like all daytime soaps, struggles to remain viable, attracting an average audience of only 3.36 million viewers.

Pam Powers, who wrote for Soap Opera Digest, insists that the O.J. Simpson murder trial, among other things, paved the way for the genre's decline.

"When the O.J. trial dominated afternoon television, it was the biggest soap opera of them all. It was reality," she says. "And now, it seems, everyone craves reality TV."

But before O.J., there was Luke and Laura and a case of television serendipity.

Streisand still in shock about incident

BY HOWARD REICH
CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Not only did someone toss a drink at her while she was onstage, but she had paid for his ticket.

"That guy in Florida was a friend of guests that I had," says Streisand, phoning from a jet, as it whisked her away from her real-estate confrontation in Ft. Lauderdale.

When she invited the crew of a friend's yacht to the concert, she explains, she thought she was being friendly. But one of the crew members got sick and gave the ticket to someone else, who decided to test his pitching arm after Streisand finished a slot satirizing President Bush (the heckler missed).

"No good deed goes unpunished," adds Streisand, with a laugh, insisting that the fellow wasn't taking a political position but, instead, had imbibed too much and was having a fight with his girlfriend.

Whatever the reason, the moment crystallized the passions that Streisand at 64 – still ignites, in the midst of a rare concert tour.

Yet, Streisand, whose remarkable resume includes two Oscars, 10 Grammys, six Emmys and approximately 70 million records sold seems to prefer it that way. Why else would she include in her current show a Bush impersonator who suggests erasing the national debt by "putting a proposal before Congress to sell Canada"?

The vignette has drawn fire from newspapers large and small. A "tepid segment" said The New York Times. "Please just sing, Barbra," begged the Omaha World-Herald.

But Streisand clings to her conviction that she has a duty to speak out.

"As Andre Gide said," quotes Streisand, referencing the French author and Nobel Prize laureate, "the artist's role is to disturb.

The politics do not appear to have hurt the box office. The tour has broken box-office records in Philadelphia ($5,265,000 from 16,510 paid attendance, according to billboard.com) and Washington (highest grossing event at the Verizon Center, according to The Washington Post). Hard-core, high-bracket Streisand devotees are paying $50,000 apiece, $50,000 to shake her hand backstage.

Much of the cash will pour into Streisand's foundation, which will also tribute it to her pet causes.

Yet a funny thing happened on the way to it. Now, Streisand, so attuned to performing live that she quit touring for 27 years after suffering a memory lapse in 1967, decided the concert hall wasn't such a bad place after all.

"After the first night she performed in Philadelphia, she came off-stage and she just went, 'Wow. I really had a good time,'" says Jay Landsky, her un-Streisand-reporter-of-sorts over the past two decades.

Since that Oct. 4 opener of her tour, which is not being publicized as a farewell, unlike a brief spurt of gigs in 2000, Streisand has been basking in applause (mostly) and taking in box-office kudos (thrice).

"It actually has never felt better," says Streisand, preparing to savor a lunch of shore crabs at about 30,000 feet.

"I'm enjoying the audience," she adds. "I'm enjoying the love that I feel and the support that I feel.

"It's just kind of I'm-less [than] I used to be. You know, less stage fright.

"So it's a fun experience, but that I wouldn't say. Work it never was.

"It has joy in it, yeah.

And Streisand thinks she knows why.

UMASS PARKING ANNOUNCES
Opening of New Visitor's Parking at Athletic Complex

UMASS Parking Services announces the opening of new visitor's parking adjacent to the Athletic Complex on Stadium Drive. This 275 space lot will provide additional parking for visitors to the campus, as well as parking for athletic events at Rudd Soccer Field, the new field & track and the softball complex. The lot will be serviced by two paystations at a rate of 60¢/hour. The paystations operate on pay-by-space and do not require patrons to return to their vehicles to display a receipt – a common complaint with older paystations. The new paystations offer multiple payment options -- bills, coins, or credit cards.

This lot is serviced by UMASS Transit's Campus Shuttle, Routes 34 & 35, from 7:00 a.m. to 2:30 a.m. five days a week.

Contact Parking Services at 413-545-0365 or http://www.parking.admin.umass.edu for further information.

Dixie Chicks now sympathetic

Dixie Chicks lead singer Natalie Maines (center) regrets causing controversy for herself and her band about President Bush three years ago. The controversy has caused the band not to sell out tours in the south, an area the band use to sell out prior to the controversy.

By Terry Lawson
Detroit Free Press

Dixie-chicked (verb, slang): to be pilloried as part of a mass campaign to malign a reputation or endeavor. Usage: "I don't want to be Dixie-chicked," spoken by a producer in deciding not to air a joke potentially offensive to evangelicals on the TV series "Studio 60 on the Sunset Strip." Also see "Swift-boated."

Natalie Maines is adamant. If she had it to do over again, she wouldn't.

"I have to put it in perspective. Between the three of us we have seven children, people who depend on us. I put our career on the line with a careless joke and I didn't ask Emily (Robison) or Martie (Maguire) about it beforehand. I just blurted it out. Our livelihood is playing live. And we had to cancel concerts on this tour because we couldn't sell tickets. The radio stations won't even accept advertising for our shows, much less play our records."

It has been more than three years since Maines, lead singer and guitarist of the Dixie Chicks, said, "Just so you know, we're ashamed that the president of the United States is from Texas" between songs at a London concert.

As we see in "Shut Up & Sing," a new documentary about the consequences of her statement, Maines was cheered in the auditorium. But back home it sparked a firestorm that refuses to go out, despite polls that indicate the primary reason Democrats retook control of Congress last week was dissatisfaction with the Iraq war that had not yet been declared at the time Maines, in her own words, "opened my big mouth without thinking."

"I'm not poor-mouthing," says Maines, having her say, even though a publicist is doing her best to cut the conversation short. "Obviously, we're not starving or anything. I'm just saying that this is on my heart, and all Emily and Martie did was stand by me ... I apologized to everybody including the president. But I can't undo what's done, and I've been through hell for it."

As it made clear in "Shut Up & Sing," Maines' sincerity in being sorry about what she said and when and where she said it, isn't the same as disavowing it. She's also angry and saddened by the reaction, "especially the fact that someone could be mad enough at me for having an opinion different than theirs that they would threaten to kill me."

Maines and the other members of the trio, the top-earning act in country music for five years before the remark received death threats.

"It's pretty amazing what these women have been through," says Barbara Kopple, director of two Oscar winners, 1976's "Harlan County U.S." and 1991's "American Dream." Kopple directed "Shut Up & Sing" with Cecila Peck, daughter of movie icon Gregory Peck, who produced the Kopple-directed "The Hamptons" reality series for TV.

"I had actually been interested in doing something on them before all that blew up, just because the issues they were addressing in their songs, like spousal abuse, made them pretty unique in country music," Kopple said. "Then when Natalie said what she did and the heat was on, I knew for certain I wanted to do something."

The problem was that the Dixie Chicks, initially thrown for a loop by the uproar and news that some country stations were not just banning their records but urging listeners to burn them, wanted to turn the heat down.

"I think we were hoping it would die down and we could get back on with our lives," says Maines. "But it quickly became obvious that wasn't going to happen. We already had a two-person video crew with us. We've had one for every big tour, to shoot stuff for DVDs and so on, just archival stuff, you know. We had done an NBC special on the road, and we were used to cameras being around. So they shot some of the early stuff, us talking to our manager and with each other about this thing that had gotten so out of control.

"Then Cecilia approached us about doing something about what we going through, how it was affecting us, about how every conversation we had with anybody eventually came down to this subject. She was so emotionally attached, I think it just touched us. And it got the three of us all opening up to each other, which I know turned out to be a good thing."

Kopple said that when she and Peck took over the project, they made it clear that there were no ground rules as to what would be filmed, or the form the finished film would take. The directors spent time alone with the three Chicks and their families. Then they followed the trio into the studio where they recorded their current album, "Taking the Long Way," including Maines' defiant song "Not Ready to Make Nice" that addresses the controversy.

Kopple says, "When we finally got them all together to see the finished film, I watched Natalie when Emily starts talking about how she felt about everything and about what Natalie did. When she says she was proud of her, and that it never crossed her mind not to stand up for her. And I saw Natalie just grab her hand and hold it, and it was one the greatest feelings I had ever had as a filmmaker."

Maines says she hopes the film will put the incident in context, but admits she doesn't know what the future will hold.

"I was never under the illusion we were always going to have the kind of impact we did five years ago, you know, that Eagles level of stardom. I never measured our success like that. I didn't expect us to be filling sports arenas forever. I'm not that naive. So on an ego level, that's not a big disappointment. To me, it was always about longevity, about finding our audience and keeping it. But not having a way to connect with our audience, because someone disagrees with a stupid thing I said, or purposely misinterprets it? That's what I can't come to terms with. It's America, you know? It's where we have the right to think different."

Television question and answer

By R.D. Heldenfels
Akron Beacon Journal

Q: Could you please inform me as to why Gale Harold was killed off in the new show "Vanished"?

A: Here's what executive producer Josh Berman told TV Guide's Michael Ausiello: "The premise of 'Vanished' is that no one is safe. When we were thinking about going into baseball (hiatus) and leaving the viewers wanting more, what better way (to do that) than to have our lead character get too close to the truth? On this show, anything can happen at any time."

Q: For several years I have been attempting to find the film for the series "Winds of War," with Robert Mitchum and Polly Bergen, with the continuation in "War and Remembrance." Have had no luck. Would greatly appreciate if you would research your extensive network.

A: As a matter of fact, both miniseries have been released on DVD. Paramount released "The Winds of War" in 2003 in a six-disc set. I have seen copies for sale for about $56 on www.amazon.com.

The really big "War and Remembrance" is spread across two box sets from MPI Home Video; the first contains seven episodes, the second the remaining five. Amazon.com has both for sale; the two sets would cost you about $140 total.

Q: I hope you can help me identify a film of the '30s. It starred Bing Crosby, Martha Raye and Andy Devine who are trying to win an inheritance, but the family of the deceased millionaire makes every attempt to thwart them.

A: That would be 1937's "Double or Nothing."

Q: For years I have tried to buy a copy of "Last House on the Left" but was always told that it was unavailable. Then I read an article in TV Guide where Wes Craven said he was going to "redo" the movie. Is he going to remake it or just release it?

A: The original "Last House on the Left" was released on DVD in 2002, and I have seen copies for sale online, as well as VHS versions. In addition, writer-director Wes Craven has made a deal for a remake of "Last House" to be done by his production company, but with someone else directing. For more, go to www.wescraven.com.

Q: In Season 7 of "Seinfeld" getting released? It's been almost a year since seasons 5 and 6 came out.

A: Just in time for your holiday shopping needs, the seventh season arrives on DVD on Nov. 21

'On the Other Hand' mocks Oscar hype

By Colin Covert
McClatchy Newspapers

On the one hand, you want to commend director Christopher Guest for his consistency of vision, and his long-running association with his stock company of players. With "Waiting for Guffman," "Best in Show" and "A Mighty Wind," Guest has recycled the ideas he used in "This Is Spinal Tap," and collaborated with the same actors again and again.

On the other hand, isn't he in a rut? Time and again Guest gives us the wry cavalcade of would-be stars who bravely step into the spotlight in community theater, rock, dog shows, folk music and maker utter fools of themselves. "For Your Consideration" simply retells the story in Hollywood.

Granted, Eugene Levy, Fred Willard, Parker Posey, Catherine O'Hara, Bob Balaban, Jennifer Coolidge and Jane Lynch are a comedy dream team. Apart from a handful of brief highlights, however, their latest group effort is weakly likable at best.

"For Your Consideration" is a conventional narrative rather than a mockumentary for a change, but the approach feels awkward, structurally unsuited to the troupe's improvisational talents. The film follows the production of a low-expectations holiday movie about Deep South Jews titled "Home for Purim."

O'Hara stars as Marilyn Hack, a workhorse actress cast as the longsuffering mama in the film-within-a-film. Harry Shearer is her costar, Victor Allen Miller, an infinitely hopeful hasbeen who counts on his role as the papa to resuscitate a career that now revolves around appearing as Irv the Foot-Long Weiner in commercials. Posey plays the emotionally unstable starlet Callie Webb, cast in the part of their long-lost daughter.

When rumors of an Oscar nomination for someone on the film begin to swirl, the performers' egos and wishful thinking set them up for a fall. As Shearer's character observes, "Oscar is the backbone of this industry, an industry not known for backbone."

As the Oscar mania mounts, the cast members go a bit crazy. Fran-ye character actress Marilyn makes the talk show rounds Botoxed to the hairline and poured into a miniskirt that Madonna would deem too revealing. Over-the-hill Victor boogies down on an MTV-style variety show. Callie breaks up with her actor boyfriend, convinced she'll soon outrank him in celebrity. As they comically self-destruct in pursuit of fleeting fame, their death spirals are reported by "Hollywood Now" hosts Chuck Porter (Willard, bombastically dense) and Cindy Martin (Lynch, vamping for the camera like a Victoria's Secret model.)

An air of pointlessness surrounds the project. The stereotypes of desperate has-been actors and philistine studio heads are cliches, the satire is toothless, and the whole affair feels cobwebbed and stale. Co-writer Levy can think of no funnier mannerism for his character, a sleazy agent, than to have him continually snarfing free snacks from the movie set catering service.

Other than the ever-enthusiastic Willard and Lynch, few of the actors score memorably. The funniest moments are low-off gags, like the red-kabbalah string bracelet Miller begins to wear, and Ed Begley, Jr., as a fussy makeup man debating between Sephardic and Ashkenazi skin tones for the cast. Considering the talent involved, "For Your Consideration" is a letdown.

Hofstra in town for finale

"We've been in three doglights in a row. You always worry about how much juice there is in the tank, from our perspective," Brown said. "And you always look at last game as the game that propels you into next year. All those things are kind of important from both teams' perspective."

Many of the Pride's key players from last season returned to the Hofstra sideline this year – with the exception of Colston, who currently suits up for the New Orleans Saints.

A look at the stat sheet reveals that Hofstra is sufficient in a number of areas, but not great in any one category.

Clarkson boasts a 117.94 efficiency rating this season, starting in six games. He's tossed eight touchdown passes, compared to just three interceptions. The Pride post an average of 183.3 yards per game in the air, a respectable number, but one that ranks them in the middle of the conference pack.

Hofstra's running game is a similar story. The Pride's rushing offense ranks last in the A-10. Huggins leads the team with 562 yards, followed by Terry Crenshaw's 259. Each has three touchdowns to his credit.

Replacing Colston was not a problem for the Pride. Shaine Smith filled that role more than adequately this season. He is Clarkson's favorite target, registering 53 catches this season for 831 yards and nine scores.

"I think they're very talented," Brown said. "I just hope we can go in, play at a high level, and finish this thing the right way. But the thing I thought of on Sunday, as we evaluated the roster on both sides, is there are a lot of guys back."

A win this Saturday puts the Minutemen in better standing for home-field advantage this postseason. But with the recent history in this series, UMass need not look too hard for motivation.

Sophomore Liam Coen has completed 67 percent of his passes (130-of-194) and has 18 touchdown passes and four interceptions.

Temple defends A-10 title starting Friday

She closed last season 15th on La Salle's all-time scoring list while becoming the second fastest player to 1,000 points in school history. She recorded five double-doubles in her junior season. In both games this season, she recorded more than 20 points but finished just short of recording her first double-double of the season in both contests, grabbing nine boards in each contest.

She was First Team All-Conference last season for La Salle as a junior, improving from the All-Conference Second Team honors bestowed upon her by the A-10 as a sophomore.

Paired with junior forward Carlene Hightower, who surpassed 20 points in each of the first two times out as well, Ricketts poses quite the threat for opposing defenses as she hopes to make some noise in the conference in her final season.

Defending champion Owls yet to lift off

The defending conference champion Temple Owls open their season against cross-town rival Drexel on Friday.

The Owls defeated GW in the A-10 title game, avenging their regular season loss to the Colonials – the regular season game reached overtime and took place at Temple's Liacouras Center.

Temple defeated Drexel, 66-54, at home last season, so this year they'll trek across Philadelphia to take on the Dragons.

Last season's top scorer for the Owls, Candice Dupree, is now playing for the WNBA's Chicago Sun, so senior forward Kamesha Hairston will need to pick up the slack.

Hairston averaged 12.8 as a junior last season and received multiple postseason honors. The A-10 named her First Team All-Conference and All-Defensive team last season. Prior to this year, the conference sent another honor her way, naming her to its Preseason All-Conference First Team.

With one of the best names in college sports, Temple center Lady Comfort finished fourth on the team with over seven points per game in her sophomore season. Dupree's departure paves the way for another player to emerge as a consistent scoring threat. Comfort's size makes her a threat inside, and another year under Dawn Staley bodes well for the Floridian.

Diaper Dandies

Saint Louis guard Katie Paganelli and St. Bonaventure forward Dana Mitchell sparkled in their collegiate debuts, earning them A-10 Co-Rookie of the Week honors.

Paganelli scored a game-high 21 points, propelling the Billikens over Akron, 85-58, on Nov. 10.

She finished the game 7-of-9 from the field – including 3-of-4 from three-point range – and hit all six of her shots in the game's second period. Her five rebounds were third on the Billiken roster and she dished out two helpers in the effort.

In the second game of her collegiate career on Nov. 13, she poured in 12 points in a victory over Chicago St.

Mitchell started her collegiate career on the bench for St. Bonaventure coach Jim Crowley. However, after checking in midway through the game's first half, Mitchell made a case for some serious playing time.

She went on to score 17 points on 5-of-10 shooting to lead all scorers. She finished 1-of-2 from behind the three-point line and 6-of-6 from the charity stripe.

She failed to reach double figures in her second-career start, scoring nine points off the bench in the Bonnies' first loss of the season at Niagra.

home. However, the team reversed its fortune this month, posting a 3-0-1 record in November.

Last Friday, the Wildcats tied Boston University (2-1-4, 2-1-3 HEA) on the road, 4-4. UNH's emphatic win over Maine allowed it to move up three spots to No. 10 in the national rankings.

Another bright spot for the Wildcats is sophomore forward Trevor Smith. The British Columbia native scored in seven of the team's last eight games.

Huskies' Struggles Continue

Although Northeastern has yet to win its first Hockey East game this season, the team has played close games in the majority of its matches. The Huskies lost four games this season by one goal, including two in overtime.

Even more interesting is the fact that the Huskies have scored first in seven of their 10 games, but has only been able to parlay one of those matches into wins.

Much of the team's scoring load has been picked up by senior forward and captain Mike Morris. The senior registered a point in each of the team's last six games, including four goals and five assists.

Recently, NU lost to the Minutemen on Nov. 10 and dropped a 4-3 overtime decision to Providence on Tuesday night.

Low-scoring Catamounts

As with last season, the question with Vermont (3-4-1, 1-1-1 HEA) is, can they put the puck in the net often enough to win? The Catamounts usually rely on strong play from their defense and junior goalie Joe Fallon. The team has scored 22 goals, while allowing only 15 in eight games, and leads the conference in goals-allowed per game with 1.88.

Special teams have also been outstanding for Vermont, especially the penalty kill, which ranks first in Hockey East and fifth nationally with a 91.2 percent success rate.

Last week, UVM scored an uncharacteristic three first-period goals against Providence (2-7-1, 1-4-1 HEA) and added another for a 4-3 victory.

BU forward Kenny Roche (right) was named Hockey East Co-Player of the Week on Monday. He scored his second career hat trick on Friday.

The Catamounts then upset BU on Tuesday night, 2-1. Fallon made 21 saves in net and sophomore forward Dean Strong netted the game-winner with less than four minutes to play.

Players of the Week

The Hockey East Association named senior forwards Kenny Roche of Boston University and Mike Radja of New Hampshire its Players of the Week. On Nov. 10, Roche tallied the second hat trick of his career, scoring three goals and an assist in a tie with New Hampshire.

Playing on UNH's top line with high-scoring forwards Jacob Micflikier and Brett Hemingway, Radja scored a goal in the same game against BU. In the team's six-goal victory against Maine two days later, Radja scored two goals and added an assist.

The Rookie of the Week award went to freshman forward Viktor Stalberg of Vermont. He tallied one goal and an assist in the team's 4-2 victory over Providence last Friday.

The HEA also named senior defenseman Sean Sullivan its Defensive Player of the Week. Sullivan assisted on three BU goals in the team's tie with UNH, matching his career high in helpers. ... UMass sophomore netminder Jon Quick leads the league in both goals-against average (1.81) and save percentage (0.94), the two most important statistical categories by which goalies are judged. However, Quick has played the second least amount of minutes of any starting goalie in the conference. The other significant goalie statistic, wins, is led by sophomore Ben Bishop of Maine with eight. ... Merrimack (1-8-1, 1-4 HEA) surrendered four power-play goals Sunday in a 4-1 loss to No. 16 RPI. ... This Sunday's showdown between Boston College and Maine will be shown in the Amherst area on UPN1 at 3 p.m.

Jon Quick and the Minutemen were ranked the No. 20 team in the nation on Monday. The Mass Attack hosts UConn on Saturday night.

Successful offense comes from O-line

Because the at-large bids are paired with the conference winners by geographic location, UMass could face an Ivy League power like Princeton, which is ranked at No. 16 but won't receive an automatic bid because it's in the Ivy League. UMass could also face Southern Illinois, a team behind Youngstown State in the Gateway Football Conference but ranked No. 9 in the nation and more than acceptable for a committee selection. Coastal Carolina is another possible first-round matchup.

Appalachian State, the defending I-AA national champions, claimed an automatic bid when it clinched the Southern Conference with a victory last weekend, improving its overall record to 10-1.

Lehigh looks to be the favorite for an automatic bid the in Patriot League with a 5-0 in-conference record. The OVC could be sending two teams to the postseason. Eastern Illinois is first in the conference with a 6-1 record in the OVC and a 7-4 record overall, but UT Martin has a 5-1 record in the conference and an 8-2 record overall. If E I Martin were to tie E. Illinois at the top of the conference, it would take the OVC title and advance to the playoffs with an automatic bid instead of an at-large bid. As it stands now, UT Martin will probably make it to the playoffs regardless of who wins the conference championship.

Hampton is ranked No. 20 in the nation and has a firm hold at the top of the MEAC. Hampton has a 7-1 in-conference record and a 10-1 overall record, while Delaware State follows in second with a 6-1 in-conference record and an 8-2 overall record. Hampton will likely be the only representative in the playoffs for the MEAC.

In the Southland Conference, McNeese State and Sam Houston State are tied atop the conference with 4-1 conference records and 6-4 overall records. McNeese State has the head-to-head tie-breaker won, so if it wins on Saturday it will go to the postseason as an automatic bid. However, if McNeese State loses and SHSU wins, then SHSU will win the conference and go to the postseason as the automatic bid.

Belton honored by UMass

UMass named Tracy Belton the UMass/Dinn Brothers Athlete of the Week for the Nov. 6 to Nov. 13 stretch. Belton grabbed his 13th career interception on Saturday against Maine and smothered a Black Bears onside kick late in the game to seal the 10-9 win for the Minutemen. Belton is fourth on the NCAA's active player list for career interceptions, and he is ranked sixth all-time on the UMass career interceptions list.

On a roll

With the slim victory over Maine on Saturday, the Minutemen have won eight straight games, dating back to a 31-21 win over Villanova on the road in the third week of the season. The only loss this year was against Navy on Sept. 9 on the road, when the Minutemen, plagued by turnovers, fell to the Midshipmen, 21-20. Since then, UMass has put together its eight-game winning streak, the first time it has won eight in a row since the 2003 season. The Minutemen have outscored their opponents 217-59 during this stretch, have shutout two teams (35-0 over Towson and 7-0 over Northeastern, both on the road) and held two teams to seven points (Stony Brook and William & Mary in back-to-back weeks). In its last seven games, the Minutemen have outscored their opponents 150-19 in the first half.

Special year for these Minutemen

The offensive linemen in football are underrated. Without good blocking, Steve Baylark and Liam Coen aren't, well, Steve Baylark and Liam Coen. Seniors Alex Miller and David Thompson are the head honchos on the Minutemen's O-line – both have started in 45 straight games, dating all the way back to their freshmen years. Miller was a preseason All-American for the 2006 season and was on the 2005 A-10's First Team. The 6-foot-3, 310-pound Thompson is an All-Atlantic 10 candidate this season.

"I thought Alex said it the best," UMass coach Don Brown said. "When [Baylark] has a 100-yard game or Liam has a big throw day, those guys relish those numbers because that's where their success comes from. If we have a big rushing day, it's them. If we have no sacks, it's them. Everybody has their goals and every position coach has his goals for his guys that will impact the win. And those are the things you have to focus on [for the offensive line]."

Four players sign letter of intent with UM

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts women's basketball team was pleased to announce last week that it had signed three highly-recruited prospects pivotal to making the Minutewomen Atlantic 10 contenders next season. Stephanie Lawrence (Rigaud, Canada), Cerie Mosgrove (Needham, Mass.), and Teya Wright (Patterson, N.J.) all signed National Letters of Intent to attend UMass next fall.

Adding to the excitement was the news that a fourth player had crossed the T's and dotted the I's with the Maroon and White yesterday, declaring that the next four years of her young life would be spent at UMass. This final component is Valerie Avebe of Tilton, N.H.

"The 2006-07 recruiting class will continue to help us build towards a perennial A-10 title contender," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We addressed several of our key needs for the future. This highly-touted class is the most versatile that I have had both on and off the court. They are well-rounded student-athletes who will help us build good team chemistry and raise the level of overall talent."

Lawrence is currently at John Abbott CGEP in Canada and has racked up such staggering numbers that she has grabbed the attention of college coaches here in the States.

"She shoots 57 percent from the floor and averages about 15 points a game," Dacko said of the Canadian prodigy. "[She's] 6-foot-1, she's a combo-guard, she's a guard-forward mix. She can post people up. She has an inside-outside game and some post moves."

Lawrence has also accumulated 8.2 boards, 4.1 steals, 2.4 blocks and 1.2 assists per game. She is coming to UMass with impressive resume-boosters such as being named team MVP and an All-Canada Basketball Weekend East Team member.

"Stephanie is a big guard who can really stick it," Dacko said. "She is a tough, hard-nosed player who is not afraid to do the dirty work. She is a winner who wants to take the final shot."

Mosgrove, the first Massachusetts-based player ever signed by Dacko, is playing ball at Needham High School and is a career 1,000-point shooter for the Rockets. A three-year starter, she has shot better than 71 percent from the charity stripe in each of those three seasons and is a two-time Boston Herald and one-time Boston Globe All-Scholastic Team member.

"Cerie is another big guard who really shoots the ball well," Dacko said. "She will only continue to improve as she competes at a higher level. She comes from a successful program, which we hope will increase our exposure in the Commonwealth. She's going to be a terrific player for us."

Dacko also mentioned that finally having a Bay-Stater on the Maroon and White squad was crucial to UMass' program.

Wright shoots hoops for coach Ed Black at Patterson Eastside High School in her hometown, but attends the Rosa Parks School for the Performing Arts. Under coach Black, she has averaged 12 points and six boards per game.

"She's very much like [senior] Tamara [Tatham], but probably more skilled than Tamara was coming out of high school," Dacko said. "She gives us depth inside. I think she's going to be a power forward. She comes from a great AAU program, as well.

"Teya runs the floor, rebounds and defends well," Dacko continued. "She will help us continue to be a defensive force. She will pose a difficult matchup for the opposing teams with her inside-outside ability."

Though signed a few days later, Avebe is just as big an asset as the previous three. Originally from Cameroon, Africa, she currently plays at Tilton High School where she has averaged 10 points and nine rebounds per game. Last year she helped lead the Rams to the semifinals of the New England Preparatory School Athletic Council (NEPSAC).

"Valerie is yet another talented student-athlete added to an already solid class," Dacko said. "She has a huge upside. We have no idea how good she could be."

UMass has signed four players during the early signing period. Valerie Avebe, Stephanie Lawrence, Cerie Mosgrove and Teya Wright will step in when senior forward Tamara Tatham (above) graduates.

First Top 25 poll features A-10's Colonials

Sarah-Jo Lawrence and the George Washington Colonials moved to No. 25 in the country on Tuesday. She scored 22 points on Sunday.

A-10 Basketball

If you were to scan the USA Today/ESPN women's college basketball poll looking for a team from the Atlantic 10, you'd have to scroll all the way to the bottom of the page to find one. The George Washington Colonials cracked the Top 25 in the season's first ranking released November 14, coming in at No. 25.

The Colonials (2-0) defeated UMBC, 72-58, in their season opener on Nov. 10, and the Coppin St. Eagles, 63-53, on Nov. 12.

Neither of these represent the stiff competition the Colonials will face as the season progresses – they travel to College Park for a contest with the defending national champion, and the current No. 1 Maryland Terrapins on Nov. 19 as part of the BTI Classic. GW will also play Arizona and TCU as part of the tournament.

Last season, GW fell to the Temple Owls in the A-10 Championship game last season.

The Colonials returned four of their five starters from a year ago – including point guard Kimberly Beck and combo guard Sarah-Jo Lawrence. Beck, who averaged 5.53 assists per game, earned a spot on the A-10 All-Conference Team last season while Lawrence was the conference's Sixth Player of the Year – she averaged 11.6 points per game coming off the bench.

Ricketts reigns

La Salle (2-0) senior forward Crista Ricketts scored 27 points on 10-of-12 shooting in the Explorers' 77-63 win over the Albany Great Danes on Nov. 10.

The A-10 awarded Ricketts for her performance by naming her its Co-Player of the Week, along with UMass' junior forward Kate Mills, on Nov. 13. This is the second time Ricketts received this honor.

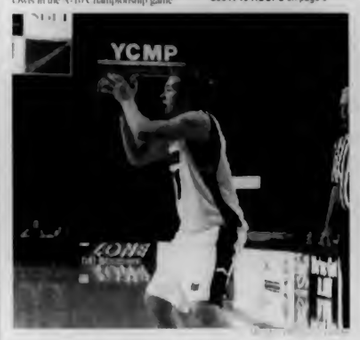
Black Bears remain No. 1 in the nation

Boston University senior defenseman Sean Sullivan was named the Hockey East Defensive Player of the Week on Monday.



UMass' Kate Mills was named Atlantic 10 Co-Athlete of the Week on Monday. She recorded her second straight double-double on Tuesday.

Parity rules college hockey – or at least it does in October and November. At this point in the season, it seems that a victory is not certain until the last whistle blows on the ice. The Hockey East is deep enough from top to bottom that any team could win on any given night.

Maine (8-1-1, 3-1-1 HEA) lost by six goals on its home ice to New Hampshire (5-2-1, 3-1-1 HEA), 8-2. The No. 1 ranked Black Bears retained the top spot in the USCHO/STV poll from last week, despite losing last Sunday.

The Black Bears owe some of their success to the strong play of forward Teddy Purcell. He leads all freshmen in scoring with five goals and eight assists in 10 games.

In fact, Maine has eight players among the top 23 leading scorers in the league. Senior forward Michel Leveille is first in the league with nine goals and seven assists. He scored three goals last weekend, including two in a win against UMass Lowell (3-3-3, 2-1-2 HEA).

Maine's loss to UNH allowed Massachusetts (5-1-1, 4-1 HEA) to take sole control of first place of the Hockey East standings. The Minutemen defeated last-place Northeastern (2-6-1, 0-5-1 HEA) in their only game last week, 2-1.

Heating Up

After a slow start to the beginning of the season, UNH is starting to hit its stride. The Wildcats won two games on the road against Colorado College to open up their season, before losing to Massachusetts and Yale (4-1) at

Minutemen playing for home-field advantage

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts football team was bounced from the playoffs a year ago this weekend. UMass traveled down to Long Island with a 7-3 record, needing a win to earn itself a postseason berth. But it didn't happen, and the Minutemen walked out of James M. Shuart Stadium with a 21-10 loss.

That loss has been sitting in the back of the Minutemen's collective minds for an entire year. UMass coach Don Brown says his team thought a lot about that game for a while, but have been nothing but focused on the task at hand during the regular season.

"I really didn't talk about it to them until Sunday," he said. "We've certainly been over that track in the spring and in the preseason. But not during the season."

Brown was reminded that his team has played pretty well this season when revenge was on its mind. UMass defeated Colgate in the season opener and New Hampshire on Nov. 4. Both teams defeated the Minutemen (9-1, 7-0 A-10) last season in close games.

"I know we'll get a great effort. There's no question, I think they feel they have something to prove," Brown said. "Knock on wood, we've been pretty good in those scenarios."

Entering Saturday's game between the Minutemen and Hofstra, the scenario is completely different. For starters, the Maroon and White wrapped up the A-10, and a playoff spot, last week, and the Pride have disappointed this season with a 2-8 record (1-6 A-10).

Despite double-digit victories for each side the past two meetings – UMass beat the Pride, 40-30, in 2004 – the competition has been closer than the final scores.

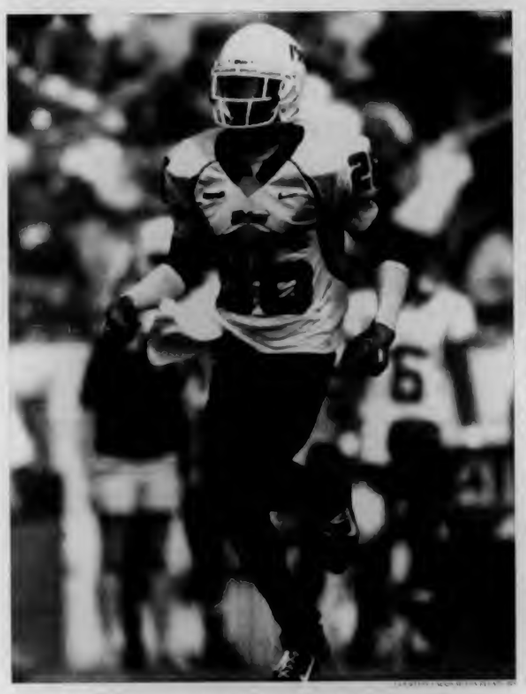
Two years ago, the Pride were winning by two points late into the fourth quarter. Then UMass struck twice in five minutes for the come-from-behind victory. R.J. Cobbs sealed the win for the Minutemen with a 43-yard interception return for a touchdown with just over two minutes remaining in the game.

The Pride capitalized on a late score of their own last year in Hempstead. UMass pulled within four of Hofstra, just four seconds into the final quarter. Hofstra then marched 74 yards, capped off by a four-yard touchdown run by Kareem Huggins.

Anton Clarkson's 64-yard pass to Marques Colston keyed the Pride's final scoring drive.

Even with the little bearing this game has on each team's standing in the league, Brown expects it to play out just like it has in recent memory.

See FOOTBALL on page 9



Senior Tracy Belton was named the UMass Dinn Bros. Athlete of the Week on Monday. Belton recorded five tackles and an interception in last weekend's win over Maine. UMass hosts Hofstra on Saturday at noon.

Playoff scenarios still not written in stone

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts football team is 9-1 and 7-0 in the Atlantic 10. It won the A-10 North title outright with its 10-9 win over Maine on Saturday, and won the overall Atlantic 10 title when Villanova beat James Madison 21-20 to give the Dukes their first loss in conference play. It is UMass' 21st conference championship. The Minutemen received the automatic bid to the I-AA playoffs, so now it's a matter of who they play.

Three polls have UMass listed at No. 3 in the nation as of now, behind Montana at No. 2 and Appalachian State in the top spot. The Minutemen are guaranteed two home games as the No. 3 seed in the I-AA Tournament, and most likely remain the No. 3 seed unless Montana loses its final game against conference rival Montana State, which is ranked No. 15 and has a 7-3 overall record. If Montana loses to Montana State and UMass beats Hofstra, then UMass would move up to the No. 2 spot and Montana would drop down to No. 3, if not lower. If the Minutemen were to get the No. 2 seed, then they would get home field playoff games all the way through the semifinals of the postseason tournament.

UMass Football

Winners of the Big Sky Conference, the Atlantic 10 Conference, the Gateway Football Conference, the Mid-Eastern Athletic Conference, the Ohio Valley Conference, the Patriot League, the Southern Conference and the Southland Conference all receive automatic bids to the I-AA postseason.

Montana's game vs. Montana State in the Big Sky Conference will affect the Minutemen the most. Saturday's matchup between the in-state rivals can alter the Minutemen's seed if Montana loses.

The Minutemen will face a team with an at-large bid from the NCAA selection committee in the first round, and according to the I-AA bylaws, first-round games cannot be played between teams from the same conference. That makes a UMass-UNH game out of the question on Nov. 25, but – if New Hampshire makes the playoffs with an at-large bid, which it might because of its win over Northwestern, a Division I-A opponent – a second-round matchup between the conference rivals is a possibility.

No. 5 Pitt on tap for three-game weekend

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This weekend, the Massachusetts men's basketball team faces its first real challenge.

In the season opener on Nov. 11, the Minutemen smashed the Dartmouth Big Green, 98-61, at the Mullins Center. Starting tomorrow night, UMass will play three games in three days beginning with Oakland in Pittsburgh for the Colonial Classic Tournament.

Pittsburgh and Northeastern will follow on Saturday and Sunday, respectively.

The Golden Grizzlies finished with an 11-18 record last season and lost to IUPUI in the first round of their conference tournament. The Minutemen play No. 5 Pittsburgh on Saturday with a 5 p.m. start, and play America East foe Northeastern on Sunday at 2 p.m.

The Panthers are the biggest challenge on this weekend's road trip, and will be the first Top 10 team that the Minutemen have played under UMass coach Travis Ford. Ford insists that the Minutemen are not overlooking Oakland tomorrow night.

"We're not at all," Ford said. "Our players have not heard the word 'Pittsburgh' and will not hear the word 'Pittsburgh' until Friday night. Our main concern is Oakland. Everything is Oakland, every single thing. I will not look at Pittsburgh until we finish with Oakland.

"When you look at a team like Oakland, they are very equal to us in talent, depth, and experience," he added. "If we beat Oakland, that would be a very good win. We started prepping for Oakland on Monday, and by yesterday I had everything in. [My players] know their plays and everything that we want to run against them."

Oakland senior forward Vova Severoras will be the Minutemen's biggest challenge defensively. The 6-foot-6 Severoras averaged 14.9 points per game and 6.7 rebounds per game as a junior last season.

The Minutemen have scheduled games against four powerful teams this season, and they will play their first ranked opponent Saturday when they face the Panthers. Pittsburgh is a perennial NCAA Tournament team, and made it to the second round last year before falling, 72-66, to Bradley. The Panthers lost to Syracuse in the final round of the Big East Tournament last season, and enter this year as the top-ranked Big East team.

Junior forward Dante Milligan makes his first return to Pittsburgh since transferring to UMass in 2005. He played in five games and totaled seven points and six rebounds as a member of the Panthers.

This test comes early in UMass' season, and Ford will need to have UMass well prepared in order to stay in the game on Saturday.

Freshman guard Tiki Mayben started in his first game as a Minuteman against Dartmouth and registered a double-double with 12 points and 11 assists. Sophomore guard Chris Lowe will play in his first game tomorrow night after serving a two-game suspension for violating team rules.

If Lowe doesn't have his rhythm, the deficit could grow early for UMass against Pittsburgh on Saturday. Senior co-captain Rashaun Freeman recorded a double-double in the season opener, notching 25 points and grabbing 10 rebounds. Freeman has a history of coming up big in high-profile games.

In 2004, when No. 3 Connecticut visited the Mullins Center, Freeman scored the game-winning basket on a breakaway to seal the two-point victory over the Huskies. A few weeks later against George Washington – another team ranked in the Top 25 – Freeman again scored the game-winning basket. UMass will need his leadership this weekend.

The Minutemen did not fare well on the road last season, limping in with a 2-11 record away from the Mullins Center. Now, UMass is on a three-game road trip in just its second game of the season, and it will need Freeman and senior co-captain Stephane Lasme to steady its hand and stay strong in the face of a Top 10 team.

UMass plays Northeastern on Sunday, and it will be a significant step down from Pittsburgh, a Big East monster. The Huskies lost their primary point scorer last season in Jose Juan Barea – who made the final cut for the Dallas Mavericks after entering the NBA draft – and will struggle to put any points on the board against a strong UMass defense that led the A-10 in blocks last season.

After this weekend's trip, UMass returns home for its second game at the Mullins Center this season on Wednesday, Nov. 22 against St. Francis of New York.

Six players sign with UMass for next year

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Six high school basketball players signed letters of intent to play for the Massachusetts men's basketball team next season. UMass coach Travis Ford announced the signings yesterday at the UMass sports luncheon in the Campus Center.

"We're excited about our recruiting class," Ford said. "It covers a lot of different areas. It's a big class and it's very versatile. We think we have the premier shot blocker in the country that's not in college or the pros."

That would be the 6-foot-9 Senegal native who attends Winchendon High School, the same high school that freshman Ricky Harris attended. His name is Papa Ousmane Lo, and he came to the United States from Theis, Senegal in December of 2005.

"[Lo is] like Stephane Lasme but more advanced at that stage offensively," Ford said. "He's a young man that can come in and change the game with his defense. He's a guy that has flown under the radar a little bit."

Matt Glass – from Mount Hermon, Mass. – is the biggest prize from this recruiting class and, according to Ford, is another big guard who can shoot the ball. Glass is 6-foot-7, 190 pounds, and was a two-time Burlington Free Press Mr. Basketball in Vermont, becoming the first non-senior to win the award in the last 15 years.

Glass scored 1,013 points in his high school career and averaged 16.5 points and nine rebounds per game. He shot 48 percent from the floor and 70 percent from the free-throw line.

"Matt Glass didn't play summer ball," Ford said at the luncheon yesterday. "He decided to get up at 6 a.m. every day with his coach and wanted to get better individually. We watched him and he was ridiculous. He just stands out. He had a good year last year, and next thing you know, Vanderbilt, Northwestern and Princeton were coming at him.

"Then he came to his senses."

Ford also signed Matt Hill (a 6-foot-7 Connecticut native), Marcus Matthews (a 6-foot-3 guard from New York), Travon Wilcher (a 6-foot-7 forward from Springfield, Mass.) and Max Groebe (a 6-foot-4 guard from Miami Beach).

"[Wilcher] will be the most athletic player that I've ever coached when he arrives here on campus," Ford said. "He's like a gazelle. He runs and jumps. He's not a true post player so he's going to play a four spot. He's going to get better every single day. His offense is way behind his athletic ability so he kind of flew under the radar."

SPORTS FACT OF THE DAY

Before last night's 95-92 win over San Antonio, Charlotte Bobcats Emeka Okafor had at least 20 points and 15 rebounds in four consecutive games. Shaquille O'Neal, Tim Duncan and Shawn Marion are the only other active players who have achieved that feat.

UM student arrested for bomb threat

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A sophomore geology major at the University of Massachusetts was arrested on Wednesday on charges that he made a bogus threat, saying that a Muslim man would carry out a suicide-bomb attack on the Sears Tower in Chicago last April, according to authorities.

Adam G. Hart, of Georgetown, Mass. pleaded not guilty in U.S. District Court to a one-count indictment charging him with maliciously conveying false information. According to the Associated Press, Hart was released on $10,000 bond, the U.S. Attorney's office said.

Hart was a student at UMass-Dartmouth when the alleged incident occurred, said Edward F. Blaguszewski, Director of News and Information at UMass. This fall was Hart's first semester as a student at the Amherst campus, Blaguszewski said, and the supposed occurrence took place prior to Hart's enrollment at UMass-Amherst.

Blaguszewski said Hart has lived in the Washington tower in Southwest.

On April 22, Hart allegedly sent an e-mail to the National Security Agency. According to prosecutors, the e-mail named a college student in Chicago whom Hart said planned to blow up a bomb at the Sears Tower.

Authorities in Chicago then began securing the Sears Tower and investigated the person Hart identified.

The investigation revealed Hart's message to be false and that Hart allegedly sent "ethnically derogatory" messages to the man prior to contacting the NSA.

The Boston Herald reported that the Muslim student was Osamah Abdallah – a Loyola University student, who was apparently pulled from a classroom when the investigation began in April.

SGA votes to increase student activities fee

BY SAMANTHA M. FRONTIERA

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts went into two full rounds of debate before voting to pass the motion to increase Student Activities Fee.

The vote won 24 to 3 and will result in an increase of $43.50 per semester in student fees beginning Fiscal Year '08.

President Mendez spoke of two options the SGA would face while voting.

"Either $109,000 will be cut from RSO's [Resident Student Organizations], or we can raise student fee's $3 each semester. It will ensure us to not be financially solvent in the immediate future," Mendez said.

Peter Barros, an SGA senator, stepped down from his position as speaker of the house to tell officials of his strong passion to pass the motion.

"As a senator you may have made a commitment to not raise fees, but you also have a commitment to act in the best interest of students," Barros said.

The SGA serves as the primary vehicle in participation in undergraduate student curricular activities through membership in three major groups: Student Government, RSO's and Student Businesses.

Currently, the budget for SGA is roughly $1.4 million with a reserve of $635,000. The group was forced to decrease its surplus two years ago after receiving criticism from the university. The surplus was then reduced to the recommended $200,000-$250,000. This was done by increasing funding for RSO's and Agencies.

"We're reaching our mark faster than expected," said Mendez to the senators for the reason of reduction in surplus. Loans, increases to budgets, minimum wage increases, and the cost of living adjustments (COLA) have all contributed to the reduction of the surplus. The minimum wage in Massachusetts is set to rise from $6.75 to $8.00 per hour, which in turn will add over $30,000 in costs to current programs.

"If a baby is going to grow, it

U.S. Department of Education allows same-sex classrooms

BY CHANEL FIGUEREDO
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Elementary and secondary schools across the country may undergo very noticeable changes in the near future.

Last month, U.S. Secretary for the Department of Education, Margaret Spellings, announced a finalized set of regulations that will make it easier for school districts to arrange same-sex classrooms and schools.

The new rules, effective Nov. 24, will modify the existing policies outlined under Title IX of the Education Amendments of 1972, which ban sex discrimination of federally funded education programs.

"Research shows that some students may learn better in single-sex education environments," said Secretary Spellings in a press release.

The new rules will leave school districts and communities in charge of deciding when same-sex education would be beneficial to a student's academic success.

"The Department of Education is committed to giving communities more choices in how they go about offering varied learning environments to their students. These final regulations permit communities to establish single-sex schools and classes as another means of meeting the needs of students," Spellings said.

Limitations in the new policies will protect a student's right to choose. Enrollment and attendance in any same-sex classroom or single-sex school is voluntary. Classrooms "substantially equal" in gender must be available to any student who opts to remain in a co-ed environment. Similarly, a co-ed school must be available to students within the surrounding area of a single-sex school.

Jere Hochman, superintendent of Amherst Public Schools, questions the controversies surrounding the revised rules.

Students face lawsuits for illegal downloading

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Recording Industry Association of America (RIAA) has been cracking down and suing thousands of people across the country, mostly college students, for copyright infringement.

Although the RIAA has been taking legal action against downloaders for years, a large scale crackdown has taken place recently.

"The RIAA started in 2002 or 2003, but it dramatically increased in 2005," said Charles DiMare, director of Student Legal Services Office (SLSO) of the University of Massachusetts. There have been almost 19,000 lawsuits filed by the RIAA since they started their charge in September 2003.

In the past two years, it has been estimated that over 1501 UMass students have been sued by the RIAA and about 40 have settled their cases. Almost 60 students on campus have sought counseling from the SLSO.

"When you buy a CD, you have a legal right to make a limited number of copies for your own personal use," said Lisa Kent, an attorney for SLSO. "This includes a copy of it on your computer. But there has to be limits." Kent has handled most of the cases from the RIAA for UMass students.

Students have been caught illegally downloading music from using programs such as KaZaA, iZhub, and Limewire, which let people share music for free.

The RIAA can sue students on the grounds of copyright infringement. It is illegal to download free music, distribute music, or make it available for distribution to others. Both downloading and file sharing are illegal under the Copyright Act.

"If you get caught, it's because you shared something," said Young Min Kim, a Technical Support Consultant with the Office of Information Technologies (OIT) at UMass.

At the moment, sharing is the main way that students get caught, but it will not stay that way for long.

"Their methods of finding people on the Web has gotten better and better," said Kent.

The RIAA catches students by creating their own user name on illegal programs, then searching for a song and seeing who is sharing it, as well as who is downloading it. They record the IP address for the computer that uses the program, and then they issue a subpoena to that IP address. The subpoena goes to OIT who then forwards it to the students.

The Recording Industry Association of America has filed nearly 19,000 copyright infringement lawsuits since 2003, against students who illegally download and share music online.

UMass holds 'No Butts About It Day'

The American Cancer Society's program, College Against Cancer, co-sponsored a 'No Butts About It Day' where 30 volunteers collected over 2,000 cigarette butts around campus to help the clean-up effort.

Over 2,000 cigarette butts were collected on the University of Massachusetts campus in a span of two hours for No Butts About It Day, an event co-sponsored by Colleges Against Cancer and the Student Health Advisory Board, held on Nov. 5.

Helene Phelan, president of Colleges Against Cancer – a program that allows college students, faculty, and staff to bring American Cancer Society programs to college communities nationwide – estimated that about 30 volunteers came by the tables in Berkshire, Worcester and Franklin Dining Commons from noon to 2 p.m. to help the clean-up effort.

"The idea [of the Great American Smokeout] is to increase awareness about the dangers of smoking and the risks associated with cancer, as well as providing resources and support for those who want to quit," Phelan said.

The butts will be used in a display in the Campus Center as part of the American Cancer Society's 30th annual Great American Smokeout to be held on Nov. 16.

Attention: Mr. Wayne J. Griffin

Hello Sir,

I hope that this letter finds you well. Our campus is just teeming with construction projects as I write this letter to you. Before I became an engineer some 18 years ago, I worked 16 years in the private sector as a General Contractor laying block, pouring concrete foundations and floors, erecting steel, roof framing, building residential, commercial and light industrial structures. One thing that I did learn at any early age was the importance of putting together a good team to build a project. I went out and found a good electrician, plumber and site work contractors who I could depend on and get the job done. Now that I am at UMASS–Amherst I find this to be just as important now as it was to me then.

First of all I have only high praise for your Project Management team - - - - - - - - and - - - - - - - - - who worked along with us and the Dimeo Construction Company Management Team for this $92.3 Million New Student Residences Project on Eastman Lane. They conducted themselves as consummate professionals and were a pleasure to work with. As you know, this was a fast-paced, fast-tracked construction project with a schedule that was extremely demanding that required long hours and sometimes 7-day work weeks for weeks on end during some extremes of weather both hot and cold as New England is sometimes that cruel.
Not only were they credited with contract work but also with the successful management of Telecom and Security subcontractors also working on site.

I also have very high praise for the efforts of your Project Foreman Mr. - - - - - - - - I found - - - to be extremely hard-working, organized, dedicated and tireless individual with a good sense of humor of which I feel is very important in our arena of work. As a result of - - - hard work, dedication and expertise, the project was completed on time. I also found - - - developed a good rapport with both of the Town of Amherst Wiring Inspectors who have a reputation of being extremely thorough and tough. Independently, of all other things, this fact speaks volumes to me. He consolidated a solid foundation of our team in the field and I wish to thank him personally for all his efforts. He worked well with other contactors on site and subcontractors performing related Security and Telecom contracts. As a result of his performance I feel that we had an efficient, effective, smooth-running team operation in place in the field. It also cannot be overlooked that he managed a large amount of individuals in the field each day, far beyond that of other contractors on site.

I also would like to single out the efforts of Mr. - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - - and - - - - - - - - with their individual monumental efforts and expertise provided to us upon this project.

I have not written many letters of this nature in my lifetime, but it is with great pleasure that I give all of these fine individuals my endorsement for future work upon the University of Massachusetts—Amherst Campus. I hope you will consider bidding more work coming up on campus in the near future.

In closing, I want to thank you for taking the time to read this letter and listen to me rant and rave on about the importance of team-building for success. I have enjoyed working upon this project with all of your personnel. I had certainly been blessed quite handily with a plethora of young, enthusiastic and talented individuals to work with on a daily basis.

Most humbly and sincerely yours,

Roy W. Niedbala

Local residents awarded for civic service

By Nicole Boonjakuakul
Collegian Staff

Two members of the local community were honored for civic service in the region with the William Pynchon Award yesterday.

Kimball W. Howes of Florence and Steven D. Botkin of Pelham were two of the recipients receiving the annual Pynchon medallion for their embodiment of "exceptional community service, carried out with compassion, humility and grace."

"We look for people who go above and beyond their call of duty," said Karen Wolfgen Hines, a Pynchon trustee of the Advertising Club of Western Massachusetts. After the community nominates candidates, Pynchon trustees, drawn from the club's current and five past presidents, research each candidate. After eight weeks of discussion, the trustees choose the recipients.

The tradition of the award began in 1915 and is named after the founder of Springfield. Howes and Botkin joined recipients Brenda J. Lopez and Vincent J. McCorkle of Springfield in receiving the annual award at the 92nd Pynchon Award Dinner yesterday, at Chez Josef in Agawam. The four recipients received a bronze medal inscribed with the quotation: "They honor us whom we honor."

"We ask members of the community to nominate someone who gives what we call the 'Pynchon Chill,' which results when we realize how much more someone does than the average person," said Hines. "They are all humble individuals who don't seek attention for their work."

Born in Northampton, Howes is known for his can-do attitude and tireless energy in serving the community, said Hines.

"He is always asking how he could help, always committed to giving back to the community. If something can't be done, he finds a way to get it done," said Hines.

At a press conference announcing the names of the recipients, Howes expressed his responsibility to help others, according to Hines. As the 79-year-old retired Monsanto engineer sat down for his interview, the first words he spoke were, "What can I do for you?" His mission to serve the community began when he joined the Boy Scouts of America at the age of 12.

"The motto of the Boy Scouts was 'Do a good turn daily,'" Howes said. His interest in community life was sparked at a young age by his family's participation in community life. After high school, Howes was appointed to the U.S. Merchant Marine Academy, where he heard "Acta non verba," meaning "Deeds, not words."

"Those two phrases have been sort of an ongoing theme in my life," Howes said.

"With everything going on in the world, people just don't realize how blessed we are. We quibble about little things, annoyances, while people are starving and dying around the world," said Howes. "There's so much negativity because people are so concerned for themselves rather than what's best for the total good."

Howes has been a force in organizations such as the United Way, the National Ski Patrol, the Kiwanis Club and Shriners Hospital. Howes has also contributed to the Red Cross by donating 120 pints of blood and saving three lives through his experience of CPR instruction.

"You just can't duck responsibility," Howes said. "I like to be a guiding light within the community. Northampton is a paradise of America, and it's great to be a part of it."

Botkin founded the Men's Resource Center in Amherst 20 years ago. He expanded the organization to a global level, creating the Men's Resources International in 2004. The nonprofit organization promotes a peaceful world by redefining masculinity to exclude violence and embrace trust and compassion.

As shown on their website, MRC hopes to create a world where, "Men and women are equally nurturing and equally empowered, people of all gender identities and all ethnicities feel safe and accepted, human rights for all peoples, including freedom from violence and abuse, are protected."

Botkin spreads his mission by presenting seminars and workshops throughout the country, as well as in Canada, Japan and Africa. He could not be reached for comment because he is conducting a men's leadership training in Zambia.

ings on segregation? If it is consistent, then why was a restrictive policy or regulation in place in the first place? If not, then isn't the administration stepping into untested legal territory on issues of discrimination by gender?" Hochman asked. "Most importantly, why is the federal government involved in how we run schools?

"Outside of providing funding and regulations to ensure civil rights are protected and that students with disabilities are provided a free and appropriate education, the government has no role in how we run our schools. The courts may, if an issue is tested, but not the administration," he added.

Superintendent Hochman acknowledges the potential appeal to parents and students who are open to a new technique, but he is doubtful the approach will be used in public schools.

Amherst resident and parent, Jackie Santos, opposes the amendments. She questions the kind of message the new rules would send to students.

"Are you unconsciously telling your kids that they are limited to their learning capabilities?" she asked. Santos believes the new policies will limit a student's exposure to real life situations.

"Day-to-day we deal with the opposite sex and children should learn to cope with that," she said.

Dr. Jeffrey W. Eiseman, an associate professor in the School of Education at the University of Massachusetts, supports the new rules.

"I think it is a good idea to offer the option, especially where you have evidence of boys doing better than girls or the other way around," Eiseman said. "It's useful to have options available for kids that are not getting the break they need."

can see the amount of cigarettes we collect just from the campus, as well as having a reminder of how gross and dirty cigarettes are," said Phelan.

The groups are also working on a visual display using pictures of people to represent smokers who have lost their lives.

"We hope this will be an eye-opening display for smokers, many of whom don't recognize the pollution they are contributing to just by flicking away one cigarette butt," she said.

Phelan picked up 127 butts on the steps in front of Morrill II, which "illustrates one of the main points we were trying to convey with this event: that cigarette butts are overlooked in our environment, but they really are a huge problem," she said.

"We want to show smokers that while each cigarette butt they flick on to the ground is just one, it adds to the thousands that are already there.

"They're in the cracks in the sidewalks, in the grass that lines the pathways around campus, surrounding benches all over campus, and there's consistently a circle of butts on the ground surrounding trash barrels and cigarette disposals," she said.

Even after two hours of work, volunteers could only clean up part of the campus.

"There are still lots of areas that we didn't have time to cover," said Phelan.

The 2,000 cigarette butts collected around campus will be used in a display in the Campus Center as part of the American Cancer Society's 30th annual Great American Smokeout to be held on Nov. 16.

Colleges Against Cancer is one of 250 chapters nationwide that work with local branches of the American Cancer Society to promote cancer awareness and raise money for research. The Student Health Advisory Board at University Health Services provides feedback on programs and policies to UHS and increases health consciousness in the college community.

OIT receives a notice to cut off the Internet, Kim said. Once OIT receives a subpoena, they give the student 10 days to reply before they give the RIAA the name of the student and any other associated information.

"We can't break privacy laws and just give them [RIAA] the information," said Kim.

Once the subpoena is issued, it takes at least eight months before any court summons comes through. The RIAA can sue up to $750 per song or more if they are suing for criminal copyright. If it goes to court, the defendant can also be liable for the RIAA's attorney fees.

"It is a huge incentive for people to settle instead of litigating," said Kent.

According to Kent, students rarely win cases, and most settle before it gets to court. For those who do settle, the RIAA charges $3,750 if they have downloaded less than 2,500 songs. While this amount seems fair, other aspects of the RIAA's legal battles have been questionable.

"The RIAA is trying to grossly expand the copyright law," said Kent.

Since the information available on the Internet is not well defined, groups like the RIAA are trying to work out the bugs in their favor.

"Opponents say that by focusing on students, who are not likely to bring the suits to court, the RIAA is attempting to shape the gray area of Internet copyright law to its own benefit," said Maryland student, Andrew Vanacore in an article published by University of Maryland's student newspaper, The Diamondback.

Lawyers from other parts of the country are backing up these claims as well.

"These cases are being litigated very aggressively. And the damages are astronomical," said Richard Altman, an attorney based in New York in the Diamondback article.

Altman is a private attorney hired because the student he was representing went to a school where the SLSO did not offer help with the case, like many schools across the country.

Although UMass handles many students' cases, other schools cannot. Some schools do not have the resources to fight such a large group. UMass students can use the SLSO for only $500, instead of hiring a private lawyer which could cost up to thousands of dollars.

"I'm pleased that there's no issue about this," said DiMare about the ability of students to use the SLSO. "I think it's appropriate." Without the SLSO, many low-income students would not be able to afford an attorney.

There is a way to download music without getting sued. Programs like iTunes, Rhapsody, and Ruckus allow legal downloading.

Last year, the UMass Student Government Association (SGA) decided to make a deal with Ruckus to allow UMass students to use the program for free. Ruckus has a library that includes 1.5 million songs, and 4,000 movies.

For UMass students who are being sued, legal advice can be obtained at the SLSO in the Campus Center, or through one of the many "Downside to Downloading" programs being offered all over campus. Resident Assistants can sponsor the program to bring it into the dorms.

SGA to gain funds from increase in fees needs to be fed more. You're not going to cut breakfast and lunch," said Barros.

The allocation of funding for RSO's and Agencies has risen substantially since the fiscal year 2005 to a total of $280,862 for the projected 2007 year. That means the SGA is currently dipping into its reserves by roughly $110,000 a year.

Karina Martinez reminded officials what would happen if RSO's were to be cut.

"This is not simply an issue of 300 people who are in the club. It's about all the people who want to participate in the clubs activities, it's about the 500 to 700 people who attend the parties certain RSO's put on," Martinez said.

SGA official Tom Pinhorn said of the students who opposed the fee increase, "As a senator, I cannot morally vote yes when my consociates are telling me no."

"The SGA is in a time of need, RSO's need to sacrifice. We're going to be faced with this decision later and at some point we need to start making hard decisions," said Tyler R. Barbier, senator from Southwest South.

Some officials at the meeting debated that certain RSO's will frivolously spend money left in their budgets at the end of the year in order to get enough funding next year. They felt that the SGA should be held more accountable for the money being spent.

During the second round of debate, President Mendez asked officials to stop, "engaging in caddy dialogue," saying it was "borderline irresponsible" to blame the financial crisis on RSO spending.

"Take action, not just by coming to the meetings but get involved. Connect with students. We operate and serve for them," I'rged Mendez to officials. He hopes to hold more open forums where the student body will be able to voice their opinions.

time, attention and precious resources of law enforcement from its true mission," U.S. Attorney Michael J. Sullivan said in a prepared statement.

According to Blaguszewski, UMass Dean of Students Jo-Anne Vanin received information regarding this alleged incident just Wednesday, and will be reviewing the case before taking any disciplinary action.

"In terms of what may happen to [Hart], the Dean of Students only has jurisdiction over certain disciplinary action and just learned of this case [Wednesday]," said Blaguszewski. "She will be reviewing it, will assess the background and evidence provided to her, and then will make a decision about any student discipline under the code of student conduct."

He said because of the abundance of information and evidence linked to this case, there is no set timeline for when a decision will be made as to whether or not disciplinary action will take place.

"I don't have a timetable for that, there's a lot of detail here, and she needs to spend some time to look at it," said Blaguszewski.

Phone calls to Hart's residence on-campus went unanswered.

Hart is due back in court Jan. 16.

THE MASSACHUSETTS DAILY COLLEGIAN

THE CAMPUS SCENE

A WEEKLY LOOK AT THE UNIVERSITY LIFESTYLE

It's Not Just Fun and Games

BY MELISSA D'AMICO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

For most UMass students, Nov. 22 represents two things – the day before Thanksgiving, and the final obstacle to get through before a four-day escape from the stress of college life. From academics, to athletics, to personal relationships, the life of many college students is filled with many different kinds of stress.

While some stress can be positive – giving you that extra adrenaline rush to finish a paper, or excel in competition, too much stress can have a negative affect. Stress is a physical and psychological reaction to events which are occurring in a person's life. Anything from goal achievement, environmental change, life challenges and periods of significant transition are common stress triggers for college students.

"Stress response, often referred to as the 'fight-or-flight' reaction, is your body's rapid and automatic switch into high gear. It's easy to imagine how this reaction helps you deal with a physical threat. You need the energy, speed, concentration and agility either to protect yourself or to run as fast as possible," according to the Mayo Clinic, a non-profit medical practice for the diagnosis and treatment of complex illnesses.

While some students say that having stress in their lives at school keeps them focused, others feel overwhelmed by stress and are unable to concentrate on anything else.

"When I know that I have a lot of work to do, and not enough time to do it, I usually start to get stressed out," said Meghan Caffrey, a UMass sophomore.

"Then, once I get over my nerves, I am able to just sit down, organize what I have to do, and do it. I think that if I didn't have the stress of having to get my work done as soon as possible, I would be more likely to slack off and procrastinate.

"But then again, there are other moments throughout the year, especially at weeks like this, where the semester is coming to an end, and professors seem to be piling on all sorts of last minute work, where stress just makes everything worse. I am so focused on worrying that I can't sit down and focus on anything else," she added.

For many college students, it is the moments where stress becomes too overwhelming, and the feelings of anxiety become stronger and more difficult to get rid of, that create the greatest difficulty. Stress is a response that should come when triggered, and be easily regulated after the cause of stress is eliminated.

"The stress-response system is self-regulating. It decreases hormone levels and enables your body to return to normal once a crisis has passed. As levels of the hormones in your bloodstream decline, your heart rate and blood pressure return to normal, and other systems resume their regular activities," according to the Mayo Clinic Online.

The stressful lives of college students do not end with academics. Most students experience stress within a variety of aspects of their college life, including their social lives and athletics. When one aspect of college life becomes more stressful, it is easy to neglect other parts of student life. Whether a student begins to neglect their academics, or isolates themselves from their friends, in order to focus on something else, this neglect can lead to the greater stress.

"Because this year is so hectic with both academics and athletics, I have really pushed my friends aside, and I know that is not good for me. The more things you have to do, the less time you have to have fun and relax," said Caffrey. "You have to think to yourself, do I go out with my friends on Thursday night, or do I finish this paper, and get some much needed sleep? But if you never give yourself a chance to have some fun, your college life is going to be miserable.

"Of course, I am here for an education, and I want to do really well, but if I don't take the time to be with my friends, I'm never going to have a completely successful college career. I don't want to have any regrets when I look back at my years at UMass," she added.

The amount of stress within the lives of college students can vary greatly with each individual person. Differences in class schedules, the number of extra-curricular commitments, the ability to organize, and how a person responds to stress can all have an affect on a person's ability to cope with daily stress.

"I think that the amount of stress college students experience really has to do a lot with their individual decisions and abilities," said Caffrey. "There is always going to be stress created by teachers to get their students to do work, but for the most part college students create their own stress. The stress to do well, to push yourself academically and socially, and sometimes you just take on too many commitments.

"There are so many things students have to do while in school, like classes, homework, jobs, but there are also things we want to do, like play sports, join clubs, and have fun with our friends. The people who are able to find a balance between all aspects of college life, without focusing more on one, and forgetting about others, are able to have the least stress and best college experience," she added.

The inability for college students to find this balance may create the presence of constant stress within their lives. Continuous or chronic stress can have long-lasting, physical affects.

"The long-term activation of the stress-response system — and the subsequent overexposure to cortisol and other stress hormones — can disrupt almost all your body's processes, increasing your risk of obesity, insomnia, digestive problems, heart disease, depression, memory impairment, physical illnesses and other complications," said the Mayo Clinic Online.

In high stress situations, it is important for college students to be aware of the symptoms of stress. The most common symptoms of those suffering from stress include changes in sleep patterns, which means taking longer to fall asleep, or waking up tired and changes in eating patterns. Other symptoms include frequent headaches, recurring colds and minor illness, muscle ache, and an increase of frustration and anger.

The ability to maintain a balance between intellectual, social and personal development is a key element for a successful college experience. The American Heart Association (AHA) suggests a variety of activities which may aid in the reduction and relief of stress within day-to-day life. These suggestions include adding a physical workout to your schedule at least every other day, and managing your time. It is important not to view your workout as recreational time that can be forgotten. Physical activity is a great way to release stress, and assure that small daily stresses do not build up.

The AHA also says that finding twenty minutes of "alone time" to relax each day may also aid in reducing the amount of stress in your life. By simply taking a walk or writing in a journal the amount of stress in daily life can be significantly reduced. Making a list of everything you need to do the next day, before going to bed, can also be beneficial. This may help you get a good night's rest, which may relieve some stress, and stay organized, which may eliminate feeling overwhelmed.

"Whenever I have free time, I just try to relax as much as I can," said Caffrey. "Sometimes, by just taking ten minutes to be alone and relax each day, and not think about the massive amounts of work I have to do, or an upcoming competition, is exactly what I need to refocus and become more productive."

Sometimes stress and anxiety can become too much for a student to cope with on their own. During times of the academic year when stress levels are at a high for most students, particularly during midterms and the weeks leading up to finals, it is important for students to take care of themselves, and recognize any excess stress they may be experiencing.

A variety of resources are available at University Health Services for treating stress, anxiety and panic attacks. Within Mental Health Services there is an active Behavioral Medicine Clinic. The clinic offers various behavioral medicine interventions, including stress management, relaxation training, and biofeedback services. Resources and further information can be found at www.umass.edu/uhs.

One DC at sub-par level

Colin McDonald

I remember coming to college excited to try out the food. Could it really be as bad as stereotypically portrayed? I had heard that UMass had surprisingly good food. After a few weeks of dining at Franklin, I remember being impressed with both the food quality and selection, but lately, it seems like things have taken a nosedive at Central's main Dining Common.

It's hard to put a finger on exactly what it is that irks me about Franklin, but I can't help but feel repulsed when I dine there. It's a lot of factors I suppose.

It wasn't always like this. I remember stopping by as often as I could to grab a bite, but now I can't bear it. Maybe it's just stagnation in taste, but I feel like Franklin just isn't the same.

From day one, the food has grown steadily less and less appetizing, to a point where it's nothing more than charred meat camouflaged together with an off-yellow sauce. The daily meals have been absolutely atrocious lately, and I'm a little tired of having to get pasta day after day to satiate my hunger.

I don't think I'm just sick of cafeteria food (I'm actually a big fan most of the time), but it really seems like quality in Franklin has dropped to a sub-par level.

I can understand that Franklin has to provide for thousands of students, but I don't understand why they constantly burn foods, never have adequate condiments (especially Tabasco), never have enough cups and frequently run out of various beverages. Is it poor management? I don't know, but I am sick of it.

Imagine if you will, chunks of grade F meat cooked through and through, charred and roasted in something with the consistency and taste of dried coffee beans.

Worcester D.C. is only slightly further north, handles more students per day, and does so without problems. Sure, occasionally a drink machine might run low, but its food quality and selection is far better than Franklin's. Condiments are always stocked and where they're supposed to be. If someone breaks a glass or spills a drink they're on top of it immediately.

At Franklin we have students walking around a melted ice cream cone marked off by a big yellow caution sign as if it's radioactive waste. We have students who want hot chocolate getting cups of hot water. We have students clambering over each other to get a paper cup because the plastic cups are gone, only to realize there are no more paper cups. Pull it together Franklin.

I was a little embarrassed to welcome my friend from Boston and dine at Franklin. I didn't want him to think this was how UMass serves all its students. I told him to wait for tomorrow, when we'd go to Berkshire or Worcester – anything but Franklin. I begged him not to judge our food services based on just that experience.

One of the more frustrating points of Franklin is the grill side. I love the grill side. I love burgers and Philly cheese steak sandwiches. I love fries. I love knowing I can get some good old cafeteria food over there.

There is one thing I don't love though: the grill side's hours – closing at seven? I know in my family dinner wasn't usually served until after seven, often times not until eight, and at college I'm even more busy than before.

Between class, homework and the gym, I almost never make it to Franklin before seven. It's very disappointing, especially when I'm left with the main meal for the night: sautéed crap-on-a-stick.

It's a tough choice at night, deciding whether to bear the agony of Franklin or just make the walk over to Worcester. I remember my mouth watering last week as I looked over the menu for Restaurant Night at the DC's. I remember getting excited for Franklin's steak tips. I remember imagining the meat that, surely on this one special night, would actually be cooked right.

Boy was I wrong. If that were the first time I had ever been served tips, I would never get them again. Imagine if you will, chunks of grade F meat cooked through and through, charred and roasted in something with the consistency and taste of dried coffee beans. I couldn't finish them. It's not even like I was served a lot. Four pieces I think. Four black, charcoals basted in dirt. Yum.

I'm not expecting a state-of-the-art Berkshire, but I'd like some adequate service for my well-paid meal plan. Between slow, sloppy service, often appalling meals, inconvenient hours and a serious lack of all-mighty Tabasco, Franklin has become my least favorite Dining Common on campus. Quite frankly, Franklin just hasn't been doing it for me lately.

This isn't elementary school

Anthony David Rueli

Every now and then on campus, something new and exciting will pop up to supposedly improve campus life, and it will end up doing nothing but causing an uproar amongst the students. Take, for example, the UMass Police Department's newest program.

This past week, I was walking to class from Southwest at around 1:00 p.m. When I approached Massachusetts Avenue to cross, I was taken by surprise by an upright hand preventing me from entering the street.

Bewildered, I studied the situation more closely. The hand, as it turned out, belonged to an officer of the UMPD. He had taken the liberty of stationing himself in the middle of the road, and he was halting pedestrian traffic in order to let a seemingly endless stream of cars flood their way past the intersection.

I examined the situation in my mind, and I finally came up with a possible solution...but it couldn't be, could it? Could this man be...a crossing guard?

As it turns out, he certainly was. The UMPD has implemented a new crossing guard program. Two days a week (Mondays and Wednesdays) from 10:00 a.m. to 2:00 p.m., a cadet will be stationed at the intersection of Mass. Ave. and Sunset Ave. With six students having been hit on campus this past February, UMass Police Chief Barbara O'Connor has finally decided to end the problem once and for all.

So, I ended up being late for class, as I have my walks timed out perfectly. Maybe that is the reason I am so against this new program, but I don't think so.

I remember back in elementary school, when we would all huddle around the corner of the street. We would wait for the friendly police officer to make sure all the cars stopped before carefully crossing the road. Those were the last days that I have encountered a crossing guard (save traffic cops in construction areas and such), and to tell you the truth, I never thought I'd have to deal with one again.

Then, there he was, clear as day. It took me so long to process it because, well, we're not in elementary school anymore. At this stage of our lives, we should be expected to know how to cross the street without someone holding our hands (figuratively, of course).

Let's not forget one other thing in this matter — with approximately 13,000 students living on campus, UMass is heavily populated with pedestrians walking to class. At any given time, go outside and look. You'll see people just like you all over the place. I guarantee it. They walk to class, to eat, to see their friends, to do whatever it is that they do around here, and they walk to do it.

Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald has also stated that they will begin the process of handing out citations to pedestrians who violate the rules of the ever-sacred crosswalk.

This is a college campus with dormitories and apartments on each side of it. It is specifically designed for people to be walking all around it at all times. The majority of the people here have enough common sense to see a car coming towards them and to remove themselves from the path of said car. Similarly, people who drive on campus realize that there are an overwhelming amount of pedestrians on campus.

More often than not, the pedestrians have the right of way. If you see them walking, you must stop and wait for them to cross. It is a shared responsibility of everyone on campus. The walkers, if using a crosswalk, should be able to walk without the fear of being hit.

However, they must take precautions as well. Pedestrians have to realize if a car is too close to stop, and above all else, they have to look and make sure that the driver sees them. If everyone on campus could abide by these simple rules, no one would get hit. That's the truth.

Deputy Chief Patrick Archbald has also stated that they will begin the process of handing out citations to pedestrians who violate the rules of the ever-sacred crosswalk. The joys just keep on coming, eh?

I don't feel I need to explain the audacity of this to anyone who walks on campus to get around every day. Let's just say that the crosswalk in question on Mass Ave. and Sunset Ave. is probably the only crosswalk on campus I've used in my three years here at UMass. Even then, it's only because it happens to be on my way. If I was to receive a citation for so-called incorrect walking on a college campus, my faith in this institution would become nonexistent.

So, think about this. Are these changes really necessary? Are they beneficial to the campus or just a waste of our time and money? My opinion is the latter. To O'Connor and Archbald, I would like to say that we really appreciate your help with crossing the road, and we thank you very much for the thought, but really...we can handle it.

More rivalry than teamwork

Kevin Pascucci

Living in America during this day and age, one is faced with a never ending barrage of issues to be opinionated about. Should gay people be allowed to get married? Should abortion be illegal? Was the war in Iraq a mistake?

All of these have come to be seen as black and white issues, and ones which we also tend to see in the public forum on a daily basis. One could easily argue that these major issues played a huge role in the outcome of last Tuesday's election.

The problem is that these topics have become the big issues, and they are viewed as black and white. Let me explain.

If you put two seemingly similar people in a room together, they are bound to eventually disagree on something. Similarly, it's expected that everyone in this country is going to have different opinions. That's the beauty of democracy. In theory, no one is allowed to tell another how they should think or feel about any certain issue. Most will try, but ultimately, everyone is entitled to their opinion.

As we grow into adulthood and begin to figure out what views and ethics we are going to choose to hold, we are then by default a part of the big, messy game that is politics. After one puts their opinions together into a pile, they can then begin to shop through the political parties and decide who they identify with the most.

Currently, there are 60 different political parties in the United States. One wouldn't know it though, seeing as there are only two parties in this country that matter anymore. In case you've been living under a rock, they're not the Labor and Green Parties.

Over the years, we somehow weeded out which parties were and were not going to play a major role in this country, with the Republicans and Democrats ultimately taking the lead. If one were to watch or read the news, they would most likely see something about one of these two groups, as opposed to any of the less recognized political parties. This is a problem for two major reasons.

The first problem with having a two-party system is the tendency to polarize. The current political climate in this country is living proof of this. Our country has become so Left and Right, that there is little room for anything in between. Either you are considered a tree-hugging, war-hating Liberal, or a religious, Right-wing Conservative.

The problem is many people don't necessarily fall under one party that easily, and where does that leave them? I myself identify more with the Democratic Party, but do not consider myself a Democrat. In fact, I would probably be considered Conservative by most far-Left Liberals. In the same regard, the reverse would apply if I was to talk to a Republican. Again, where does that leave me?

The other problem I see is the tendency to create more of a rivalry, rather than a co-existence between the two ruling parties. As I watched the coverage of the electoral race, I constantly felt like I was watching a sporting event.

Rather than making an effort to work together, it has become an "us and them" battle, with both sides' agendas being the only motivation for victory. Rather than attacking issues that do need our attention, we spend our time mudslinging and arguing over who is right and who is wrong.

As I said before, battling over the current issues in this country has not done much to resolve these problems. When it comes to everything from the war to a person's constitutional rights, these issues are seen as black and white, when in fact they are not that simple. Either you are for or against these topics, meaning that the decision you are required to make will determine what political party you will need to seek refuge with. This is a war after all.

If we were to simply find a common ground and try to work together from there, we would see a big change in the way our country functions. Instead, we have chosen to compete with one another for political power.

The most recent time I can think of in American history where we were actually united was in the wake of the Sep. 11 attacks. Brought together by sorrow, fear and a common enemy, both red and blue could finally stand to be in the same room together and agree on something. When I look back at where we were five years ago, I find myself saddened by the fact that it took the deaths of thousands of people to bring us together.

Unfortunately, where we go from here will probably only bring us farther apart. The moderates in this country will become fewer and fewer, leaving more room for a polarized socio-political climate. A part of me holds onto the hope that we can one day unite with a mission to better ourselves and our country, but for now, that day seems a long ways off.

UMass Theater Guild enters Into the Woods

"Into the Woods," the new play by the Theater Guild, is now showing in the Bowker Auditorium. Tickets are $5.

BY MATT CADWALLADER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The UMass Theater Guild is putting on a production of Stephen Sondheim and James Lapine's "Into the Woods." The musical, which opened on Thursday night, begins as a whimsical tale of a baker and his wife who can't have a child because of a witch's curse. To reverse the curse they set out into the woods looking for ingredients to appease the witch.

As they set out to achieve this, they cross paths with familiar fairy tale characters such as Cinderella, Little Red Ridinghood and Jack with his beanstalk. But unlike the fairy tales of old, "Into the Woods" follows what happens beyond happily ever after. As the second act progresses, the fairy tale characters start to face the consequences of their actions, bringing a more human aspect to the older, more one-dimensional stories.

Producer Tom Andrea, who co-nominated the musical for consideration by the Theater Guild, felt the story was special because "fairy tales teach some sort of lesson that is easy for us to connect with."

Anyone who has already seen the musical should expect some changes as the production team did their best to bring the twenty-year-old script up to date. According to Artistic Director Katie Madzar, "the idea was to "make it more spicy and a bit more humorous and more relatable to the audience." Audience members should expect a "full luscious show" with a lot of time having gone into the props and stage setup.

The Theater Guild is celebrating its centennial anniversary this year as a student-run organization, making it the oldest student group on campus. The Guild produces two shows a semester, one musical and one play. The student-picked performances take nine weeks to plan and organize, finally coming together in the Bowker Auditorium.

The show will be playing at Bowker Auditorium at 8 p.m. on both Friday and Saturday nights as well as a matinee at 2 p.m. on Saturday. Tickets are $5 for students and children, $8 for adults and can be purchased either ahead of time at the Fine Arts Center box office or at the door.

Mixed reaction for Dylan

BY MORGAN-ANN ROUSSEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Bob Dylan, who performed on Wednesday night, was met with a mixed reaction. The crowd, both young and old, heard the aged folk legend at the Mullins Center.

On Wednesday night The Mullins Center welcomed a long-awaited performance by folk-rock legend Bob Dylan. The venue was home to a mixed compilation of old and young, both of which were disappointed and enthralled at the experience of Dylan's worn-out yet overwhelming presence.

First there was a performance by the Raconteurs, in which White Stripes front man Jack White led the way with an all-out performance of energy and experimental rock. The audience seemed pleased, but because the crowd was composed of such a diverse age-range their outlandishly heavy performance wasn't entirely embraced.

At around 8 p.m the lights lowered, and finally the legendary musician, followed by his band, stepped on stage. They started off with "Leopard-Skin Pill-Box Hat." The musicians were adorned in somewhat formal matching attire, two piece suits, broad rimmed top hats and black leather shoes. It was classy on top of classy for Wednesday's show.

Dylan opened on the keyboard, and to the dismay of many, he stayed on it the whole time, never once picking up a guitar. When one thinks of Dylan, a certain timeless image, mostly in the form of a poster, comes to mind — a young man, curly haired and handsome, stands with a guitar in his hands and a harmonica strapped to his torso. Even though his once charming voice has been blown and tattered in the wind, it's a double blow to be denied his first-rate guitar playing.

The band behind him didn't accomplish the feat it seemed determined to do — it didn't drown out Dylan's worn vocals. Although there's no denying that the instrumentalists accompanying him know how to make good music, it's obvious that they can't replace what Dylan's lost. Within the first moments of singing, there was an awkward shift of body weight throughout the venue. This adoring audience had prepared itself for something unsure (and in the realm of "bad"), but for many, what came from his lips was harsher than expected. A silent goodbye to what we yearned for was shared throughout the crowd exactly as Dylan's second song made its greeting.

At least there was the harmonica — although it was secured to the skinny body of a microphone rather than that of Dylan. At times his harmonica playing seemed strained as the usual riffs fell short of what his older recordings have achieved. Still, it was a feature reminiscent of what he's made familiar and distinct to his music, and so it was welcomed by the audience.

The set went on to include songs like, "Tweedle Dee and Tweedle Dum," "Cold Irons Bound," old-time classic "The Lonesome Death of Hattie Carol," and "John Brown." After thirteen songs and before any acknowledgement of the crowd, Dylan stepped off-stage, followed by his band. As holds true with tradition, the crowd clamored with applause and eventually rhythmic stomping in the hopes of enticing the aged icon back to the spot-light. Like any well suited gentlemen, the request was promptly granted. Dylan and his boys came back with the well-known "Lenny Bruce," after which the overdue self-introduction was delivered, with little more than a "thank you friends" from Mr. Dylan. Luckily they went on to play two more encore songs, and finally ended with the enduring classic, "Like a Rolling Stone." Unsettlingly, the song's identity took a few moments before it sank-in; the once soft roughness of his voice was gone, taking with it any familiarity before reaching the ever-living lyrics, "...About having to be scrounging for your next meal. How does it feel?"

Granted, at this show he wasn't what we remembered or wished to expect. But that doesn't mean the value of his lifework is lost. For some, it's easy to say, "Seeing him now would ruin it for me," and others can't help but ask, "Why is he still doing this if he can no longer do it well?"

In truth it seems a mystery why he keeps on keeping on. But if Dylan decides to put on a performance, fans who've savored his poetic songs over the years know it's impossible not to make your presence known to the man who will forever be a rolling stone.

Bond, James Bond; a look at the past 007s

BY KATE BAUER
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Since 1962's release of "Dr. No," James Bond has grown to be a huge cult figure within the United States, and also the world. Not only have we grown up with the franchise (specifically the Pierce Brosnan versions), but our parents and grandparents have as well.

Twenty-one films have been made based on Ian Fleming's literary spy series, but surprisingly never Fleming's first novel, "Casino Royale", which introduced the James Bond character on his first assignment as a 00' agent. Bond's first outing, and the franchise's 22nd installment, is set to be released this Friday.

Each Bond, and there have been six so far, have brought a characteristic style to the enigmatic spy – Brosnan's classic necktie shakes, Sean Connery's cocked smile, Timothy Dalton's bedroom eyes. Sometimes their outings as Bond were not always successful or well thought-out (who knows what they were thinking when they made "Moonraker"), but the Bond franchise has done surprisingly well, especially for lasting forty-four years.

Bond's got it all – the cars, the gadgets, the charisma — and especially the girls. (If we didn't see him shag at least two women in a Bond film, would it still be considered a Bond film?) Women have always seemed to be unable to resist his charm, and Bond himself has fallen for both the good girls and the good-girls-gone-bad.

Entertainment Weekly recently listed its choices for the top ten best and worst Bond babes. Women with names like Xenia Onatopp, Pussy Galore and Honey Rider seem sexist, but then again, we're talking about a

'Fast Food Nation' hits big screen

BY CHRISTOPHER KELLY
MCCLATCHY NEWSPAPERS

FORT WORTH, Texas — Richard Linklater's "Fast Food Nation" is one of the boldest and most unexpected movies of the year — a vigorously argued critique not just of the American fast-food industry and its unhealthy products but also of the corporate industrial complex and how it values profit more than it does health or humanity. Along the way, the film touches upon such far-ranging topics as sexual harassment, illegal immigration and the death of individually owned-and-operated small businesses.

What's even more intriguing, "Fast Food Nation" is based on Eric Schlosser's 2001 nonfiction bestseller, but Linklater (who collaborated with Schlosser) has chosen to fashion the book into a multilayered, fictional narrative. The film — which stars Greg Kinnear, Bruce Willis, Kris Kristofferson, Catalina Sandino Moreno, Ethan Hawke and many others — follows more than a dozen characters, all of whom play some role in a McDonald's-like burger chain called "Mickey's."

This is unabashedly politically-minded stuff — a film that dares to express an abrasive, anti-capitalist message. The 46-year-old Austin, Texas-based director — whose previous efforts include "Dazed and Confused," "The School of Rock," "Before Sunset" and last summer's "A Scanner Darkly" — says that it's also the realization of a long-standing ambition to make a film from the point of view of the average American worker.

Website of the Week

WWW.JACKSONPOLLOCK.ORG

American painter Jackson Pollock was one of the most influential artists of the abstract expressionist movement of the 1950s. His trademark paintings are wildly non-conformist – mostly consisting of drips and splashes of paint that covered huge slabs of canvas. The chaotic mess led to a wide variety of responses from critics.

Enter JacksonPollock.org. When you move your cursor across the black Web page, a trail of brilliant color globs come up on the screen. Click, and another color pops up. Without even thinking, you are making art. Though the Web site is effortless and repetitive, its simplicity is what makes it accessible. When done, try to take a screenshot – maybe even make a print of your artwork.

Pollock's painting "No. 5, 1948" sold for $140 million on November 1– the highest price ever paid for a painting. Maybe yours could be next.

SUGGESTIONS / IDEAS FOR PARKING "SMART" ON A SNOW DAY ...

1. Park your vehicle next to other parked vehicles.
2. Use the UMass bus service.
3. Car pool rides whenever possible.
4. Walk if possible.
5. Have someone drop you off.
6. If space is not available in your assigned lot, go to either Lot 25 (north of roadway) or Yellow lot (both west of Physical Plant). During snow conditions, it is not possible to guarantee normal lot capacity will be available.
7. If you receive a parking citation and believe it was improperly issued, you may appeal it at Parking Services within 14 days from the date issued. Appeals can be submitted in writing, appealed in person to the Hearing Clerk, or emailed to https://parking.umass.edu

RESCHEDULING OF FINAL EXAMS ON OFFICIAL SNOW DAYS - FALL 2006

In order to reschedule final examinations in case of snow, two alternate exam periods have been devised. They are 6:30 p.m. and 8:45 p.m. each exam day. The use of these alternative periods in the event of closings is outlined below. This policy goes into effect ONLY if the University is officially closed. The snow day Hot Line is 545-3630. If the University is open, all exams are expected to take place as scheduled. Each faculty member should inform his or her class of the planned time and location of the rescheduled final exam in the event of a snow day. All rescheduled exams will be held in the same location as published in the final exam schedule.

Performance Project is coming!

"Performance Project," an original work from the Five Colleges, taught by Wendy Woodson, features UMass student Stephanie Karlin, as well as Emma Jaster, Chris McMillan, Emily Rosenberg, Jessica Edkins, Heather Teige, Melina Dabova, and Elena Jessop. On Dec. 8 and 9, a free showing of the dance performance, including Karlin's "Slippery When Wet," will show at the Holden Theater at Amherst College.

New Bond anxiously awaited

man who has had sex so often it's a surprise he hasn't produced any illegitimate children out of his escapades.

Over the years James Bond has also been a target of numerous spoofs, the most popular, and probably the best, were the Austin Powers films. Mike Myers' ability to combine both Bond elements of action and male promiscuity with comedy is apparent in all three of his spoofs. He mocks characters like Oddjob and Dr. No with characters like the Chinese assassin yielding a "decapitating" shoe, and Dr. Evil – an accumulation of all the Bond villains in one. The films use even more obscure versions of the Bond women names. How can we forget names like Alotta Fagina or Felicity Shagwell?

A trend in the Bond films has also had the recurring use of the films' opening credits filled with scantily clad women. The credits have acted as a sort of pre-cursor to the theme of the films. In the first Bond film, it was the colorful figures of people dancing that set the tone for a tropical island action adventure. In Pierce Brosnan's first outing, 1995's "GoldenEye", the hammers and sickles swung by women in tight suits and bikinis in the opening credits was a reference to the Soviet Union-themed film. As the series has evolved the credits have become more racy than the last, probably to bring more sex appeal.

Though the Bond franchise has raked in billions over the years, received decent reviews and made men into stars, the series has faltered at times. Even though the last film, "Die Another Day", made a total of $465 million worldwide, the film came off as sloppy and far-fetched (come on – a guy with diamonds permanently affixed to his face?) The series had the same problem with movies "Diamonds Are Forever" and "Moonraker."

What's refreshing about the character is that he can continue to reinvent with the times, and with the 22nd installment arriving in theatres Friday, the series is getting a makeover. Instead of a re-imagined storyline with a new villain and a new save-the-world plot, the Bond series is doing a complete U-turn and looking back to how Bond became Bond. 007 has done close to everything, so it makes sense to go back to the beginning – back to Fleming's first work, and introduce Bond as a freshman 007. How well can the film execute that? Well, we'll find out when the newest installment, featuring Daniel Craig as Bond, is released in theatres nationwide.

Unhealthy food hits the big time

Q: Tell me about how you first met Fast Food Nation author Eric Schlosser. Whose idea was it to transform the book into a fiction film?

A: Eric came through Austin on a book tour, and I heard that he wanted to meet with me about a possible movie version. I had read his book, but it had never crossed my mind that it could be a movie. I thought our conversation would be pretty short — I don't do documentaries. But he brought up the idea of a fiction film, about workers in different parts of the corporation: the meat-processing-plant employees, the marketing people, the teenagers who work part time at the individual franchises.

I've been trying to make that kind of movie for a long time. I was an offshore oil worker for 2 years. In high school and college, I worked as a busboy and a waiter. And I've been trying to get that point of view into the movies. I had written a script about a factory worker, but I couldn't get money for it. And I did a pilot for HBO called "$5.15 An Hour." It was a comedy, but they thought it was depressing. So they didn't pick it up as a series.

Q: Did the success of Morgan Spurlock's "Super Size Me"—about a guy who attempts to eat McDonald's for 30 consecutive days, only to severely jeopardize his health — help you in getting financing for this film?

A: It didn't hurt. With the success of "Super Size Me" and the success of Eric's book, it seemed like there was a growing awareness about the industrialization of food and about health issues. We were part of a wave, I guess. But the movie was financed internationally. It was really done completely outside the American film industry.

Q: Were you opening yourself up to charges of anti-Americanism by using foreign money to make a movie that so aggressively questions the status quo in this country?

A: I don't think so. But what's interesting (with) the world market (is that) they have these same (problems) going on. I was in Australia, and McDonalds started a counter-campaign that said, "This has to do with America, this has nothing to do with our food here. Our beef is a hundred percent Australian." Eric got on the Internet and discovered that, in the last two years ... Japanese and American companies (are) bringing the American industrial model to Australia. They will still be able to call it "100% Australian beef." It will just have growth hormones and antibiotics.

Q: Your movie opens with executives at a fast-food company discovering E. coli in their hamburger meat. What did you think when you heard about the recent E. coli outbreak in spinach?

A: It was "organic" spinach! It highlights the complexities of a mass industrial model ... When there have been these E. coli outbreaks in meat-processing plants, often it's at the cleanest, newest plants. But if you don't clean one little part of the processing machine, you can have an outbreak. Our food supply is pretty vulnerable. People don't really realize that. Five thousand people die every year from food poisoning. But the industry is mostly unregulated. They're allowed to sell you meat with salmonella in it. They tell you, "Well, salmonella is a naturally occurring organism. There's nothing we can do about it. Just make sure to cook the meat."

Q: You said that McDonald's started a counter-campaign against "Fast Food Nation" in Australia. Do you expect something similar to happen here in the United States?

A: I think they're too smart for that here. Besides they already got busted. They had a campaign last year to discredit Eric and the film, which they knew would be coming out. But someone at McDonald's leaked the details of the campaign to The Wall Street Journal. They ended up just looking bad. ... Now I think they're just hoping this movie goes away.

Sean Connery, the original Bond, set the standards back in 1962, during his debut performance in "Dr. No."

minutes," Cahoon explained. "We can't think we can go three-quarters [speed] and get it done. We just need to play."

The Minutemen will be without sophomore Topher Bevis for some time. The defenseman separated his shoulder last Saturday. Bevis' injury came at time when the Mass Attack regained its full strength with the return of Alex Berry to the lineup.

Cahoon and his coaching staff have been discussing several scenarios to replace Bevis at the blue line. One is to dress Patrick Dineen. The senior hasn't played much this season – appearing in just three games. But he is still a capable defender for the Minutemen.

Another option is carry just five defensemen into Saturday's game against UConn. This forces Cahoon to use senior Mark Matheson at both forward and defenseman – his natural position.

"We have good depth at the position – we don't want to suffer anymore injuries – but we have good depth," Cahoon said. "And if Topher comes back in a couple of weeks, which will give us a solid base."

Sophomore Scott Crowder has seen significant playing time on the Minutemen's fourth line this season. In seven games, the forward has recorded one assist while firing seven shots on net.

Cahoon takes early successes in stride

being somewhat protective of his young players.

"I am [protective] because I think I'm the experienced one," Cahoon said. "I'm the one that has been doing this for thirty-something years and have been on teams that have both succeeded and failed, so I value that experience."

Although he is fighting off cockiness and over-confidence in an effort to keep his team levelheaded, Cahoon does not undervalue the importance of instilling confidence in his players, often saying he and the team are "cautiously optimistic" as they head deeper into conference play.

"I think confidence is real important," Cahoon said. "I think our guys have a level of confidence and are committed to the ideal of doing really well. Now we just have to stay in the present and not get carried away with the future. You can't be thinking about it. You can have some understanding of what the future might be, but you've got to live in the present, train in the present and play in the present."

With such a young team, many of the players on the current Minuteman squad were not playing the last time the team had this much success and drew this type of attention. Cahoon feels those players still have a grasp of what UMass hockey is and what the goals of the program are, as they were just being introduced to the team that year.

"All those kids were recruited during that time [the 2003-04 season]," Cahoon said. "The program that exists today is what they were hoping and anticipating that they were going to come in to. We're fairly balanced right now, but we've got a long way to go."

UMass prepares early for A-10s with first invitational meet

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

This weekend is the first true test of the season. After participating in mostly dual meets, the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming teams will compete against multiple schools at the Boston University Invitational, held today through Sunday.

The nature of a dual meet is completely different from that of an invitational. Instead of swimming between 20 and 30 events in the period of four or five hours in one afternoon, the competition is spread out over six sessions in three days.

The preliminary races of each event are held in the morning sessions. Then, the top finishers compete in a championship heat in the evening to determine the winner.

Sophomore Karen Upperco leads UMass into the Harvard Invitational. Up until this point the Minutewomen have only competed in dual meets.

Women's coach Bob Newcomb knows it can be difficult for his swimmers to adjust to the format of an invitational meet.

"These meets are hard," Newcomb said. "You have to warm up six different times. But to me, the hardest session is the middle session on Saturday morning. To me, success in the meet comes down to doing well at this session."

However, the ultimate success of the swimming season is judged by the outcome of the Atlantic 10 Championships. The A-10's are structured similarly to this weekend, so it's beneficial for the team to practice this type of event.

"This meet gives us the opportunity for everyone to swim in their events," Newcomb said. "A lot of what we do this weekend will allow me to evaluate the team in preparation for A-10's at the end of the season. I will look to see who swims better in this opportunity."

The men's team will face only BU and Boston College, while the women take on six other schools, including BU, BC, Northeastern, UNH, Central Connecticut and Wagner. UConn was scheduled to participate in the men's competition, but dropped out of the event.

Senior Liz Lovejoy has been strong in the 200-yard freestyle this season, winning the event four out of five times, including last weekend.

"Liz has two tough events," Newcomb said. "She's swimming the 100-yard backstroke and 200-yard freestyle back-to-back."

Coach Newcomb expects the team to have strong performances in the same events they did well in last weekend, especially with the freestyle stroke.

"I expect the [individual medley] to be strong, the fly, and I think all of our freestyle events. Our back strokers are getting better every week."

The men's team got off to a good start last in their meet last weekend, winning the 400-yard medley relay and 1,000-yard freestyle. UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth acknowledges the psychological advantage of a good start.

"Winning the first relay gives the whole team a charge," Yarworth said. "But you have to use strategy, too. If you don't have a relay team that can win, then you won't put your best swimmers out there that early. It's a bit of a chess game."

The event has become one of the team's strongest, so they should fare well this weekend.

The Minutemen will be swimming the mile for the first time this season. Naturally, the freestyle-distance swimmers participate in the event, including sophomores Mike Prout, Tristan Partridge and Brad Sloan, alongh with freshmen Tim Smith, Justin Brooks and Brendan Jones.

In preparation, the team did not have the benefit of having a week off from competition, as they did going into last week's meet with BU.

However, the team held less strenuous practices the past three days in an attempt to rest for this weekend, something they did not do for a week ago.

"I think the kids are excited about the meet," Yarworth said. "They are definitely physically and mentally prepared."

While the swimmers compete at BU, the divers will be a few miles further down I-90 participating in the Harvard Invitational against divers from several schools.

Junior R.J. Rappe will not participate due to an undisclosed injury. He dove only in one-meter dive last weekend against BU, but finished an uncharacteristic second. The coaching staff hopes his injury will heal soon, to allow enough time to prepare for the A-10 Championships in February.

The women's team is currently enjoying significant depth at diving. Sophomore Karen Upperco, senior Mary Jenkins and junior Melissa Pond have been pushing each other to a new level.

Jenkins edged the defending A-10 Diver of the Year, Upperco, in the three-meter dive last weekend. In the one-meter, Jenkins lost to BU diver Alex Crerar by less than one point.

The most interesting competition will be the rematch between Crerar and Upperco. Both divers won their league's respective championships last year as true freshmen. Crerar won the three-meter dive at the America East Championships, while Upperco finished first in both at the A-10's.

Even though three straight nights of intense swimming competition can be exhausting, it's difficult for both the players and coaches not to get into the meets, especially during the final session.

"To me, one of the single best athletic events is the championship final in the night session of a meet. Everybody's there, everybody's excited and making noise for their teammates. It's just one of the greatest events period."

MICHAEL TOURJEE/COLLEGIAN

Junior Kate Mills began the 2006-07 season with back-to-back double-doubles against Vermont and New Hampshire. She scored 19 points with 13 rebounds on Friday, and 16 points with 10 rebounds on Tuesday.

W. BASKETBALL from page 12

much of Navy's squadron is very comparable in ability.

"They have four kids that are basically the same. They're strong inside and they're strong outside. They haven't been shooting particularly well," Dacko commented. "They run a four-out, one-in [scheme] and we've got to be able to defend inside and not get extended on the perimeter."

Dacko added that she is confident her own players will matchup well against the academy – starting with freshman point guard Kim Benton.

The diminutive juggernaut showed tremendous shooting skills in her first two collegiate games, tallying 18 total points and going five-of-eight in three-point attempts.

"She can definitely command our offense," Dacko said. "She's getting better as she gets more and more confidant. She's learning. We have to get her to step up defensively and really contain defensively and not reach and she's got a green-light when it comes to shooting."

Junior forward Kate Mills is the Maroon and White's leader in points, with 35, and blocked shots with six. But Dacko said that she would gladly accept a decrease in blocked shots if Mills kept the Midshipwomen off the foul line.

"I really don't want Kate to block shots. I'd rather her just stay in the game and not get into foul-trouble. She has a tendency to put an arm down a lot and I'd rather have her with both arms up and defend and then rebound," Dacko said. "She's been fortunate in getting away with some blocks. If it's a clean block, that's fine. But if it's questionable I want her to be able to understand what she needs to do we need to keep her in the ball game and keep her focused.

The team's lone senior, forward Tamara Tatham has been silent as of late, but Dacko has her fingers crossed that this weekend will turn everything around.

"In order for us to be successful, she has to play well," Dacko said. "She's making herself smaller and she's making easy moves more difficult. We're just trying to bring her back to the basics."

Defense shuts down opposition, Minutewomen keep winning inability and lack of effort to get inside the paint for higher percentage shots.

In two games, UMass opponents shot 31-of-121 from the field, including just 11-of-53 from downtown. Despite the phenomenal opposing offensive numbers, Dacko refuses to give all the credit to her young team.

"I think the poor shooting of our opponents is more in their own hands rather than anything we've been doing," she said. "I don't know why New Hampshire didn't challenge us on the inside. We're still trying to work out the kinks in our zone. We're not yet where we need to be."

Dacko installed a different zone defense than in years past and it's paying early dividends. Since it's a new system, growing pains are to be expected.

"This year we've come out with a two-three zone, while last year we ran a three-two," Dacko said. "We've decided to pack it in inside and I think we'll gradually transform that into a one-three-one zone. We're still trying to work out the kinks in our zone and we're not quite where we need to be just yet."

Defensive stalwart and co-captain Kate Mills – who has six blocks already – agrees with Dacko about the improvements that still need to be made.

"I think for the most part the teams we played just had bad shooting nights," she said. "I think we still really need to work on our defense. It's getting better every day but our defense is something we have to continue to improve at. It will make or break us down the stretch."

Although Dacko refused to be complacent with her team defense, she is pleased with their effort thus far.

"I'm happy with our interior defense so far," she said. "Are we where we need to be? No. We have a lot of work ahead of us, but it's very encouraging."

Also encouraged by the progress the defense has made in the early going is junior co-captain Alisha Tatham.

"I definitely think this year we're focusing a lot more on our defense than previous years," she said. "I think it's something that will help us win a lot of basketball games. We've been working on our defense from day one, and it's something we'll continue to work on. It's our main focus this year."

"I think we're talking a lot more on defense," Tatham added. "Communication is improved and we're letting each other all know where the opposing offensive players are. Reminding other teammates what we have to do on defense has been big for us."

If the UMass opposition continues to shoot at the same rate, Dacko may have no choice but to credit more of the success to her team's defense, rather than pinning it all on poor shooting. Either way, the Minutewomen can expect to continue notching victories with similar defensive performances.

Swisher & Co. eyeing history

By Joe Mellone
Collegian Staff

UMass men's swimming coach Russ Yarworth's teams are always good.

A graduate of UMass in the class of 1978, Yarworth took over as coach in 1979 – posting a 225-64 record since then, while winning 16 championships in the process.

Upon entering the 2006-07 season, Yarworth knew that a certain group of Minutemen had a chance to do something special no one at the school has seen before.

Having already approached it in practice, Yarworth's 400-yard medley relay team could break the school-record time of 3:22.11. It was set in 2001 by a group led by former UMass swimming great Chris Arsenault.

Yarworth's team consists of senior Evan Swisher, senior captain Jake Hogue, reigning Atlantic 10 100-yard butterfly champion sophomore Nate Bromage and freshmen Juan Moliere and Trevor Ziegler, who are competing for time on the freestyle anchor leg.

"The medley relay is kind of a good symbol of how balanced and deep your team is because if you can win a medley relay, it means you've got strength in every event," Yarworth explained. "Our [400] medley relay team is good because we're strong in each event. Evan's one of the best backstrokers in the conference, John [Weaver] and Jake are both great breaststrokers, Nate's one of the best [in the butterfly] in the conference and we've got some depth in the freestyle."

The 400-yard medley relay event is a race where a member of the unit swims one lap in their specialty stroke.

"Most people categorize it as a difficult course," O'Brien said.

Van Cortlandt is especially difficult for runners who begin the race at the back of the pack. At the start of the race the runners are forced to go out really hard because it becomes very narrow and hard to pass people when they make their way into the woods.

"People do have a tendency to go out hard and establish a position and that obviously puts a toll on the body," O'Brien said.

The course does not become any easier after the narrow section. The final challenge is a very steep hill called Cemetery Hill.

"It's aptly named because it takes a toll on a lot of the runners," O'Brien said.

The last leg of the race is a flat half-mile race to the finish line.

"It's a significantly competitive meet that everyone is extremely excited about running," O'Brien said.

Since he arrived in Amherst, Yarworth has groomed Swisher for greatness. In his first three seasons, he finished second at the A-10 Championships in the 200-yard backstroke and is the overwhelming favorite to win the event in February. Although it is early in the season, he has been recording times Yarworth expected him to post in December and January.

"I'm swimming faster now than I ever have," Swisher said. "I'm actually pretty close to my personal best. I shouldn't be getting those times until January."

Rarely is a swimmer named captain twice. However Yarworth knows what he has in Hogue. As a junior, Hogue finished fourth at the A-10 Championships in the breaststroke.

After a shaky start, the UMass breaststroke unit, led by Hogue, has swum great recently.

"Jake's been swimming really well," Yarworth said. "He's definitely kind of captured the A-spot right now."

The chemistry and familiarity of Swisher and Hogue makes them a great opening tandem in the relay. The backstroke leads directly into the breaststroke, so a seamless transition from swimmer to swimmer is vital.

The dive into the water by the next swimmer is the sport's equivalent of track's the passing of the baton, the more often the swimmers work on this, the more efficient they're going to be at shaving precious seconds off their time.

"I've known Jake and we've been swimming together the whole time we've been at UMass," Swisher said. "We know each other well and work really well together."

Junior John Weaver can step in on the event as well. He actually finished ahead of Hogue in the 200-yard breaststroke at the UConn Invitational to open the season. However, he has swum this event with the UMass B-squad a lot this season. This is not a reflection of his skills. Swisher and Hogue just work well together.

Knowing Weaver is gunning for that spot on the 400 medley A-team will keep Hogue from regressing this season.

"It's always good to have a little competition within your own team," Yarworth said.

The third leg of the race is the butterfly. UMass' Nate Bromage is the reigning A-10 Champion in the event and he's only a sophomore.

"After Jake is Nate, Nate's the best [butterfly swimmer] in the conference," Swisher said. "He's only a sophomore and he's already kind of a master in the [butterfly], for our third leg."

The final leg is the freestyle, the fastest of the four strokes which makes for some exciting finishes.

Moliere and Ziegler have etched themselves permanent places in key events for Yarworth. Both are top-notch freestyle sprinters while Ziegler's versatility makes him invaluable for the Minutemen – he won the 200-yard individual medley at BU last weekend.

Moliere's sprinting talents are what got him to UMass, he projects as a potential A-10 Champion in the 50-yard freestyle.

His aggressiveness and tenacity suit the relay very well. Pre-race, whether it is the medley relay or the freestyle relay, Moliere can be seen trying to get his teammates excited for the race. This is something that senior veterans Swisher and Hogue are happy to see from the youngster.

"He has this crazy race mentality," Swisher said. "He gets super intense whenever we race."

The Arsenault team's record has stood for five years, for Swisher and Co that's just too long.

UMass heads back to New York for postseason competitions

By Steve Gambs
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts cross country teams are training hard in the unusually warm mid-November weather. The teams run their final meet this weekend when they return to Van Cortlandt Park in the Bronx, N.Y.

The men will compete in the Intercollegiate Association of Amateur Athletes in America [IC4A] Championships and the women will race in the Eastern College Athletic Conference [ECAC] Championships.

Last week in New York, the Minutemen finished 14th with 418 points and the Minutewomen placed 21st with 571 points.

After not qualifying for the NCAA Championship meet, the IC4A and ECAC is the next best race. These races are equivalent to a National Invitational Tournament. Despite not making the NCAAs, Minutemen coach Ken O'Brien says he's pleased with the team's accomplishments.

"I still look at this as the second best cross country meet in the United States next to the NCAA [Championships]," O'Brien said. "The NCAA is probably the best cross country meet in the country and the [IC4A] is probably the next best."

At this point in the season the cross country teams are used to running in cold conditions, but for some reason whether it's global warming or just plain luck it has been a warm running season.

Usually by the middle of November the teams will run into high winds, freezing rain, harsh temperatures and even snow. Other than the downpours during the women's home race, the weather has been fairly warm and clear.

This weekend the weather forecast calls for perfect running conditions, partly cloudy and 53 degrees. At this point in the season teams would love anything above the freezing level.

"We are very fortunate," O'Brien said for the weather forecast this weekend.

Junior Christina DeRosa finished another strong race for the Minutewomen last week. She placed 46th overall in a field of 228 competitors from the Northeast region.

The Minutewomen ran a hard race only six days ago and coach Julie Lal reniere gave the girls a couple days of rest before their final meet.

"This week we have really backed off," Lal reniere said. "Their hard work is actually behind them at this point."

This week the Minutewomen have prepared on the track by doing various speed workouts to keep their legs in shape.

"They should go into [the race] very well rested," Lal reniere said.

This is the final cross country meet before winter track begins. However Lal reniere does not see any let down from her team.

"I want them to get after it and compete hard," Lal reniere said. "I'm hoping that they will have the best race of the season."

The Minutemen have been impressive this season and look to close out with a strong finish.

Sophomore Jesse Regnier and Junior Nils Fischer led the way last weekend, both finishing within the top 60 out of 230 competitors.

The Minutemen will run on the Van Cortlandt course for the third time this season. The course itself is very difficult, forcing runners to slightly change their running style.

UMASS PARKING ANNOUNCES
Opening of New Visitor's Parking at Athletic Complex

UMASS Parking Services announces the opening of new visitor's parking adjacent to the Athletic Complex on Stadium Drive. This 275 space lot will provide additional parking for visitors to the campus, as well as parking for athletic events at Rudd Soccer Field, the new field & track and the softball complex. The lot will be serviced by two paystations at a rate of 60¢/hour. The paystations operate on pay-by-space and do not require patrons to return to their vehicles to display a receipt – a common complaint with older paystations. The new paystations offer multiple payment options -- bills, coins, or credit cards.

This lot is serviced by UMASS Transit's Campus Shuttle, Routes 34 & 35, from 7:00 a.m. to 2:30 a.m. five days a week.

Border battle

Senior Mike Kostka and the Minutemen take a break from conference play this weekend as they take on Connecticut at the Mullins Center. The two schools are widely considered rivals based purely on the fact that they reside in bordering states.

Minutemen fight complacency in face of recent praise

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team is on top of the hockey world in the Northeast right now. The Mass Attack currently sits alone atop the Hockey East standings, and broke into the USCHO.com/CSTV Division I poll at No. 20 this week.

The last significant success the Minutemen saw was during the 2003-04 season, when the team went 19-12-6 overall and 12-9-3 in the conference. UMass entered the playoffs as the third seed and was the runner-up to Maine in the finals.

The next two seasons saw an early exit for UMass, as the team had a losing record and was swept out of the playoffs in the first round each year.

This year's Minutemen have shown a revival of the success UMass coach Don Cahoon brought to the program three years ago. At 5-1-1 overall, questions are already swirling from the media and elsewhere about where this version of the Minutemen are headed.

Cahoon is doing all he can to keep his players focused on the task at hand. He said that his team isn't interested in national rankings and who's in first place.

"That's for the media," Cahoon said. "That's for the fans. It's not for us. I talked briefly about it. I said basically what I said to [the media] and just left it at that, and the rest of it is nonsense."

Despite the no-nonsense attitude about the early recognition, Cahoon is certainly not one to turn up his nose at an accolade. Repeating his previous sentiments, Cahoon knows there is value in the acknowledgments, but takes them with a grain of salt.

"It's nice for the program to be recognized," Cahoon said. "It's nice for the players to get a pat on the back for their hard work, it's nice for the coaches to enjoy the fruits of their labor, but it has no bearing on anything right now. It is what it is — an early season ranking that brings attention to us. At the end of the day, the only poll that matters is the final poll."

Although Cahoon fields speculation about the team from every direction, he said his players have other things on their minds.

"I think the kids are blinded to a lot of that [media attention]," Cahoon said. "For the most part they're more concerned with trying to figure out which songs they want to play in the locker room, and what days they might be able to go to a movie with some girl they like on campus."

He then jokingly added, "They've got this whole thing in perspective."

However, at least two of UMass' skaters are aware of the attention. Sophomore goaltender Jon Quick and sophomore forward Chris Davis spoke at the press conference following last Friday's win against Northeastern.

With final scores being announced from other Hockey East games, the pair fielded questions about the early success of the team and the current league standings, which now had UMass all alone at the top. Cahoon quickly jumped in, answering several of the queries himself. He later said he was

Hockey edition of UMass and UConn rivalry renews

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

In this day in age of sports, the mere fact that two teams reside in neighboring states is enough to make them rivals. That is just the basis for the rivalry between UMass and UConn. No matter what the sport, whenever these two are paired against one another, talk of renewing a rivalry begins springing up.

Tomorrow the rivalry between the Minutemen and Huskies renews on the ice, UConn travels to Amherst tomorrow for a 4 p.m. start in this non-conference matchup.

Hockey is one sport where this rivalry may not be at its fiercest. Never the less, the paying fans who fill up the Mullins Center will no doubt be cheering extra hard for this one.

UMass coach Don Cahoon acknowledges the rift between the two schools, and says he's for anything that gives the Minutemen a boost.

"I think it's important to play games that are meaningful," he said. "We don't play too many that aren't meaningful, but this has a little bit of an edge to it, so we need to be prepared. And understand that it's one of the most important games they have on their schedule – Hockey East opponent and UMass – that constitutes a lot."

Although the teams didn't meet on the ice, UMass traveled to Storrs last season to compete in the Toyota UConn Hockey Classic. The last time the pair squared off was in 2004.

"We went to their tournament last year because of what I perceived as being a rivalry between the two schools," Cahoon said. "I think our guys understand the connection, although the rivalry might not be as intense athletically as some of the Hockey East rivalries are now at this point."

UConn is not typically known for its hockey program. The Huskies currently compete in Atlantic Hockey, a conference one step down from Hockey East. Recent history has shown that UConn isn't just about basketball.

The Huskies hung close in a number of games earlier in the season with premier teams. They brought Bowling Green into overtime on Oct. 13 before falling 3-2, they lost by two goals in a game against Michigan 7-5 and beat Mercyhurst in overtime, 5-4. All of the games occurred on the road.

More recently, UConn fell to Yale, 3-2. Cahoon says although the Huskies don't land the top-notch recruits, they still get their players from some of the best junior college leagues around.

"Some of them are older and they get into the college game and develop into outstanding players," Cahoon said. "They have a couple of goal-scorers."

One Cahoon specifically mentioned is senior Matt Scherer, who is off to a fast start this season. Enter the weekend, he has already tallied nine goals this season. That total is more than half the number he posted all of last season (15).

UConn does a lot of their offensive damage on the power play. Of the 33 goals it's scored this season, 13 of them came with the man advantage. The Huskies have also received many power-play opportunities.

Through 10 games, they've drawn 88 total penalties, almost nine per game. What all this says to the Minutemen is that UConn is not to be taken lightly.

"We can not go out there and think the game is going to be over in 20

Minutewomen take success to New Jersey

By Dominic Poli
Collegian Staff

The weekend has an array of formidable opponents in store for the Massachusetts women's basketball team as it heads to New Jersey for the Aeropostale Seton Hall Basketball Classic.

The Minutewomen are scheduled for two games – one tonight at 8 p.m. versus Navy (0-2), followed by one tomorrow against either Seton Hall (1-1) or Howard University (0-2) – pending the result of a first game.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko said that, first and foremost, she will focus on the game against Navy and concentrate on what the Midshipwomen will bring to the Garden State.

"They're very, very big. They've been averaging 48 points a game and given up 73. But, stats are deceiving. They're a very, very large team," Dacko said. "They're different than the two teams we've played. We've played smaller-looking teams [Vermont and New Hampshire]. But, any military academy, they're going to be beefy kids, they're going to be strong, they're going to be smart and we can't let our guard down. We've got to be able to execute inside-outside."

Senior Margaret Knap and junior Lauren Nelson are two of the most dangerous shooters on the Navy team, each registering 17 points thus far.

Knap started both of her team's games and played a combined total of 51 minutes for the Midshipwomen in those contests.

The 6-foot guard is seven of 19 in field goal attempts, including two-for-seven from the perimeter, and has recorded a steal. She also displayed some rebounding skills, pulling down six total boards this year.

"She's a good athlete with a nice jumper. She doesn't need a lot of time to get [her shots] off," Dacko said. "She shots 29 percent from the three. She's probably they're best overall player."

Though she has not started a game this year, Nelson has played 30 minutes and has a higher shooting percentage than her senior counterpart. A dominating 6-foot-2 center hailing from Plano, Texas, Nelson is six-of-13 in field goals, carrying a .462 percentage on the year.

Despite these two key components, however, Dacko stressed that she refuses to concentrate on any one particular player, saying that Freshman Diatrema Hill is battling for playing time this season. The unproven guard came off the bench in each of the Minutewomen's first two games, recording 13 minutes in those contests combined.

UM defense holding opposition in check

In baseball, even the best hitters fail two-thirds of the time. When it comes to basketball, a good shooter should be able to connect on about half of their shots. By no stretch of the imagination have the two opponents of the Massachusetts women's basketball team even approached that percentage.

While it can be argued that defense wins championships, there's little debate regarding the biggest reason for the Minutewomen's first 2-0 start since the 2002-03 season.

"I think our defense has been a big reason for our fast start," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "Everything starts with our defense. Not only has it stopped our opponents, but it ignites our offense."

In the season opener at Vermont, the Maroon and White held the Catamounts to a dismal 18-of-68 shooting the field, good for just a 26.5 shooting percentage. Even worse was their accuracy from the perimeter where they shot five-of-23 for a 21.7 percent success rate.

The Minutewomen duplicated a similar performance on the defensive end in their home tipoff against New Hampshire on Tuesday. The Wildcats shot even worse than the Catamounts en route to a 60-38 drubbing at the Mullins Center.

UNH suffered the same fate, living and subsequently dying behind the arc. The Wildcats sunk just six out of their 30 three-pointers (20 percent), and shot an abysmal 13-of-53 from the floor. That 24.5 percent mark was a direct result of New Hampshire's

SGA debates $6 student activity fee increase proposal

By Loraine Burger
Collegian Staff

Senators debated ardently to pass critical motions during the fourth University of Massachusetts Student Government Association Senate meeting on Wednesday.

The first motion passed concerned fund requests from the UMass Ski 'n' Board Club. Ski 'n' Board president, Jeff Pluta, addressed the SGA for a $4,500 fund allocation. Pluta explained that the Ski 'n' Board Club has received significantly less funding this year due to the fact that Registered Student Organizations are no longer allotting funds for transportation and food.

Pluta said, "the club's primary means for fundraising, the annual UMass "Ski 'n' Board Sale," will not generate enough profit to run the club for the rest of the year" because of the fees to organize the event.

Pluta further explained that approximately $3,200 was spent for police fees for the event, because the RSO could not get private security, which would have cut the spending by 50 percent. The remaining $1,300 will go towards the room rental, audiovisual fees and parking for the fundraising sale. Fortunately, for the approximately 300-member RSO, this motion was unanimously passed.

The second motion of the night was also unanimously passed, but with considerably less discussion. UMass student Mary Duran was appointed Senator for the vacant Commuter Area seat. Duran expressed her interest in SGA by her full attendance to every Senate meeting this year at UMass.

The last motion passed was for the $6 fee increase for Student Activities beginning next year. The fee increase is a response to upcoming hikes in minimum wage and approved increases for certain RSOs. The controversial topic went through a series of debates with those opposed to the motion asking senators how they can run a campaign to freeze fees, yet support the fee increase.

President Elvis Mendez supported the fee increase, and retorted by saying that by increasing the student activities fee, "it does not mean that we do not care about our RSOs," and it is a short-term response to the SGA budget crisis. Mendez explained further that by rejecting the fee increase, they would be forced to cut programs and find other alternatives.

Students dance at UMass fundraiser

The fundraiser fell short of the $30,000 goal, but was able to raise $10,537 for the Baystate Children's Hospital in Springfield.

The Curry Hicks Cage turned from a basketball court to a dance hall on Friday night as hundreds of students gathered to support the University of Massachusetts' UDance Marathon Fundraiser.

The event, which lasted from 8 p.m. to 10 a.m. the following morning, provided a great deal of entertainment and more importantly was able to raise $10,537 to benefit the Children's Miracle Network. The production was coordinated mostly by the sororities and fraternities on campus, and the money will go directly to the Baystate Children's Hospital in Springfield.

Those in attendance were treated with a variety of performances ranging from Mission Improvable, the UMass Dance and Cheerleading teams, Not Ready for Bedtime Players, a hypnotist, trivia and a stirring performance from Ray Boston that was a big hit with the kids in attendance.

The theme of the event was "Around the World," and each sorority and fraternity was assigned to represent a specific country. Their responsibilities included making posters, decorations, costumes and learning and presenting a dance associated with their specific country.

Despite falling short of their $30,000 goal, those who helped coordinate the fundraiser were more than pleased with how it turned out.

"I thought the night was a huge success, and everyone seemed to have a really good time," said Todd Foster, head of public relations for the event. "We didn't have any issues, and everyone who was involved had a fantastic time. It was a great foundation for the future events to come."

"We would have loved to help the children even more," said Hayley Katz, the co-chair for the event. "But it was about getting as many people to come as we could so next year can be even bigger and we can raise even more money."

The break dancing performances, the hypnotist and Ray Boston were all popular with the crowd, but the biggest stars of the night were the kids and parents who were the inspiration for the event.

It was a night that those kids and their parents won't soon forget.

"That night meant so much to those families," Foster said. "It shows that there are so many people who really care about what they're going through and there are people out there that want to help them.

"It was just a good thing for everybody involved," he added. "It raised the families' spirits and gave them hope for the future, showing that college kids were willing to help them."

Working alongside the Children's Miracle Network, the Greek community throughout UMass came together and put on an entertaining and highly successful event. It was an event that took a lot of planning and hard work.

"A lot of coordination went into setting up this event," Katz said. "We started with nothing. We began preparing around seven months ago, and to tell you the truth that probably wasn't even enough time."

"The whole point of this was to show our desire and to give back to the

Hadley judge reacts to criticisms

By Anna Dollantis

Judge Nancy Dusek-Gomez defended her inclination toward alternative punishment rather than immediate jail sentences in a press conference at the Eastern District Courthouse in Hadley, Mass. on Nov. 10.

"It's important to let people know that there are consequences to their actions," said Dusek-Gomez, responding to claims that her rulings have been drawing scrutiny in the past several months.

Dusek-Gomez, the presiding justice for the Eastern Hampshire District Court since 1996, has been the subject of media attention as a result of an ad which ran in the Massachusetts Daily Collegian on Sep. 12. Many assumed that Dusek-Gomez purchased the ad, which stated, "Welcome back, students…I hope we never meet."

Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs at the University of Massachusetts, Michael Gargano, took out the ad, based on an editorial which the judge submitted.

"I didn't think it warranted a full-page ad. If he did, I thought, then he must know more about the school than I did," said Dusek-Gomez.

The judge noted that although the court has seen a significant decrease in charges, the types of charges are changing. She said that the charges in September "usually involve binge drinking, a kicking up your heels because you're away from your parents." She also attributes the change to the difference in weather, saying that there were more arrests this September, which was warm, as opposed to last September, which was rainy.

Judge Dusek-Gomez has handed down several non-traditional sentences in recent months, the most publicized being the UMass student who was arrested and charged with being a minor in possession of alcohol, having an unlicensed keg and creating excessive noise, according to Amherst Police.

The student, James I. Connelly, was dressed in a toga and made harassing comments toward a female police officer during his detention. "It was a barrage of expletives, not toward the big-armed male police officer, but toward the female officer. I said to him in open court, "Do you have a sister? A mom?" Dusek-Gomez said.

Connelly said in court that he wished he could relive the situation and handle himself differently, and the judge's sentence reflected this wish. He was ordered to stand in front of the police station at 5 a.m. in the same outfit that he wore that night – a toga – and apologize.

This sentencing caused controversy in the campus community, and the judge was met with claims that her sentencing aimed to embarrass the individual. Dusek-Gomez responded by saying that the intent of the sentencing was "to make the punishment fit the crime."

"The intent was not to embarrass the kid or to make it an event. The intent was for him to express to the officer what he said in open court when he sobered up, that he was sorry, that it was inappropriate, and that he wouldn't do it again," said Dusek-Gomez.

In 2001, Dusek-Gomez sentenced a teenage drug offender who stated, "I don't know why I got high," to listen to Afroman's, "Because I Got High," a hip-hop song which details a teenagers experience with drugs, ultimately leading to a car accident and paralysis said Dusek-Gomez. A reporter, who happened to be in the courtroom observing a murder trial that day, heard the sentence, and the story received national attention when it was picked up by the Associated Press.

Dusek-Gomez attributes her alternative approach to the experiences she encountered throughout her life. She started off working in a junior high school, teaching ESL classes, and guidance counseling. Her adult students ran intro trouble signing contracts that they couldn't fulfill and paying money for services which they didn't receive, and Dusek-Gomez believed that she could be of assistance to them in the courtroom.

"I wouldn't put up with a lot of

Democrat-led house affects college students

Massachusetts Gov.-elect Deval Patrick promised to make education a major theme in his administration.

By Loraine Burger
Collegian Staff

On Nov. 5, students across the state voted, many for the first time, for the State Governor of Massachusetts. Democratic candidate Deval Patrick won 55.7 percent of the votes, winning the position of the new Massachusetts State Governor to his leading competitor, Republican candidate Kerry Healey.

"Anytime you stand out by doing right it's good for the University and the Commonwealth. Some of us came to Massachusetts because it was the only state that went against Nixon in 1972 in that earlier stolen election," stated John Brigham, a Public Law professor here at UMass.

This year is the first in twelve years that there hasn't been full Republican control of Congress. A divided government could go either way: the state could become a complete deadlock, or a compromise could be reached and progress could be made. The one thing that won't change is the value of education. Regardless of what party is in power, higher education is always a top priority, according to a college lobbyist who spoke after Patrick's announced victory.

As The Boston Globe noted, Patrick promised to make education a major theme in his administration. He has stressed the importance of the state's business community to support university research due to the enormous role colleges and universities play in Massachusetts' economy. The current state budget includes $90 million a year for financial aid, most of which is in the form of grants, according to Richard J. Doherty, president of the Association of Independent Colleges and Universities in Massachusetts.

"I was excited at the prospect of having Deval Patrick as my state governor," stated Magdalen Zander, a student at UMass. "I hope he improves healthcare in the state of Massachusetts, and he successfully decreases classroom sizes in public schools, as well as increase funding for colleges."

Pledging to make it easier for students to go to college, Patrick plans to roll back $13 billion in cuts to increase and promote higher education programs. During Patrick's campaign, he pledged to decrease the rates of the federal Stafford loans from the current rate of 6.8 percent to 3.4 percent. He also plans to reduce the rate for Parent Loan for Undergraduate Students from the current 8.5 percent to 4.25 percent.

Another initiative he plans to work on to help college students is to increase to the maximum Pell Grant from $4,050 to $5,100. The Pell Grant is the largest form of federal aid for low-income students, and the amount hasn't budged since 2003. There is also talk of plans to replace tuition-related tax breaks with a tuition tax credit up to $3,000. Democrats are believed to become much more aggressive in terms of "oversight." In other words, they are trying to hold the executive branch responsible for its conduct in carrying out federal policy.

College lobbyists predict that Democrats may examine whether the Education Department has taken over Congressional authority by restoring the priorities of the Upward Bound Program through regulation rather than legislation. Senator Edward M. Kennedy signaled that Democrats might explore whether the Education Department has adequately monitored whether lenders are giving inappropriate incentives to colleges to use their products.

Despite the promises being made, there are still many concerns regarding college life of Massachusetts students with Democrats ruling the State House. According to Doug Lederman, a founder of the Web site InsideHigherEd.com, a major concern is the renewal of the Higher Education Act, which has severely weakened in Congress. Another is the survival of the Commission on the Future of Higher Education. A Democrat-led house also means possible change in for-profit colleges and lenders who have gained relationships over the years with Republican lawmakers, as stated by Lederman.

"I was extremely disappointed when I heard about Patrick's win because I think that people voted for him for the wrong reasons," said Stephen Tower, a

Boston skyline to gain 75 stories

The conceptual design composite made and released by Boston Redevelopment Authority shows a proposed skyscraper in downtown Boston.

BY MARK JEWELL
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Finally, things are looking up — 1,000 feet and 75 stories up — in this history-rich city where colonial era church steeples are prized over skyscrapers, and the skyline's few tall buildings are largely conservative in design.

Local businessman Steve Belkin's proposed glass-and-steel tower would top the city's current tallest building by more than 200 feet and 15 stories, reflecting a resurgence in the downtown commercial real estate market, observers say.

"I think it's going to make a lot of our other buildings look very boring, quite honestly," said Frank Nelson, a Boston-based executive director with the commercial real estate services firm Cushman & Wakefield. "We need it."

The design by renowned Italian architect Renzo Piano emerged last week in response to Mayor Thomas Menino's call in February for private development proposals to replace an aging city-owned parking garage in the heart of the Financial District.

Officials in Boston and other U.S. cities typically seek to rein in developers' wishes to build high above neighboring office buildings, but the sky was the limit for Menino. He encouraged a bold architectural statement to surpass the John Hancock Tower, which for three decades has stood as New England's tallest building at 60 stories and 792 feet.

The Hancock anchors Boston's Back Bay section along with the 42-year-old, 52-story Prudential Tower.

In the nearby Financial District — home to the likes of Fidelity Investments and State Street Corp. — most tall buildings top out at around 40 stories. The last time a new Boston building of more 40 stories went up was in 1987, with the completion of the 46-story One International Place.

In a city that has managed to save historic structures such as King's Chapel and the Old Statehouse from overshadowing high-rises, reluctance to build high runs deep. A state law restricts new buildings that would cast a shadow on Boston Common, and past proposals to build 50 stories or higher in the Financial District have failed to secure city approvals.

"We are an old city that is not that tall, so we take a look at each project and make sure it is appropriate," said Susan Elsbree, a spokeswoman for the Boston Redevelopment Authority, the city agency that will review Belkin's proposal.

So when Menino called for a project taller than any the city had seen before, the mayor and others hoped several developers would respond by last Monday's design-submission deadline, leading to a competitive selection process.

But in the end, there was just the proposal from Belkin, the founder of credit card and travel companies, and part owner of two Atlanta pro sports teams, the Hawks and Thrashers.

However, real estate officials say Menino's failure to bring in more than one development proposal is not an indication that the downtown commercial real estate market has failed to break out of a five-year slump.

They say the office building market is starting to catch up with recent booming residential growth in high-rise downtown condominiums. They cite the Boston office market's vacancy rate of 8.2 percent in this year's third quarter — the lowest in more than four years.

Romney argues for ballot question

Massachusetts governor, Mitt Romney said he would file a legal action urging for gay-marriage to be placed on the Jan. 2 ballot.

BY DAVID WEBER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — Gov. Mitt Romney said Sunday he would ask the state's highest court to order an anti-gay marriage amendment question onto the ballot if legislators fail to vote on the matter when they reconvene in January.

Romney said he would file a legal action this week asking a justice of the Supreme Judicial Court to direct the secretary of state to place the question on the ballot if lawmakers don't vote directly on the question on Jan. 2, the final day of the session.

Romney, an opponent of gay marriage who decided not to seek re-election as he considers running for president, made his announcement to the cheers of hundreds of gay marriage opponents at a rally on the Statehouse steps.

"The Constitution quite plainly states that when a qualified petition is placed before them, the Legislature 'shall vote.' It does not say 'may vote,' or vote if procedures permit a vote, or vote if there are enough of the members in the chamber. It says, 'shall vote,'" Romney said.

People in favor of gay marriage staged a protest across the street.

The Supreme Judicial Court ruled in November 2003 that such marriages were legal. Since then, more than 8,000 same-sex couples have tied the knot in the state.

More than 170,000 people had signed a petition in support of the ballot question, which would define marriage as between only a man and a woman.

Romney has criticized lawmakers since they voted 109-87 earlier this month refusing to take up the question during a joint session, voting instead to recess until Jan. 2 and all but killing the measure.

"The issue now before us is not whether same-sex couples should marry," Romney said. "The issue before us today is whether 109 legislators will follow the Constitution." Supporters of gay marriage defended the Nov. 9 procedural move.

"One of the tenets of the Constitution is that you do not put the rights of a minority up for a popularity contest," said Mark Solomon, campaign director of Mass Equality, a pro-gay marriage group. "It is one of the very principles this country was founded upon."

Solomon criticized Romney for holding a one-sided political event on Statehouse property.

"Gov. Romney is trying to divide Massachusetts and use this issue as a device to run for president," Solomon said.

Romney spokesman Eric Fehrnstrom said the governor conferred with the state Ethics Commission before staging the event in front of giant American flag hung from the Statehouse balcony while a sound system played John Philip Sousa's "Stars and Stripes Forever."

"This is a democracy rally, and the governor is trying to see that some lawmakers play their legislative role," Fehrnstrom said.

Because the Legislature is in recess and did not adjourn, Romney has no legal authority to call lawmakers back into session.

Spokesman for Senate President Robert Travaglini and House Speaker Salvatore DiMasi did not immediately return a call Sunday.

The Legislature grappled with various efforts to ban same-sex marriages even before the high court ruling in 2003. Lawmakers refused to vote on a citizens' initiative in 2002, and two years later voted down their own proposed amendment that would have banned gay marriage and legalized civil unions.

In the November elections, amendments to ban gay marriage passed in Colorado, Idaho, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Virginia and Wisconsin. Only Arizona defeated such an amendment.

Vermont and Connecticut have legalized civil unions that give same-sex couples benefits similar to marriage. New Jersey's highest court has ordered the Legislature to allow either marriage or civil unions for same-sex couples.

Poisoning of former anti-Kremlin spy raises suspicions

Lieutenant Colonel Alexander Litvinenko, a former Russian spy and critic of Russian President Vladimir Putin.

BY TARIQ PANJA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LONDON — A former Russian spy poisoned in Britain and now hospitalized under guard may have been targeted for his criticism of former colleagues and his investigation into the killing of a prominent anti-Kremlin journalist, friends and fellow dissidents said Sunday.

Col. Alexander Litvinenko, a former KGB agent, said earlier this week that he fell ill on Nov. 1 following a meal with a contact who claimed to have details about the slaying of Anna Politkovskaya, the Russian journalist gunned down last month in Moscow.

A doctor treating Litvinenko told the British Broadcasting Corp. that tests showed he was the victim of poisoning by thallium — a toxic metal found in rat poison. He is under armed guard at University College Hospital in London.

"He's got a prospect of recovering, he has a prospect of dying," said Dr. John Henry, a clinical toxicologist who treated Ukrainian President Viktor Yushchenko in 2004 after he was poisoned during his presidential election campaign. Henry said thallium can cause damage to the nervous system and organ failure, and that just one gram can be lethal.

In an interview with the Sunday Times before his condition worsened, Litvinenko described how he had lunch with an Italian contact who claimed to have had information on Politkovskaya's killing, which has not been solved. British news outlets identified the contact as Mario Scaramella, an Italian academic who helped investigate KGB activity in Italy during the Cold War.

"They probably thought I would be dead from heart failure by the third day," Litvinenko is quoted as saying in the Sunday Times. "I do feel very bad. I've never felt like this before — like my life is hanging on the ropes." Police have opened an investigation into the poisoning, said a spokesman, speaking on condition of anonymity in line with force policy.

Glenn Edwards, operations manager at Itsu restaurant where the lunch took place, told The Associated Press that detectives had arrived at the restaurant on Saturday asking for close circuit television footage.

Litvinenko left Russia for Britain six years ago, and has become an outspoken critic of the Kremlin. In a 2003 book, "The FSB Blows Up Russia," he accused his country's secret service agency of staging apartment-house bombings in 1999 that killed more than 300 people in Russia and sparked the second war in Chechnya.

Former KGB spy, Alexander Litvinenko, is the author of the book "Blowing Up Russia: Terror From Within."

Boris Berezovsky, the Russian dissident and tycoon who was at Litvinenko's bedside on Friday, told The Associated Press he suspects Russia's intelligence services of the poisoning.

"It's not complicated to say who fights against him," Berezovsky said in a telephone interview. "He's (Russian President Vladimir) Putin's enemy, he started to criticize him and had lots of fears."

Another friend, Alexander Goldfarb, who organized Litvinenko's emigration to Britain, said FSB agents had threatened against him in the past.

"He looks like a ghost," Goldfarb said. "He's a very fit man, he never smoked, he never drank, he would run five miles a day, but now he has lost all his hair, he has inflammation in the throat, so he cannot swallow."

Russian authorities did not immediately comment on the allegations.

Litvinenko joined the KGB in 1988 and rose to the rank of colonel in its successor, the Federal Security Service, known as the FSB. He began specializing in terrorism and organized crime in 1991, and was transferred to the FSB's most secretive department on criminal organizations in 1997.

He fled Russia and claimed asylum in Britain in November 2000, two years after publicly accusing his FSB superiors of ordering him to kill Berezovsky, at the time a powerful Kremlin insider. Berezovsky said Sunday that Litvinenko fell out with his superiors after he exposed corruption within FSB ranks.

Before he left Russia, Litvinenko was jailed for nine months awaiting trial on charges of abusing his office; he was acquitted.

Kremlin critics claim poisoning — which is extremely hard to prove — is a common Soviet-era practice that seems to have reappeared since Putin, an ex-KGB officer, became president.

"It is not a secret that poisoning has become some kind of a trademark of a secret war in Russia," Alexander Golts, political commentator with the Russian news Web site Ezhenedelny Zhurnal, told the Associated Press. "I will not take the risk of accusing the government ... but certain groups have quite overtly been eliminating people they disliked through poisoning.

"It is absolutely obvious that this story with Litvinenko fits very well into the overall picture of power struggle in Russia," he said.

Politkovskaya, who had written critically about abuses by Russian forces fighting separatists in Chechnya, fell seriously ill after drinking tea on a flight from Moscow to southern Russia in 2004 during the school hostage crisis in Beslan. Colleagues say she was poisoned.

Gas price averages increase

LAMARILLO, Calif. (AP) — Gas prices are on the rise again, just as Americans hit the highways for Thanksgiving.

Gas prices rose about 5 cents per gallon nationwide compared to two weeks ago, industry analyst Trilby Lundberg said Sunday.

The national average for self-serve regular was $2.23 per gallon on Nov. 17, according to Lundberg's latest survey of 7,000 gas stations across the country.

The national average for mid-grade was $2.34 a gallon, while premium was $2.44.

The lowest average price in the nation for self-serve regular was in Houston, where a gallon cost $2.05.

The highest average price in the nation for self-serve regular was in Honolulu, where a gallon cost $2.75.

California prices rose by more than double the national average, with an increase of 11 cents for self-serve regular since Nov. 3, Lundberg said.

NASA seeks funding to reach the stars

BY RAHUL KANAKIA
THE STANFORD DAILY (STANFORD U.)

STANFORD, Calif. — In his 1976 Ph.D. thesis, Paul Worden proposed a satellite experiment that could possibly disrupt the physics world. Thirty years later, that project has grown into the Satellite Test of the Equivalence Principle and is closer to being launched than it ever has been. On Tuesday, David King, the head of NASA's Marshall Space Flight Center and John Horrack, Manager of Science and Mission Systems at Marshall, made an all-day visit to the STEP offices to see if NASA would consider giving them the funding they need to reach the stars.

Worden, now co-principal investigator for STEP, wanted to launch a satellite into space to test Einstein's Theory of General Relativity, which had been questioned due to experimental inconsistencies. Today, STEP has designed a two-meter-long satellite that will remain in orbit for six months. STEP is now seeking the funds to build and launch the satellite.

NASA, which is funding STEP's current research, grew more interested in giving further funding to the satellite after the launch of Gravity Probe-B (GPB), a previous collaboration between Stanford and NASA. Rodney Torii, co-principal investigator for STEP, felt that the visit went well.

"There are a number of projects at the MSFC, but David King is certainly very interested in seeing the science happen," Torii said. "Since GPB is ending and I don't believe that there are that many fundamental sci-student at UMass. "His platform was weak compared to the other candidates." When asked what his hopes and concerns were for the future with a Democrat-led house, Tower responded, "I'm worried my family's multi-generation tradition of hunting will change because of Patrick's gun control position. I also hope that he will either continue or expand on the John and Abigail Adams Scholarship Award."

House Democrats are also expected to push legislation, according to Lederman — which went nowhere under Republican control — that would provide financial incentives to colleges if they leave the federal government's guaranteed student loan program, and move into the competing direct loan program, which several government reports have shown is cheaper to administer.

This new change in the House has produced upstairs as well as eased nerves. Whether the change will create a compromise or a dilemma is still in question; a question that won't be answered for several months.

baloney. I recognized that people have weaknesses and they need correction, but they're good people," said Dusek-Gomez. "Judges don't like throwing people in jail, as long as it's not a violent crime. If you have an alternative to officer, they'll take it. It's cheaper than locking people up, and hopefully it will make a difference," she said.

Dusek-Gomez has received criticism that her unconventional sentencing might be letting offenders off too easily, rather than forcing them to accept the consequences. "It's worth it to me if some of these students listen. The others may say, 'Hey I got off.' If they come back, they don't get the same treatment again," said Dusek-Gomez.

Although Dusek-Gomez's main motivation is that she doesn't want to "saddle a young person with a criminal conviction," her alternative sentencing isn't limited to teenagers.

Dusek-Gomez sentences adults throwing cigarettes from car windows to pick up trash along the street, "because if you're going to litter on Route 9, you should clean up Route 9," she said. The penalty in Massachusetts for littering from a motor vehicle is the loss of a driver's license for a time, while the penalty for littering on the street is a fine she said.

"We have grown people supporting their families, and if they lose their license, they lose their livelihood. Rather than say you're forgiven, the punishment should fit the crime," Dusek-Gomez said.

Although Dusek-Gomez has sworn to uphold the law, she has discretion in applying most of the statutes of Massachusetts, however, there are some over which she has no control, because the law requires minimum mandatory charges.

"Passing a joint is distribution," Dusek-Gomez said. "If you go down to that schoolland, and you're hawking crack cocaine to the kids, you're going to do the same time as the [person charged with] distribution [for passing a joint]." Dusek-Gomez has no discretion in this situation however, she says, "I have to uphold the law and I apply it and it's not without personal concern."

Dusek-Gomez will be returning to her previous position as Associate Justice of the Springfield District Court. She will be leaving her position as presiding justice at the Eastern Hampshire District Court because Springfield is closer to her home, her daughter attends school in Springfield and, lastly, because "it's easier to be an associate judge."

"Springfield is where the action is," said Dusek-Gomez.

community," Foster said. We want to show people that Greeks are important to this University, and that we're willing to do whatever we can to help out within the community for a worthy cause."

The hard work put forth by everyone involved was lauded by those at the Baystate Children's Hospital.

"The whole process involved a lot of hard work from many people," said Ely Dunn, Director of Baystate Children's Hospital. "They had to market the event, set up the gym, handle all of the logistics and deal with all of the legalities of having an event like this.

"All of this hard work will greatly benefit the children at the hospital," Dunn added. "UDance will improve the community involvement and get the message to Amherst that we have a children's hospital in Springfield that needs everyone's support. The money that we were able to raise will help support our program and people."

The money, which will go towards research, toys and essential equipment for children in need, was raised in part by each individual sorority and fraternity. It required a lot of work, but it meant a whole lot to those involved.

"It was an amazing night," said Heather Manning, a delegate from Alpha Chi Omega. "They had a couple of the children come talk to us. I was there the entire night and I felt like taking a break a few times, but I just looked over at the little kids suffering from illnesses and saw how much energy they still had. That's what inspired me to keep staying involved throughout the night. It was a great event with a lot of participation, and I think overall it was a great success."

At various times during the night, inspirational stories of children coping with diseases were displayed on the big screen. Stories like those were the reason why the event was started in the first place, and the 14 hours it lasted will go a long way for children with similar stories at Baystate Hospital.

The monies raised will go toward research, toys, and essential equipment for children in need.

Erotic theme park causes stir

BY CARLA SALAZAR
ASSOCIATED PRESS

HUAYRI, Peru — When Peruvian officials set out to spread the wealth, they probably didn't mean mayors should build extravagant town halls and heated swimming pools.

And they almost certainly didn't expect this wind-swept hamlet high on the Andean plateau to spend its windfall on an erotic sculpture park.

The sexually explicit creations in this isolated village 100 miles northeast of the capital, have become the focus of a furor over public spending that is dominating Sunday's nationwide local elections and posing a political headache for President Alan Garcia just four months after he was elected in a stunning comeback.

The original idea was to increase revenue-sharing from surging prices for gold, copper, zinc and other minerals, and indeed, municipalities in the mountains and jungles have seen their income from taxes on mining rise more than 1,000 percent in recent years, to nearly $1 billion this year.

But the extravagances prompted by the cash bonanza have raised fears of a voter backlash that will elect a more radical brand of leadership from outside the established political system.

People in Huayre are bemused by the uproar. National rulers, they figure, have been squandering their riches for centuries, so what's the big deal if Mayor Wenceslao Alderete hoped to attract tourists by gracing the village's central plaza with outsized images of genitalia and of the maca root, a tuber traditionally consumed as an aphrodisiac?

The federal government had hoped for more attention to priorities in communities like Huayre, which still lacks paved streets or a sewage system — typical among Andean towns in a country where half the population lives on less than $2 a day.

Alderete, an independent who is not running for re-election, said he is aware that his $158,000 park is being skewered in the media as typical of towns that are misspending their money.

A woman plays with her son at the Central Plaza in Huayre, Peru, a park where visitors are greeted by sexually explicit creations.

But he says it's the job of the regional government, not the mayor's office, to build infrastructures such as sewer systems, so that people don't have to rely on outdoor toilets.

"It pains me to watch my fellow villagers having to take care of their bodily needs that way," he said.

Long governed by strong central regimes, Peru moved to create autonomous regional governments and give them more revenue following the 2001 ouster of Alberto Fujimori's corruption-ridden administration.

But many local officials have yet to learn how to handle the newfound power and cash, said Eduardo Ballon, a senior analyst at Peru's Desco think tank.

"There is a wealth of deep-seated problems that cannot be hidden, one of which has to do with the lack of training at the local government level and the limitations for fulfilling functions and duties," he said.

Garcia's center-left Aprista party was the big winner in 2002 regional elections, taking about half of the 24 regional governments. But analysts predict his party will lose much of that ground Sunday, particularly in the isolated, often lawless, southern and central Andean highlands.

Garcia himself triumphed in June, shaking off the legacy of his chaotic, inflation-racked first administration in 1985-90 to win a second term as president.

Now he stands to lose ground in the provinces because independents with no direct ties to any national party are expected to become the new caudillos, or strongmen.

"Without a doubt that poses an even greater danger," said Juan Carlos Cortes, director of Citizens Up to Date, a watchdog group in Lima that has tracked spending by local governments.

"New caudillos are appearing," Cortes said. "The principal issue is, how do we provide sufficient information to the citizens themselves so they can demand certain standards from these new mayors or new regional presidents?"

In Huayre, meanwhile, the citizenry seems to be taking its unusual park in stride, still dreaming of a tourist influx pouring down the Central Highway past the village.

"To me, this is the best park in the zone along the highway," said Jesus Rupay, 38. "There was even an American couple who came riding through on a bicycle."

ence measures planned for Marshall, he came out here to get a better idea of both Marshall's role and Stanford's."

Torii was optimistic about King's reaction.

"He was very interested and positive about the science, and it's probably very safe to say that after coming to Stanford and seeing what it was all about, he's still very excited about the STEP project," Torii said.

The science involved is the Equivalence Principle (EP), one of the core facts about gravity that every schoolchild takes for granted. For Einstein, it was one of the planks of the Theory of General Relativity. Under the EP, the acceleration of a body in a given point in space due to gravity does not depend on its mass or shape. It is a lesson that Galileo learned when he dropped the two cannonballs off the Leaning Tower of Pisa.

However, Einstein's theory of gravity breaks down at the quantum level, where it has to interact with very small particles. Torii said that the project is looking for information about the various competing theories.

"We're basically studying gravity," Torii said. "There is a grand idea that inertial mass and gravitational mass are the same thing even though they're measured and thought of completely differently. If that grand idea is not true, then general relativity is not true. Now there are other theories of gravity, most of which rely on a violation of the equivalence principle."

STEP proposes to give the principle its most rigorous test to date by placing two nested masses in a drag-free satellite in orbit around the earth. Since orbit is a state of constant free-fall around the earth, the satellite will fall for six months, allowing researchers to record even miniscule differences in acceleration.

According to Torii, ground-based experiments only measure differences up to 1 part in 10^{13}, since the earth's magnetic field varies and minute seismic differences can skew the results. In space, the background noise is reduced by a factor of 1,000 and measurements are also 1,000 times more sensitive, allowing STEP to get up to 1 part in 10^{18}. Many alternate theories of gravitation state that the Equivalence Principle breaks down at around this level.

STEP has had to travel a long road to get this far. Initial research was funded by a seed grant from NASA, enough to support a few students, with the tiny possibility that it would someday become a satellite mission. After they started to run out of NASA funds in the 1980s, STEP looked to the European Space Agency, which was running a contest for scientific satellite missions. The mission made the final cut, but narrowly lost out to another project.

Proposed skyscraper design allows for increased office space

according to the commercial real estate firm CB Richard Ellis.

Observers say Belkin was the only developer to come forward because he has an edge over rivals to make the most of the hemmed-in Winthrop Square development site, where the skyscraper would replace the parking garage on Federal Street.

Because Belkin already owns a mid-rise building adjoining the oddly shaped site, he could expand his skyscraper to the space occupied by his existing building, which could be torn down.

"He really had the edge coming in," said David Begelfer, chief executive of the Massachusetts chapter of the National Association of Industrial and Office Properties. "The space issue has made it a much more limited opportunity for other developers."

Belkin wants to call his skyscraper Trans National Place, after his company, Trans National Group.

Piano is a Pritzker Prize-winning architect known for his work on such projects as the Centre Pompidou in Paris and The New York Times Co.'s new headquarters in Times Square.

His Boston design would create 1.3 million square feet of office space, with a mix of retail and restaurant space on lower floors. A 1-acre park would be built at ground level, with more public space on the building's roof.

Deck the Wals for Christmas

Melissa Garber

Last year Wal-Mart made a futile attempt to abandon Christmas. Instead of wishing customers a "Merry Christmas," the retail giant took a more PC route greeting patrons with "Happy Holidays." The standard Christmas theme synonymous with the holiday season was all but decimated in Wal-Mart stores.

According to a poll conducted by ABC News and Beliefnet, 83 percent of Americans identify themselves as Christian. So why was a corporation as affluent and as dependent on customer satisfaction as Wal-Mart, alienating more than three-quarters of its patrons?

The consumer backlash was unbelievable. The Catholic League for Religious and Civil Rights organized a national boycott after a woman from Allentown, Pa. complained that the phrase "Happy Holidays," was replacing "Merry Christmas," greetings in Wal-Mart stores.

A Wal-Mart customer service representative, known only as Kirby, responded to her by saying: "Walmart is a world wide organization and must remain conscious of this. The majority of the world still has different practices other than 'christmas' which is an ancient tradition that has its roots in Siberian shamanism. The colors associated with 'christmas' red and white are actually a representation of the aminita mascera mushroom. Santa is also borrowed from the Caucuses, mistletoe from the Celts, yule log from the Goths, the time from the Visigoth and the tree from the worship of Baal. It is a wide wide world."

Kirby's response infuriated the Catholic League to the brink of a national boycott, but there was another factor linked to the League's drastic measures. According to the Catholic League's president Bill Donahue, he couldn't type Christmas in a search engine without being directed to Wal-Mart's Holiday page. But when typing in Chanukah or Kwanzaa he was directly linked to their holiday specific merchandise Web sites (worldnetdaily.com). "We only trigger boycotts when we've been grossly offended," Donahue explained.

In an uncharacteristic move, Wal-Mart conceded to the Catholic League's demands. Kirby was subsequently fired and this year Christmas is Wal-Mart's indisputable theme of choice.

Which begs the question: how is Wal-Mart going to prove to its consumers that it is first and foremost dedicated to spreading Christmas cheer?

"We, quite frankly, have learned a lesson from last year," Wal-Mart spokeswoman Linda Blakley stated. "We're not afraid to use the term 'Merry Christmas.' We'll use it early, and we'll use it often."

In an uncharacteristic move, Wal-Mart conceded to the Catholic League's demands. Kirby was subsequently fired and this year Christmas is Wal-Mart's indisputable theme of choice.

With Black Friday merely days away, what does all this hype mean for loyal Wal-Mart patrons? Well according to an article in USA Today customers can expect to see about 60 percent more merchandise labeled 'Christmas' rather than 'holiday' this year, store signs counting down the days until Christmas and Christmas carols being piped throughout the season, along with many more Christmas related changes.

Wal-Mart is not a company to make the same mistake twice. They are already stocking cookies, milk, and carrots in preparation for Santa and his reindeer.

"Our intention is to make every customer feel welcomed and appreciated, whether they celebrate Christmas or other holidays," spokesman Jim Shuzewski said.

USA Today also reported that "Wal-Mart employees are also being encouraged to consider wishing customers holiday greetings that are appropriate to their race or religion, including Happy Kwanzaa or Feliz Navidad."

In light of their lofty endeavor, I offer Wal-Mart my proposal for use in identifying their customer's race and religion so that the appropriate greeting is executed. Wal-Mart cannot have its employees greeting every Hispanic looking person with, "Feliz Navidad," and every black person with "Happy Kwanzaa." That kind of profiling would be offensive.

Instead of blindly stereotyping its patrons, Wal-Mart needs to create a system where its employees can easily categorize customers. Upon entering the store, customers would be subject to a questionnaire in order to determine their religious and ethnic affiliation. After proper identification, customers would be presented with a sticker to be worn on their chest that easily displays their religious belief and/or ethnicity.

For example, Ron Karenga's portrait will be the sticker recognizing those who celebrate Kwanzaa, the Mexican flag will be the sticker alerting employees of a Spanish speaking Christian and a yellow Star of David sticker will help employees spot a Jew.

Under my proposal, no one can claim Wal-Mart's attempt to embrace their customer's diversity is misguided because with rock hard evidence, like identification stickers, everyone will get the holiday greeting they deserve. In a society where looks can be deceiving, it is important for retailers to be able to target customers based on their religion and ethnicity.

I'd like to close with a quote that I'm sure could be applied to my proposal. "This is a sweet victory for the Catholic League, Christians in general, and people of all faiths," Donohue said. "And it means that Wal-Mart can now enter the Christmas season without this cloud hanging over it."

Smothering out security

Dan Nicastro

Friends, fellow students and those looking for the crossword, lend me a few moments of your time. I have thought long and hard about our government, and those in charge of the departments which guard our national security. With this brooding, I have concluded that it must suck to be in charge of the Department of Homeland Security.

Michael Chertoff is in charge of this powerful cabinet department in the Bush administration, yet only lame political science people like me know his name. In fact, the whole branch has been under severe criticism since its inception after 9/11. Before Chertoff, Tom Ridge headed the department and was lambasted for his creation of a color-coded terror system, a tool used to calmly inform the general public that everyone should always be scared of everything, especially around election time.

More recently, in the Chertoff era, there was that whole Katrina thing where the Department of Homeland Security kind of ignored meteorological warnings telling them that New Orleans was going to be pretty much annihilated. Then they ignored the subsequent pleas and cries of all the inhabitants of the annihilated city, leading to more than 1,300 deaths and re-igniting the debate over racism in government (oops).

So, in short, it's been a long few years for the department and for Chertoff, but perhaps it's time to cut him some slack, for Chertoff is an honorable man.

On Friday, the Washington Post reported Chertoff as saying that "international law is being used as a rhetorical weapon against us," and that "members of the European Parliament in particular [harbor] an increasingly activist, left-wing and even elitist philosophy of law." Thank God someone pointed that out. How dare the international community judge and even influence the ways in which America does its business?

We've got a perfectly good system of running things around here, especially in terms of fighting the war on terror, something Chertoff knows very well. What does Europe know? It's not like they've ever had a real war on their soil. Insular places like Germany, France and Poland don't understand what it's like to have a war on their hands. They don't understand the meaning of the world war on global terrorism, or the tactics needed to defeat evil.

And what about the Middle East? They can't understand the pain of being attacked on their own home soil. If they did, they would surely lash out at several different countries and severely limit the civil liberties of its citizens. But Chertoff knows, for Chertoff is an honorable man.

Chertoff also blasted the international community for influencing American law. He claimed that the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld showed how international law had gained access to the American legal system. Those bastards. How dare they influence the U.S. Supreme Court to rule that the military and the Executive and Legislative branches of government need to obey and follow the U.S. Constitution?

The insistence of international law making authorities that citizens receive trials from commissions authorized by Congress, or that America follow both the Geneva Conventions and the Uniform Code of Military Justice is laughable. Lord knows Chertoff doesn't. And Chertoff is an honorable man.

Chertoff continued his noble tirade against the evils of international cooperation, pointing out an ongoing debate between the United States and Europe. European governments want full control in monitoring the sharing of personal information of trans-Atlantic airline passengers, because apparently, members of the international "blame America first" crowd were wary of their information being used by a foreign government.

He claimed that the Supreme Court's decision in Hamdan v. Rumsfeld showed how international law had gained access to the American legal system.

They obviously forgot that this was not just some rogue nation using their personal information. This was America using their personal information. And if you thought America was good at obtaining and using personal information against its own citizens, you should see how they obtain and use personal information against foreigners.

Chertoff knows all about this because his department has been implicated in sharing personal information of American citizens, even though they promised they wouldn't. In fact, no one is better at this game than Chertoff, and we all know that Chertoff is an honorable man.

Years ago, our civil liberties may have stood up to foreign conplaints. There was a time when we were an even more progressive nation and we had this silly concept of individual rights. But now, those rights lay six feet under, buried by the threat of terrorism.

Oh readers, I wish to do no harm to the reputation of Chertoff. In fact, I would rather talk ill of myself than to diminish this honorable man. As the honorable Chertoff was reported saying in the Washington Post, "There are increasing efforts to control our use of information in our own country...It (is) a chilling vision of where we could go, given the current developments in international and transnational law." Chilling indeed.

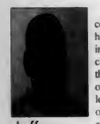
The sentencing of Rumsfeld



Jeff Napolitano

The events of the past couple of weeks might have some interesting consequences. We can't honestly believe that Democratic control of Congress is going to lead to reversal of years of atrocious domestic and foreign policy in the United States. The one symbolic change that the shift of power in the government did lead to was the ouster of the deceitful, arrogant and criminal Secretary of Defense, Donald Rumsfeld. However, instead of retiring to a cozy mansion in Washington somewhere, he should be shackled, brought to Iraq and hung in the gallows next to Saddam Hussein.

It begins with the recent conviction of old U.S. ally, Hussein. On Sunday, Nov. 5, Hussein was convicted of killing 148 Iraqi Shi'ites in 1982. While he is undoubtedly guilty of such crimes, the trial was largely a farce, as was pointed out by former U.S. Attorney General Ramsey Clark, who served as Hussein's counsel.

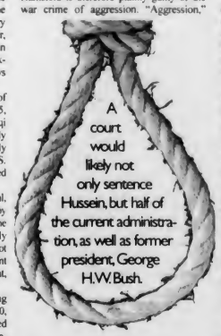
The construction of the court, the trial, the case and the charges were all arranged by the United States, not Iraqis. This was done for a very important reason. If independently left to the Iraqis, a court would likely not only sentence Hussein, but half of the current administration, as well as former president, George H.W. Bush.

The famous picture of Rumsfeld shaking hands with Hussein was taken on Dec. 20, 1983 – one full year after Hussein carried out the massacre for which he has been convicted. Rumsfeld was the special "Middle Easy envoy" for President Reagan, and was sent to Iraq not to chastise the dictator for his well-known crimes, but to establish diplomatic relations with him.

Following that meeting, President Reagan and his cohorts removed Iraq from the list of terrorist states, while at the same time selling Hussein military equipment as well as biological and chemical weapon materials. Bush the First continued the flow of these supplies to Hussein, even after the much-decried slaughter of the Kurds in 1988, up until the day Iraq invaded Kuwait.

Our dear former Secretary of Defense, Rumsfeld, was the facilitator for supplying Hussein with the very Weapons of Mass Destruction that we supposedly invaded Iraq to prevent being used against the United States. For that alone he should rot in a jail cell, yet his list of crimes goes on.

As the architect of the Iraqi invasion, Rumsfeld is therefore plainly guilty of the war crime of aggression. "Aggression," the unjustified invasion of one country by another, was described by the Tribunal at Nuremberg as "not only an international crime; it is the supreme international crime differing only from other war crimes in that it contains within itself the accumulated evil of the whole."



A court would likely not only sentence Hussein, but half of the current administration, as well as former president, George H.W. Bush.

The Tribunal was set up after World War II to review the crimes of the Nazis and establish values to prevent such atrocities from ever happening again. Those principles should still hold today.

Still the list against the former Secretary of Defense goes on. Rumsfeld's fingerprints are all over innumerous human rights abuses. "Willful killing, torture or inhuman treatment, including...willfully causing great suffering or serious injury to body or health, unlawful deportation or transfer or unlawful confinement of a protected person" constitutes a clear violation of the Geneva Conventions.

Through his approval of "extraordinary rendition," the practice of kidnapping foreign citizens in order to bring them to other countries to be tortured, as well as signing off on various forms of torture at Guantanamo, Rumsfeld has broken domestic civil law, international law and the most basic norms of human morality.

I must admit that I do not believe in the death penalty. It is itself an abomination of humanity. It turns those who seek justice into murderers themselves, and can never be morally justified. However, we must recognize that if the United States has executed officers from the second World War for war crimes, and that some states still routinely execute individuals for murder on a far more disparate scale, then the very least we can agree upon is that Rumsfeld and his cohorts deserve to spend the rest of their lives in prison.

What we do with Rumsfeld and other members of the government who participated in these and other crimes is not a political matter. It goes far beyond that, and is far simpler. He, and many others, engaged in breaking real, longstanding, humanitarian laws. These violations led to the torture of dozens of people (perhaps hundreds) as well as the massacre of hundreds of thousands of women and children in Iraq.

This is about whether we are a nation of laws or lawlessness. Whether we, as citizens of the greatest country on Earth reject brutality and corruption, and embrace the noble principles of justice. One way we can start is by stopping the hypocrisy, and start to oversee the prosecution of our former Secretary of Defense.

The FAC conjures up Momix

On Thursday night the Fine Arts Center hosted the extraordinary show Momix: Lunar Sea, a creative performance of visual enticement.

On Thursday evening, the Fine Arts Center at the University of Massachusetts held Momix, a glow in the dark show that leaves you wanting more. The Momix performers have an amazing ability to conjure up a world that seems surreal using props, lights, shadows, humor and the amazing human body.

Momix is run by artistic director, Moses Pendleton. This is Pendleton's latest project, which he entitled, Lunar Sea. Again, Lunar Sea conjures another world and takes you on a journey, where you push through what you thought was the normal limitations for the human body.

Momix is a company composed of dancer-illusionists who have put on internationally praised performances. The show is widely known for presenting works of exceptional inventiveness and physical beauty.

The line to get seated in the Fine Arts Center was extremely long. The red velvet curtain remained closed as people began walking in to take their seats. People were entering from all different sides of the venue, chatting away anxiously waiting for the show to begin.

The lights flashed, signaling that the show would begin shortly. After the usual exit announcements were made, with the last people running to their seats, the lights finally began to dim.

The dimness in the theater caused the audience to become completely silent as the curtain opened, revealing what looked like a screen displaying a moon and a face. There were eight people who stood across the stage, dressed completely in white. Florescent lighting hit them, making them appear blue.

One by one, these faceless bodies began slanting forward like a line of dominoes falling. Once all of them were facing the floor they began swaying back. Before long, they were swaying back and forth like grass in the wind. Using lights, the forms of the bodies constantly disappeared, helping to form unrecognizable but breathtaking shapes.

It was truly an unbelievable experience. There is no way to describe what it looked like or how they actually perform these tricks. The audience was constantly clapping and gasping, in hopes of figuring out how these tricks were done.

The background screen was continually changing throughout the performance. At one point it was a solar system, a moon, bodies, colors and even stars.

Later in the show, five people came out onto the stage. They looked like they were each under tents of some sort. After some swaying and circling was done, the people began to open an umbrella under the cloth and move it up and down. This gave the remarkable effect of jellyfish moving through the ocean.

They did many tricks similar to that, such as flying across the screen like birds, twisting completely upside down, rolling around like waves and even jumping in what looked like slow motion.

At no point during the show was it clear whether or not one person was doing these tricks or whether someone was assisting their stunts. Their movements seemed extremely effortless and smooth, as though the performers had been doing them for ever.

Momix was a breathtaking show that makes you rethink your body's physical capabilities. The performers constantly seemed to defy the laws of gravity and extend the expected limitations of their bodies. The show is full of lights, music and images that make it thoroughly interesting.

Momix performers are dancers of exceptional coordination and flexibility, to say the least.

Take away the flashy car and the cheesy storyline. Replace them with a more realistic "back-to-basics" plot, and you've got a stripped down, raw, bare-knuckled Bond film that goes against anything we've ever seen in previous "007" movies.

In the opening scene of "Casino Royale," we're reintroduced to James Bond (Daniel Craig) while he's on a mission that will elevate him to "00" status. The black and white images are retro-like, creating an almost surrealistic element unfamiliar to the Bond franchise. It's as if the scene is spelling out for you, "this is not the Bond you think you're expecting. This is a Bond with an edge."

With a storyline that goes from the Czech Republic to Madagascar to London to the Bahamas and Montenegro, Bond's first outing as agent 007 is no piece of cake.

Le Chiffre, the villain with a dodgy eye, is banker to the world's terrorists, and has recently lost his client's money in a badly-planned stock move. Forced to come up with the money or risk losing his head, Le Chiffre sets up a high stakes poker game in Montenegro to try and win back the money.

The best poker player in the Majesty's service, Bond goes to Montenegro to prevent Le Chiffre from winning. Agent M (Judi Dench, the only reoccurring character continuing with the Bond franchise) sends Treasury agent Vesper Lynd (Eva Green) to keep an eye on Bond and his money, as well as keep his ego in check.

In the past, 007 has always appeared as a man with a macho perfection, as if he knows by the end of the film he's going to save the world and win the girl. More gritty and down-to-earth than past Bond films, one reason this film is so entertaining is Craig's ability to portray a Bond that's more realistic.

His Bond is rough and lean, with an underlying dark twist that makes him come off more complex and violent than past Bonds. Bond makes mistakes and holds grudges. This Bond doesn't just cock his gun and shoot.

He punches and kicks, runs and jumps and kills men with his bare hands. This Bond even takes more of a beating, and man, what a beating it is – including one memorable torture scene that's sure to make the males in the audience cringe.

The violence in this film is rough, not stylized or choreographed. In one of the film's first action sequences Bond chases after a terrorist named

The David Grisman Quintet played a revolutionary set at the Calvin Theatre in Northampton on Thursday night. Grisman has a very original style of music that he has been perfecting for the past 30 years.

Grisman's style of music is called "dawg," and all of his recordings have different plays on the word. "Dawg" music is a mix of Latin, Bluegrass, jazz, gypsy, and swing. Many older and more experienced music lovers who are familiar with his incredibly unique technique gathered for this relaxing evening of musical appreciation.

Among the many balding heads was a handful of the college crowd who came to show its love for this distinctive quintet.

Grisman has played with many music legends, such as Jerry Garcia. It can only be imagined what musical milestones he has encountered during his many years of performing.

Rather than having an open dance floor in front of the stage, there were extra seats strategically placed to accommodate the bones of Grisman's fans, but there wasn't a soul up and dancing. It was a very mellow atmosphere, although at the end of every solo and song the crowd released an enormous gust of screams, whistles and applause to show their respect and love for the band.

The first set the Quintet played was a recap of the past 30 years. The Quintet played songs that most of its followers were familiar with, including an infusion of two songs, "Dawgmatism" and "Dawgma." This composition had a strong gypsy influence, and sounded like the music you would hear on the French or Italian Riviera. As the composition progressed, there were also apparent undertones of Latin and jazz. The sound was delectable, and the crowd ate it all up.

If this performance happened anywhere else, I could imagine the fans pairing off and circling the dance floor in each other's arms. It was relatively disappointing that the audience offered little movement for the Quintet.

The most impressive musician in the band was the flute player, Matt Eakle. He put so much emotion and enthusiasm into his playing that it was hard to take your eyes off of him. Eakle has been in the Quintet for 17 years, and rocks the bass flute along with the traditional flute and an occasional percussion instrument.

The Quintet's latest project is called "Acoustic!s," and they have been working on it for about 20 years now. It is a tribute to James Brown, who Grisman calls "the Godfather of soul." Grisman continued to explain that fans could download compositions like these for free online at www.acoustic!sc.com. The Web site offers one free song a day for users.

Listening to the Quintet, you can definitely hear a certain essence that verifies all of the work they have put into "dawg" and bringing their band together. It is always amazing to see a band make it without vocals.

During one song, the bassist "gets low" with his string bass and pseudo-collapses onto the stage, arousing laughter from the audience to feed his uncon.entional goofiness. Grisman and his band mates are successful at keeping the attitude and energy light and humorous throughout their performance.

The only band member who wasn't impressive was the drummer, George Marsh. But as the concert progressed, he did a better job of finding his groove. While backing up Grisman during a solo he seemed

Student environmental group raises awareness

BY TERESA REILLY

Next year you may luck-out by having a member of the Students for Environmental Awareness and Action (SEAA) knock on your door and hand you a free light bulb. This light bulb will be energy efficient and could save UMass an estimated $20,000 in energy bills.

The SEAA is a new organization on campus that is trying to do exactly as its name states, create environmental awareness through action. The group's current main focus is its light bulb drive. Energy efficient light bulbs will cost more in the beginning, but in the end they will save people money. Energy efficient light bulbs last 10 times longer and use only one-third the energy compared to average light bulbs, according to eartheasy.com. "There are no negatives that I know of," said Josh Stoffel, the founder and president of SEAA.

The SEAA has been able to get in contact with the Western Massachusetts Electric Company (WMECO) who is possibly going to be able to provide the energy efficient light bulbs for the campus. "Not only will they help us, but they also know other organizations that will help," said Stoffel.

WMECO is also looking to help another organization on campus be more environmentally aware. The Hillel building, which is the center of the Jewish community on campus, will hopefully be able to run entirely on solar energy. WMECO has agreed to pay for the majority of a solar dish to be put on top of the building. In return, the Jewish community would just have to pay for the energy they use every month.

"One of the big things that the SEAA wants to do is bring together all the different environmental groups," said Stoffel. At the fourth meeting, which was held on Thursday, an organization entitled Focus the Nation, joined the SEAA for a few minutes to share ideas.

Focus the Nation is a group that is working towards one date – Jan. 31, 2008. On that date, campuses across the country will all focus on one theme "Stabilizing the Climate in the 21st Century." The organization's ongoing focus is to make campuses aware of global warming.

During the meeting, the two groups agreed to possibly collaborate on a project that would create an environmental documentary series on the UMass campus.

"We are much broader than other environmental groups on campus," said SEAA member Frankie Sullivan. This is perhaps the reason why so many people want to get involved. In just four weeks the group's mailing list has reached 70 people, and the meetings continue to grow. "We tabled and that's it," said Stoffel, referring to an information display table at the Campus Center.

The roughly 20 SEAA members at the meeting all chimed in with various ideas ranging from creating RA kits for bulletin boards in the dorms to creating various commercials around the larger organization to focus on specific projects.

"I was very active in high school and loved doing anything since I was little," said Stoffel.

The SEAA is also currently working on creating a Web site that will be attached to the UMass environmental Web site. Pretty soon the SEAA will be everywhere you look, bulletin boards, the Collegian and the Web, trying to make the campus more environmentally aware.

UMass student Katie Madzar recently directed a UMass Theater Guild production.

This weekend concluded the UMTG's "Into the Woods," a musical of whimsical proportions. The fairy tale style production, shown at Bowker Auditorium, updated the twenty-scarcely script with humor and relatability.

New Bond pleases fans

Mollaka (Sebastien Foucan), who leaps over rooftops like some kind of ape man. Though Bond sure isn't a master of leaping himself, he manages to keep up with his prey, albeit with more destructive methods (like crashing a bulldozer through a construction site).

Bond's character has an aura to him that's full of the danger of unpredictability, which makes him even more interesting and entertaining to watch.

Craig's not simply good in this role, he's great. His acting certainly makes this character his own, fitting into the role of Bond just like the character slips into a tailored suit.

His performance is all in the eyes – bright and sharp and intense, as if he's just itching to get in on some action, like a schoolboy that can't sit still in class. He doesn't bother with the pretty-boy image, though I must say those little blue swim trunks sure aim to please.

He's not suave like Brosnan or Connery, but he can still charm a lady. He may arguably be the best Bond yet (Craig certainly showed those persons who thought he was a bad choice).

Despite a reinvention, elements of the Bond persona we've always known are still there. He's got the tux and sidearm, the classic car and a woman in his bed. He still disregards orders, matches wits with M (Craig and Dench play off of each other nicely).

He still drives his car of choice, the Aston Martin DB5, and orders his drinks shaken, not stirred. One great scene even put a twist on the line.

James Bond's character has been taken over by actor Daniel Craig in the new action film "Casino Royale."

When Bond, after a particularly bad day, goes to order his usual dry martini, the waiter asks if he'd prefer it shaken or stirred and he responds, "Do I look like I give a damn?"

The film is of course not without flaws. It's long, and the big poker scene would probably only interest persons who actually know how to play poker. Danish actor Mads Mikkelsen, serving as the villain Le Chiffre (which coincidentally means "number"), seems to only sit around flipping his poker chips in hand and scowling, or weeping blood tears (hence the "dodgy eye").

Vesper's storyline is weak and goes unexplained, but Green and Craig's chemistry is evident. The two are a good match, both in wits and look, and throughout the film melt each other's armor. It's generally one of the few times we've ever seen Bond in an actual relationship with a love interest.

And what's interesting about this Bond film is that it doesn't end (and I hope I'm not giving too much away here), with the traditional Bond-gets-girl-in-bed scene. When he walks out in that full-breasted suit and swagger in his voice, you get the feeling that a more mature Bond has arrived.

Though the ending has an unfinished air to it, it leaves you wanting more. Like the credits say, "Bond will be back," and the next installment will surely be anticipated.

'A click of the remote'

A few years ago, there was a serious void of drama and high school type problems in my life. However that all changed after the promotion aired for a show called, "The O.C." After one episode, most fans were instantly hooked. But fast forward a few seasons and see that the show is having a harder and harder time staying alive on the airwaves.

"The O.C." producers have tried extremely hard to keep fans interested after Marissa Cooper's (Mischa Barton) sudden death. This death is due to the fact that Barton felt it was time to move on to bigger and better jobs in the entertainment industry.

"The O.C." returned this year for its fourth season. This season's storyline deals with the death of Marissa and what will happen once high school is over, seeing as college is right around the corner.

This show has been losing viewers on a steady basis, and the lack of ratings could be because the story line has become extremely boring and definitely overdone. The fact that it's currently going against the primetime power house, "Grey's Anatomy," could be another factor to the decrease.

The competition alone should have warned the bigwigs at FOX to reschedule the program's time slot. Studio execs finally received that message because last week they moved "The O.C." to Wednesday. FOX also had a back-up plan to make sure the show still aired on its regularly scheduled night in case the move didn't bring in viewers.

Therefore, two new episodes aired in one week. However, the change came back to mixed reviews because it was airing at the same time as another extremely popular show, "Lost." What is "The O.C." going to do? I don't think this is a problem even the Cohen's could fix.

Since leaving this show in search of new and improved story lines, I found myself completely intrigued by a new show called "Heroes." It's a mix between "Lost" and "The Twilight Zone."

Every time you think the show becomes clear, they throw in some confusing plot lines and twists. However, all the twists continually bring all the characters together and form closer bonds between them.

"Heroes" deals with every day people who suddenly realize they have special powers. One of them can fly, another can hear people's thoughts and one can even paint the future. To add some more thrills a mysterious man named Sylar is hunting these people down. Although we are not aware of what Sylar wants with them or who he is, it has been implied that he's not a good person. Every week the show airs a 2-minute recap of what has happened thus far to keep the audience from getting lost in the story line.

NBC airs the new series every week at 9 p.m. The Web site www.nbc.com also offers the latest episode for viewing online. If you don't feel like watching an entire episode, the Web site also offers you the 2-minute recap of the latest clips to help you stay up-to-date with the show.

I truly suggest you tune in this week because the audience is finally learning the meaning behind the phrase, "Save the cheerleader, Save the world."

like a stray cat in the midst of purebreds. There just seemed to be a lack in communication between the two of them. Marsh returned to the band after being M.I.A for nearly 20 years.

As the Quintet's performance pressed on, many in the audience were stomping their feet in time with the wordless masterpieces. Grisman said that his band mates are all "a wonderful bunch of fellers…and out of [their] minds by now."

The bassist, Jim Kerwin, has been in the band for 21 years. Enrique Coria has been in the band for 13 years and adds the Latin influence into the mix, giving their music a "spicy flavor." Coria says he's also established a romantic-Latin style with his wife, called "Interno."

The mandolin Grisman played throughout most of the performance was made by an Italian friend who redesigned the American Gibson style into a more traditional Italian look.

The Quintet also played songs like "Limestones," "Zambola," "Cinderella's Fella" and "Waltz for Lucy." "Waltz for Lucy" was composed by Marsh in memory of his daughter who passed away due to complications of cystic fibrosis. This song had a hypnotic sound to it. If Grisman made a suggestion or command to the audience they would have surely obeyed.

They also played a beautiful Irish composition that Kerwin had written many years ago for his Irish grandmother. The audience agreed after someone up front exclaimed "that was a beautiful piece of music." That exclamation brought a smile to Kerwin's face, and he responded with a bow.

This was a remarkable performance by the legendary "dawg" musicians. If you weren't fortunate enough to catch this extraordinary quintet this past week, make sure you see them during their next visit to the Northampton area. Unfortunately, they are making their way off the East Coast now, but they will return again. To learn more about them visit www.dawgnet.com.

Minutemen earn No. 3 seed for postseason

Sophomore quarterback Liam Coen had a shaky start to Saturday's win over Hofstra, but ended strong with 218 yards through the air and two touchdowns. Here, the Pride's Emmanuel Anderson tackles Coen during a late-game rushing attempt – a rarity for the UMass quarterback.

"Well that's a lot of water under the bridge," Brown said of the 2006 regular season. "Nine wins in a row, and a lot of wear and tear, but the reality is you have to put it behind you. You have to move on. We have to adjust our practices so we don't get our peak performance on the practice field – we have to save our energy for Saturday afternoon."

There's also been talk in Amherst of the 1998 Minutemen. That year's squad went all the way to winning a national championship over Georgia Southern. Brown was the defensive coordinator for UMass that season, as well as the following year when the Minutemen also made the postseason.

Brown said he's started talking with his captains about those years, but also brings up what goes into running the table en route a national championship.

"It's a very difficult chore to just kind of maneuver yourself and play on a day-to-day basis," he said. "Practice and the injury factor, there's so many things that go into really the luck that gets you to that point. Again, we're just going to try to take it day-to-day and hopefully we'll see what happens."

As soon as Lafayette was announced as the Minutemen's first-round opponent, UMass video coordinator Bill Sisler walked across the room to where Brown was sitting, the two slapped hands, and Sisler hurried out of the gym.

Brown said the exchange signified that tape exchange was already in effect. Sisler took off to meet someone from Lafayette to swap game films, so Brown and his staff could prepare for this weekend's game.

"We're going to start looking at tape, hopefully we'll start doing that around six o'clock tonight," he said. "We were ready to go in a number of different directions. We were just waiting for the final word to see where we were going to go, but hopefully we'll meet halfway in White Plains, N.Y. and get our exchange done."

Two other A-10 schools join UMass in the playoffs. The selection committee awarded both New Hampshire and James Madison spots in the 16-team field. The Minutemen and Dukes battled for conference supremacy all the way up until the second-to-last weekend of the regular season.

Although the Wildcats have floundered lately, they met the unofficial eight-win criteria to make the postseason. Since they are in the same bracket, UMass and UNH could meet in the second round, as long as UNH gets by Hampton, and UMass defeats Lafayette.

drive, Hofstra threatened the 9-0 UMass lead.

Clarkson put together his best performance of the day on the subsequent drive, going six-for-nine for 76 yards. On the final play of the drive, Clarkson lofted a pass to the left side of the field, and connected with 6-foot-3 receiver Shaine Smith for a pickup of 34 yards.

After Ihedigbo nearly picked off a pass over the middle, Clarkson settled in on the following play and hit his favorite target of the day, Sullivan, who snagged the pass at the Minuteman 16-yard line. UMass defensive end David Burris stuffed the next two plays, causing the offense to move backwards three yards.

While the Minutemen held the Pride to a fourth down, a pass interference call on Tracy Belton gave Hofstra new light on the UMass 2-yard line. One play later, running back Kareem Huggins broke into the endzone, and cut the Minutemen's lead down to 9-6. Rob Zarrilli's extra point attempt went wide-left.

A touchdown pass from Coen to tight end Brad Listorti and a 19-yard field goal strike by Koepplin gave the Minutemen a comfortable 19-6 lead at the half. While the Pride outscored UMass 10-3 in the remaining two quarters, they couldn't muster enough fire power to overcome the playoff-bound Minutemen.

A 52-yard field goal by Zarrilli with 1:27 remaining in the contest, cut the lead down to one score, but his onside kick fell right into the hands of Belton, securing a 10-1 record for UMass.

Baylark rushed for 125 yards on 21 carries, while receiver Brandon London led his corps with five catches and 78 yards. London finished the regular season with 35 catches for 598 yards and seven TDs. He proved to be the favorite target for Coen, who completed 148-of-225 passes for 2,179 yards, 20 touchdowns and just four interceptions this season.

Koepplin's three field goals gave the Minutemen just enough points to edge the Pride. He finished the regular season tied for first in scoring with 78 points, and was good on 13-of-18 field goal attempts.

The victory on Saturday solidified a No. 3 seed in the playoff bracket, and capped the UMass' first undefeated conference season since 1978.

"We know we need to play better in the playoffs, but we also need to enjoy what we've accomplished and what we've just grinded through for 11 weeks," said UMass coach Don Brown.

Minutewomen take tournament

Leaving New Jersey with the Aeropostale Seton Hall Basketball Classic title, vaulted the Massachusetts women's basketball team into unfamiliar territory.

The pair of wins over Navy and Seton Hall improved the Minutewomen to 4-0 for the first time since the 1988-89 season. It took the Maroon and White 17 games and until Jan. 19 of last year to reach the four-win mark with a win over Richmond.

UMass ran off 12 consecutive points on Saturday afternoon to edge Seton Hall, 70-61, and claim the tournament championship. The Minutewomen escaped with a victory over the Pirates due in large part to their 13-point edge at the foul line. UMass held the Pirates to one-for-18 shooting from behind the arc.

UMass	62

Junior co-captain Kate Mills led the offensive attack, scoring a game-high 22 points. Fellow junior Pam Rosania was the only other player in double figures, scoring 14. Seton Hall senior forward Monique Blake exploded for 19 points and 11 rebounds.

Trailing late, junior co-captain Alysha Latham hit one of her two big three-point shots to tie the game, 61-61, with less than four minutes to play. Seton Hall failed to register a point the remainder of the game.

Mills received the tournament MVP award after the game against the Pirates. She led the team in scoring in each game, totaling 38 points on 14-for-20 shooting. She added 13 rebounds and two blocks.

"It's an honor and I feel very privileged to receive the award," Mills said. "But just winning the tournament and being 4-0 is so much greater than an MVP award. It's just a tribute to my teammates who were able to get me the ball in places where I could score easily, so I couldn't have done it without them."

UMass coach Marnie Dacko was pleased with the performance of her team, and in particular of Mills.

"It was a battle. The kids played a very good defensive game and they always believed they were still in it," she said. "Establishing our control on the glass was really the key to the game. We were able to contain everyone other than Blake and we capitalized on our opportunity at the end.

"Kate has been our go-to player and she carried this team on her back during the tournament," she added. "She's a fighter and a winner who continually carries this team on her shoulders."

On Friday, the Minutewomen opened the tournament with a 62-41 triumph over Navy in the first ever meeting between the two schools. The Maroon and White used superior defense and the edge on the free-throw line to beat the Midshipmen women.

I-Mass jumped out to a quick start, taking a 44-16 edge into halftime. Navy shot just 29.8 percent for the game, and an abysmal one-for-14 from the perimeter. The Minutewomen held their two opponents to just two-for-32 shooting from the outside.

"I'm pleased with the way we got started," Dacko said. "Our defense helped create our offense and we shot extremely well from the floor. We were very unselfish with the ball and any time you go to the locker room up 28 points you feel pretty good about your performance."

Mills once again led the way offensively scoring 16 points. Nine different players scored for the Minutewomen, but no one else reached double figures.

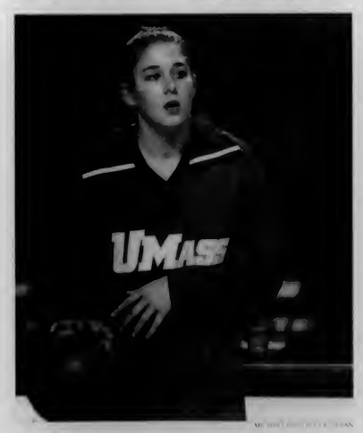
Dacko was excited for her team to leave the tournament with an undefeated record and with momentum on its side.

"It's real important and a big boost of confidence," she said. "It's a way to measure where we are at an early stage. The kids that have returned this year have worked extremely hard and the chemistry and the dynamics of the team have really improved. The hard work is paying off for the team.

"I'm very pleased with our defense, but we still have to work out some kinks and improve our communication," she added. "I'm just very happy for my team. They have been working hard and are making believers in themselves. They haven't experienced winning in a while now."

The confidence that the winning streak gives Dacko, trickles down to her players.

"It gives us a big confidence boost being able to come out 4-0," Mills said. "We got contributions from everybody and that's big for us as a team and for each individual player. I think in the past we haven't been able to rely on our defense during scoring droughts but now we have shown the ability that it can."



Sophomore Stelanie Gerardot and the Minutewomen walked away as champions of this weekend's Seton Hall Basketball Classic.

discouraging for your defense."

"Those are very good guards," Ford added. "I love the pace that those guards play with. They understand that they have great players around them, and they don't try to force things. Those guards are good."

Fields and Ramon played with Lowe and Mayben in New York where they all grew up. They knew each other from AAU ball, and on the court Saturday was the first time they had seen each other since high school.

"It was fun. It was a nice experience," Lowe said. "I haven't played with them or against them since high school. We competed hard. We all have love for each other, but we all wanted to win. It was just fun being on the same court with them because I hadn't seen them in a while."

"They were going at each other tonight, and it was great competition," Ford said. "It was kind of neat having all of those New York guards going against each other."

Fields and Ramon got the better of the Minutemen's New York tandem, but Lowe and company insist that it wasn't the lack of defense but the excellence of Pitt's offense that won the game.

"We practiced against all of these screens," Lowe said. "Today, we got through the screens. They just hit shots. They just made shots, and that was the key to the game. They just made more shots than we did."

"We handled [Mayben and Lowe] well," Fields said. "We clicked out there, and things went well for us."

Stephane Lasme, last season's leading shot-blocker on the eastern seaboard, was amazed by the Panthers' shooting.

"I knew they were great players, but I didn't expect them to make that many shots," he said. "It was incredible. They didn't miss anything."

UMass closes out season with 11th and 12th-place finishes

The Massachusetts cross country teams ended their seasons in New York on Saturday at the ICAA/ECAC Championships. The Minutemen placed 11th with a score of 266, and the Minutewomen finished 12th with 281 points.

Most of the runners now start preparing for indoor track season. The season begins at Boston University in the Quad Meet on Jan. 17.

Once again, the sophomore Jesse Regnier led the Minutemen. He finished 22nd overall with a time of 25:50.7.

Freshman Andrew McCann placed behind Regnier at 32nd (26:04.1). For McCann, it's his highest finish of the season and the fifth time he placed in the team's top five.

Sophomore Josh Boone finished 76th (26:35.7). Nils Fischer checked in at 92nd (26:55.1), and junior Mark Kenwood came in 96th (26:57.9). All crossed the finish line within the top 100. Fischer had a strong season for the Minutemen, he consistently placed either first or second for the team in every race.

The Minutemen graduate two seniors from the cross country team, Walter Hiner and Aaron Strellner.

The future is bright for the Minutemen, and they are hopeful that they can make a bid for the NCAA Championships and win an Atlantic 10 Championship next year.

This season, the Minutemen were extremely young with seven freshmen and seven sophomores on the team. McCann and fellow freshman Nicolai Naranjo have stood out from the pack.

Naranjo started quick. In his first race at the Dartmouth Invitational, he placed first for the team and the next week placed fifth overall against Boston College and Maine. Naranjo earned Rookie of the Week honors for his performance at the New England Championships. He did not race for the rest of the season after the New Englands. He went down with an injury during the race.

Junior Ryan Durkin and Fischer enter next season as seniors. UMass coach Ken O'Brien said throughout the season that these two showed great leadership qualities. Durkin placed consistently in the top five to help add depth after Fischer and Regnier.

Regnier and Fischer anchored the UMass squad. Fischer earned A-10 All-Conference honors after finishing ninth overall at the A-10 Championships. Regnier secured the top spot for the team in four of the six races he competed in.

The Minutewomen were again led by junior Christina DeRosa with an 18th place finish and a time of 18:36.7.

Sophomore Ellis Kierans pushed herself in the past two weeks and for the second straight week, she placed second on the team. The sophomore walk-on crossed the line 52nd (19:20.1). Next was her sister, senior Carsle Kierans. She came in 67th (19:40.7).

Carsle and senior Erin O'Donnell ran their last race for the cross country team and will be missed by the team next season.

Carsle ran in every race this season, consistently placing in the top five. Carsle and her younger sister Ellis helped build a solid pack behind DeRosa.

"Carsle is just a steady worker and now that her sister is here [Ellis] really pushes her both at practices and at meets," Coach Julie Lafreniere said. "It's a nice combination to have the two of them here."

O'Donnell had a solid junior season, she placed within the top five for every race. In her senior season, she was slowed by a stress fracture in August and has had trouble regaining her form.

"She's always been a very hard worker," Lafreniere said.

If the Minutewomen can stay healthy they have a good chance to be one of the better teams in the Atlantic 10.

UMASS PARKING ANNOUNCES
Opening of New Visitor's Parking at Athletic Complex
UMASS Parking Services announces the opening of new visitor's parking adjacent to the Athletic Complex on Stadium Drive. This 275 space lot will provide additional parking for visitors to the campus, as well as parking for athletic events at Rudd Soccer Field, the new field & track and the softball complex. The lot will be serviced by two paystations at a rate of 60¢ hour. The paystations operate on pay-by-space and do not require patrons to return to their vehicles to display a receipt – a common complaint with older paystations. The new paystations offer multiple payment options -- bills, coins, or credit cards.
This lot is serviced by UMASS Transit's Campus Shuttle, Routes 34 & 35, from 7:00 a.m. to 2:30 a.m. five days a week.

Mass Attack drubs UConn

By Jeremy Rice
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team's second line — consisting of Cory Quirk, Chris Capraro and Chris Davis — put on a scoring exhibition in front of 4,123 fans at the Mullins Center during Saturday's matinee against Connecticut.

UMass (6-1-1, 4-1 Hockey East) scorched Atlantic Hockey's UConn (3-5) to the tune of an 8-1 beating. The Mass Attack returns to the ice Tuesday night against conference foe Vermont.

UConn	1

The Huskies out shot the Minutemen 33-29, but UMass dominated the game in every other category, including — and most importantly — the score.

Quirk led UMass' second line, which scored six goals and nine assists for 15 total points in the game. The sophomore was the star of the game, scoring three goals and adding a pair of assists, while Davis earned one goal and four assists and Capraro notched his second multiple-point game in four games played, tallying two goals and three assists. The line had a plus-five rating as a group.

"The pucks just went in for me," Quirk said. "I was just getting good shots on net, and moving my feet, and playing with [Davis and Capraro], it helps a lot."

UMass scored three goals in the first four minutes and four seconds of the game and netted a fourth in the first period taking control of the game early and never letting go.

"That line was absolutely terrific tonight," said UMass coach Don Cahoon. "[Connecticut] didn't have the answer for that line, and that was a big difference in the game."

Under a minute in, Quirk began the scoring frenzy. Davis sent the puck up the ice to Capraro. The center took the puck from Capraro at the blue line and skated from left to right in front of UConn goaltender Jon Anderson and easily put the puck behind him.

"The first goal came off a lot of pressure by [UConn] on their forechecking," Cahoon said. "It was a transition play. Then the next thing you know, Quirk's making a real neat move getting to the net, and we're banging one home."

Less than two minutes later, the Mass Attack struck again, continuing its power-play success this season. With the man advantage, Capraro fed senior assistant captain Mark Matheson at the point. Matheson sent the one-timer past Anderson for the 2-0 lead.

Matheson moved back to defenseman for the game, replacing freshman Topher Bevis, who injured his shoulder last week against Northeastern.

Then, at 4:04 into the period, Capraro nabbed his third point in just over four minutes with his third goal on the year. With Quirk returning the favor to his line mate with the assist, Capraro carried the puck across the ice left to right and backhanded the puck under the crossbar.

Capraro added a fourth UMass goal at the halfway point in the frame. With 10:02 remaining, Capraro found himself with the puck at the right post, after Mike Kostka's attempt to stuff it past Anderson was kicked out to him. Capraro had time to settle the puck and deke twice before finally deciding to tuck it behind Anderson.

"At first, his pad was there," said Capraro. "Then for some reason, it wasn't there anymore. I didn't have a shot, and then it wasn't there so I [took the shot]."

Late in the frame, UConn had a chance to begin mounting a comeback, but couldn't muster much in the way of offense. After Quirk and Kostka were sent to the penalty box about a minute apart, the Minutemen killed off a 55-second two-man advantage with junior Zech Klann blocking a number of shots headed in goaltender Jon Quick's direction.

The scoring cooled off in the second period, as the Minutemen put just six shots on net. The Huskies grabbed their only goal of the game exactly three minutes in. All three men on UConn's top line chipped in for the goal.

Right-winger Alex Kirschner scored through a cluster of players in the crease. Left-winger Jarret Scarpaci and center Chris Myhro assisted on the play, as Myhro fell into Quick, knocking them both into the net as the puck crossed the line.

The scoreboard didn't change for another 19-plus minutes, until UMass' second-line heated up again. Anderson stopped Quirk's shot, but left the puck trickling across the crease. Davis stuffed it home near the right post.

Sophomore Cory Quirk led the Mass Attack's offensive outburst on Saturday afternoon. The center tallied his first career hat trick against UConn.

Five minutes later, Quirk banged home the sixth UMass goal of the game with his back turned to the net. Fighting for the puck, Quirk backhanded it and beat Anderson for his second score.

"I knew the net was somewhere in the vicinity, so I just gave it a whack, and it decided to go in," said Quirk.

Another three minutes passed before the score became 7-1. Quirk earned his first career hat trick on a nearly identical goal to his first in the first period. After receiving a pass up the ice from Kostka, Quirk skated from left to right in front of Anderson. He continued pounding the net until he found an open shot behind Anderson on the blocker side.

Quick received a standing ovation as he left the ice, spelled by rookie Dan Meyers. Quick left a 7-1 game having made 27 saves. Meyers made five more and preserved the lead in just under 10 minutes of play.

The Minutemen never let up in the game, as P.J. Fenton iced the contest with 1:32 remaining in the game. Speeding through neutral ice, Fenton beat two defenders, splitting the defense and beating Anderson glove side for the eighth and final score.

Despite allowing eight goals in the game, Huskies coach Bruce Marshall never pulled Anderson from the game, leaving him in the game for the full 60 minutes of play.

"When I look at the goals they had in the first period, there were some real nice goals," Marshall said. "The first goal was a real nice move by [Quirk]. I think he got a little hung out to dry. It was 4-1 going into the third period, and I didn't think the goals were bad where I needed to wake the team up there."

Second line shines in offensive outburst

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Every puck went the way of the Massachusetts hockey team's second line on Saturday night. The trio of Chris Capraro, Chris Davis and Cory Quirk led the charge in dismantling UConn, 8-1.

UMass' second line finished the non-conference drubbing with a plus-five rating. Quirk recorded his first career hat trick while Davis tallied four assists and Capraro notched a career high four points.

"I think the puck was bouncing our way," Quirk said. "Everything we touched decided to go in. We worked hard all week, talking and communicating like coach says. It just paid off against UConn tonight."

In addition to his three scores, Quirk also assisted on two of his line mates' goals. Davis chipped in a goal while Capraro's points came on two goals and a pair of helpers.

Both the players and UMass coach Don Cahoon agree that the line's success stems from the complimentary skill sets each player possesses. Davis has lightning speed, Capraro is a playmaker and this season Quirk has displayed a scoring touch.

But apparently their relationship doesn't factor into the success they've enjoyed this season.

"No I don't like them," Capraro joked after Saturday's game. "It's good because we have Chris who skates really well and Cory plays really versatile in the defense and offensive zones and I can make some plays to these guys. So it works out well, everybody can play off each other."

"We all do a lot of little things very well," Davis said. "I think we compliment each other very well as a line."

Cahoon expressed the importance of his second line in the team's success, and gave an assessment of their skills.

"They're very complimentary of each other," Cahoon said, making it sound as if the press conference room had an echo. "You look at Capraro's puck skills and vision, and you look at Quirk's quickness and Davis' speed, they just seem to be a nice blend."

Success is nothing new to this group. Entering the game, Quirk led the team in points while Davis tied for the lead in goals, and Capraro recorded three points in just three games.

As freshmen a year ago, the Minutemen named Quirk and Davis Co-Rookies of the Year. And with the graduation of seniors Stephen Werner and Marvin Degon, many considered Capraro to set up his offensive production, something he's done adequately up to this point.

Cahoon constructed the line before the Nov. 3 game against Providence. That game against the Friars may have given the coach an indication of what the line could do.

It recorded seven points in the 4-1 win. In that game, Capraro tallied two goals and an assist while Quirk notched a goal and an assist and Davis had one helper.

"Any game we just want to play our game and work hard. Hopefully good things continue to happen for us," Capraro said. "Every team that's coming in, we just prepare the same way. We focus on what we need to do. It's just like another game for us, just like we're playing one of the best teams."

With the outburst of the second line, the Minutemen accomplished something Saturday afternoon that took them an entire month to do last season.

"I was advised at the end of the game by [goaltender coach] Jim Stewart that it took us a month last year to score eight goals," Cahoon said. "That was fun for us to put some goals on the board and get a little bit of separation early in the game."

If Davis, Quirk and Capraro continue their offensive explosion, it surely won't be another month before the Minutemen post another eight goals.

UMass lives up to preseason billings

By Joe Milosi

The preseason predictions for the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams appear to be accurate. The Minutemen, selected as the class of the Atlantic 10, continued to excel in their victory this weekend, while a strong performance from the Minutewomen was good enough for a third-place finish.

The meet began on Friday, and the Minutewomen got right to work. A group anchored by senior Liz Lovejoy finished second in the 200-yard freestyle. Their time of 1:37.58 fell short of the 1:35.61 place set by a group from Boston College.

The rest of day one wasn't particularly kind to the Minutewomen. They did not record a win, and their highest finish was fourth in the 50-yard freestyle by freshman Katherine Chalifis – she recorded a time of 24.38, scoring 15 points for UMass.

Things went differently for the Minutemen on Friday. They scored 566 points while winning four of the day's five events.

The relay teams were the story. The Minutemen proved victorious in both the 200-yard freestyle and 400-yard medley relays.

The 200-yard freestyle team consisted of freshman Juan Moliere, sophomore Nate Bromage, junior A.J. Vozella and freshman Trevor Ziegler. The group finished the race in 1:24.75, eight-tenths of a second ahead of IR.

Ziegler competed in three events on the day. He was part of both first-place relay teams and took second in the 200-yard individual medley. The freshman has impressed UMass coach Russ Yarworth greatly this year. Yarworth is never hesitant to put the freshman in any race.

"Trevor's been great, and he had a great meet," Yarworth said. "He got his lifetime best in the 100-yard [butterfly], the 100-yard [backstroke] and the 200-yard backstroke."

The 400-yard medley relay team won as well in their second showing of the season. They've won both times that they have competed. On Friday, the squad of senior Evan Swisher, senior Jake Hogue, Bromage and Ziegler scored 40 points for the Minutemen finishing the race in 3:26.98.

"The relays always dictate how well your team is going to do," Yarworth said. "Evan Swisher leading off the race is really good for us."

Day one ended with the Minutemen in first place with 416 points and the Minutewomen in fourth.

The Minutewomen were better on day two, moving up from fourth place to third.

Lovejoy came in third in the 100-yard butterfly event, her time of 57.02 set a new school record along with scoring 16 points for the Minutewomen's team score — Lovejoy shaved the previous school record of 57.36 with Michele Leary who swam at UMass in the early '90s.

The Minutewomen didn't win any events on the second day, but their performances added points to their team score, and their times bode well for the rest of the season.

"The women really stepped up and did some outstanding things," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "They really set a mark for themselves for the rest of the season."

After going four-four-five on day one, the Minutemen responded by winning six of the seven events on day two – their only loss was a bit of a shocker as Bromage fell in the 100-yard butterfly.

Freshman Andrew Willbrant won the 100-yard backstroke for the second consecutive weekend. His time of 52.63 bested teammate Ziegler. Junior Zack Priest took third place in the event. The Minutemen scored a total of 57 points in this event.

As the second day came to a close, the Minutemen won another relay. The 800-yard freestyle relay team consisting of senior Greg Chartier, Swisher, junior A.J. Vozella and Bromage won the event with a time of 6:57.11.

Vozella won the 200-yard freestyle earlier in day two as well.

More of the same was the theme of the third day. The Minutewomen swam well, however they did not do much in the way of winning. Sophomore Taryn Prout finished 10th in the women's mile with a time of 17:58.76. Although her finish wasn't particularly stellar, Newcomb was very happy with her performance.

"[Prout] led our distance group," Newcomb said. "Her time in the 1,650 was one of the best times she's posted at UMass."

Prout's twin brother, sophomore Michael Prout, finished eighth in the 1,650-yard freestyle. His time of 17:10 scored 11 points for the Minutemen.

Winning the event for UMass was freshman Justin Brooks with a time of 16:05.12.

"I hate to pick one person out over another," Yarworth said. "But Justin was great this weekend."

Ziegler and Brooks both had their best meets. However, the individual performance that garnered the most praise was that of Swisher. Aside from his performances in the relays, when Swisher touched the final wall in the 200-yard backstroke two records fell in the process.

His time of 1:48.63 broke the school record of 1:49.10 held by Justin Houck and the Fanueil Pool record of 1:49.22. Swisher flirted with the record many times before.

"I told him 'Evan, a huge monkey just went running out of the building' because this monkey's been on his back for a couple of years trying to break this record," Yarworth said.

The UMass men's swimming team won the Boston University Invitational this weekend. The Minutewomen placed third.

Yarworth adds four recruits for 2007

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

A coach's work is never done. Even in the midst of a busy season, he or she must hit the recruiting trail in order to find student-athletes to fill the ranks of the team in order to replace graduating seniors. But the effort of University of Massachusetts men's swimming coach Russ Yarworth this year is already starting to pay off.

On Friday, Yarworth announced that four swimmers signed National Letters of Intent to join the Minutemen next fall.

Max Butler, Julian McKean, Drew Talarick and Patrick Kuehne are part of the early signing period for collegiate swimmers and divers.

"It's a great class that can hopefully help continue this tradition," Yarworth said. "We can't replace our seniors, but these guys will go a long way toward reloading the squad for next year. I'm really excited about them."

Butler, from Duxbury, Mass., won the state championships in the 100-yard backstroke in both 2004 and 2005. He finished ninth in the 50- and 100-yard backstroke at the Junior National Championships against competition from around the country. The accomplished swimmer also holds six records at Duxbury High School and swims for the Bernal's Gators Swim Club.

McKean is a sprinter who enjoys success in freestyle and individual medley events. McKean, hailing from Suffern, N.Y., is a multiple Junior Olympic Champion. He also brings a good pedigree to the team, as both his parents swam competitively at Villanova.

Talarick, of Skillman, N.J., is enjoying a successful high school swimming career at Montgomery High. He finished ninth at the New Jersey State Championships in the 200-yard freestyle in both 2005 and 2006. Talarick also competes for the Somerset Valley YMCA Swordfish and earned a 12th-place finish in the 200-yard freestyle at the YMCA Short Course National Meet in 2006.

A Hillsborough, N.J. native, Kuehne brings experience in individual medley events. The high school senior took first place in the 100-yard breaststroke and the 200-yard IM at the New Jersey YMCA State Championships this year. He also owns several records at Hillsborough High School and swims for the Jersey Gators Club Team.

Kuehne is the prototypical swimmer that Yarworth recruits for his team.

"I tend to build the program around IM, because those kids are the most versatile," Yarworth said before the beginning of the season.

By the very nature of their events, individual medley swimmers must be proficient in all four strokes. Therefore, they participate and typically do well in other events in addition to the IM.

Yarworth also has enjoyed recruiting success in New Jersey in the past few years. Three current UMass swimmers call the Garden State home, including seniors Mike Cordes, Gordon Leonard and freshman Brendan Jones.

But by no means is Yarworth finished filling out his recruiting class. He has the task of replacing six seniors for next fall. Look for the coach to add at least two more swimmers before the recruiting period ends. The list of incoming freshmen will be finalized by the spring and is typically announced during the month of May.

UMass men's swimming coach Russ Yarworth says he's building the Minutemen around the versatility of the individual medley event.

UMass learns its postseason fate

The Massachusetts football team gathers in the weight room to find out its seed in this year's postseason. The Minutemen gave a resounding cheer when their No. 3 seed was announced.

UM earns No. 3 seed, matchup with Lafayette

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts football team knew it earned a spot in the playoffs. The Minutemen just weren't sure who they'd welcome to McGuirk Alumni Stadium this Saturday.

After taking care of Hofstra, 22-16, on Saturday, UMass gathered in the varsity weight room to watch the ESPNews Division I College Football Championship selection show yesterday.

The Minutemen made a giant U-shape on the parquet floor, with many sitting on a set of bleachers and others using weight benches as makeshift seats.

Throughout the show, UMass coach Don Brown sat in the front row of the bleachers staring up at the enormous screen, waiting for his team's name to be called. Then it happened.

A resounding cheer erupted in the room as the Minutemen were tabbed with the No. 3 seed in the tournament, paired up with Patriot League champion Lafayette.

Lafayette handily defeated Lehigh, 49-27, on Saturday to take the conference crown and the playoff bid.

"They're playing their best football," Brown said of his team's first-round opponent. "Obviously coming off a very emotional win over Lehigh, which was [either] you're in or you're out. That was very difficult task for them.

"One thing for us that we're excited about is that we're home. We get a chance to compete and play against them in our own backyard. I know our guys will be ready to play."

The last time the Minutemen played beyond Thanksgiving was in 2003. That year they traveled up to Colgate. Played during a blizzard, the Minutemen came up short in that one, 19-7.

Brown brushed off any comparisons between 2003 and this season.

"I didn't mention it here today, and I won't mention it [this week]," Brown said. "That was a ghost we exorcised over the last few years. I really don't think there's a need to bring that game up. What we really want to do is win one, win a playoff game. That's the first goal, win a playoff game. Then we'll take it from there."

What Brown did tell his players was what's past, is past. Continuing his 2006 mantra, the coach stressed the fact that UMass will only doom themselves by dwelling on its accomplishments of this season.

In a talk at the conclusion of the show, Brown told his players their record stands at 10-1 until Tuesday when they begin preparing for Lafayette. After that it's a clean slate, 0-0.

Maroon and White win ugly game over Hofstra

BY ERIC ATHAS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It wasn't the cleanest, prettiest or most decisive victory for the Massachusetts football team, but the No. 3 Minutemen (10-1, 8-0 Atlantic 10) closed out their regular season with a win on Saturday.

UMass	22
Hofstra	16

Two first-half touchdowns thrown by quarterback Liam Coen gave the Minutemen a 22-16 edge over Hofstra (2-9, 1-7 A-10) in the final regular season contest. With a No. 3 seed in the NCAA Division I Championship, UMass hosts Patriot League winner Lafayette (6-5) on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium.

"That's the best football team, including Marshall, we've played this year," Hofstra coach Dave Cohen said following the game. "Absolutely, positively. They don't have a weakness."

The start of Saturday's contest was quiet for both sides, with UMass holding a 3-0 lead over the Pride at the conclusion of the first quarter. It was the final play of the first quarter, however, that gave the Minutemen an advantage that paid off in the long run.

After running back Steve Baylark made an uncharacteristic fumble in the red zone, it took just four plays for the UMass defense to get the ball right back. Hofstra had the ball on its own 14-yard line as quarterback Anton Clarkson dropped back and dumped a pass off to Pride receiver Charles Sullivan.

UMass linebacker Jason Hatchell stripped the ball away from Sullivan and then came up with it, handing the Minuteman offense another chance to put some more points on the board.

"We play defense, that's what we're here to do," safety and captain James Ihedigbo said. "A turnover happens, and we'll go out there and try to turn it around."

Coen and company didn't waste any time at the start of the second quarter. With another shot on the 22-yard line, Coen took the snap and quickly fired a bullet to receiver J.J. Moore to set up a screen near the left sideline. Moore grabbed the ball and went untouched as he followed blockers all the way for the touchdown.

The ability for the defense to get the ball back, Coen said, shows the type of character his team has.

"After something like that happens, you've just got to bounce back," Coen said. "I think it's a lot to say about the character of our team. We make a mistake, they have our backs, they give up some points, we have their backs."

Kicker Chris Koepplin's extra-point try bounced off the right upright, however, and on its next

PITTSBURGH, Pa. — The Massachusetts men's basketball team failed to take advantage of its tough non-conference schedule by losing to No. 4 Pittsburgh, 85-68 on Saturday night. But it came out of the three-game weekend with a 2-1 record, defeating Oakland on Friday, 65-56, and Northeastern yesterday, 79-56.

The Minutemen (3-1) were one had half from returning to Amherst with an unbeaten record, and an upset under their belts. Instead, Pittsburgh (5-0) dominated UMass in the second half of Saturday's loss. UMass took it out on Northeastern (0-4) the very next day.

"We're learning stuff about ourselves every day," UMass coach Travis Ford said after yesterday's win. "I told our guys last night that this is a test to see who you are inside because you're coming off a tough loss [to Pittsburgh]. It's a true test to get right back on the court and see what you're made of.

"I knew we'd be a little bit sluggish [against Northeastern]," he added. "But I was glad to see them wake themselves up, and play from being down eight and fighting back and winning the game pretty easy."

UMass	65
Oakland	56
Pitt	85
UMass	68
UMass	79
NU	56

UMass went on a 26-9 run in the first eight minutes of the second half, taking control of a game that it trailed throughout a majority of the first half. Seniors Rashaun Freeman and James Life, and junior Gary Forbes combined for 30 of the Minutemen's 43 second half points to give UMass the win.

"We hit that spurt at the end of the first half which was the difference in the game," Ford said. "Going into halftime [with a lead] was big for our mental state of mind because we played so poorly early in the game. We were sluggish early, and I was hoping Northeastern would be too. But they were not. They had a whole lot more energy than we did."

UMass came into yesterday's game after a tough loss the night before against Pittsburgh. The Minutemen played the Panthers close in the first half, and held the lead on three different occasions.

Pittsburgh took advantage of UMass' careless turnovers and missed opportunities late in the first half, and gathered a comfortable 46-37 lead at halftime.

The Minutemen did not play as bad as the score shows, but the Panthers lights-out shooting throughout the game was too much for the Maroon and White.

"I thought we played fairly well," Ford said after Saturday's 85-68 loss to Pittsburgh. "We came out and really competed the first 10 minutes of the game. We gave them everything we had. We were making some shots, and I thought we were playing good defense. [Pittsburgh] just made some incredible shots, and every time they would miss, they'd just get the rebound and put it back in.

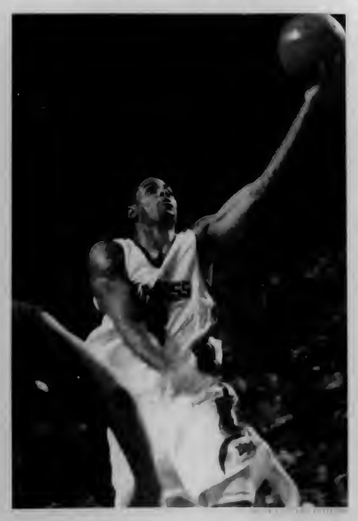
"We're a team that takes pride in rebounding," he added. "And when we get out-rebounded by 10, we're not going to win many games."

UMass had four players finish in double figures in scoring. Stephane Lasme, Life, Freeman and Forbes each had solid games, but the Panthers' constant production, even with its best player – center Aaron Gray – out for most of the game because of foul trouble and injury, showed why Pittsburgh was the No. 4 team in the nation.

"Great teams are going to finish you out," Ford said. "I think Pittsburgh is without question one of the top teams in the country that I've seen. And it's the best team we've played in a long time."

UMass started the weekend off on the right foot by defeating Oakland, 65-56. The Minutemen finished the game shooting 50 percent from the field, and held the Grizzlies (3-2) from finishing off a second-half comeback.

The Minutemen return to action on Wednesday at 7 p.m. against St. Francis (N.Y.) at the Mullins Center.



The Minutemen came away from this weekend's Colonial Classic with a 2-1 showing. Gary Forbes posted 40 points in the three games.

Pitt guards too much for Mayben, Lowe

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

PITTSBURGH, Pa. — For a while there, it looked like a possibility.

The Massachusetts men's basketball team took on the No. 4 Pittsburgh Panthers on Saturday night. It was one of several out-of-conference opponents that UMass coach Travis Ford was worried about.

Did he throw his team in the deep end too soon?

Apparently not. UMass scratched and clawed its way through the first 17 minutes of Saturday's game, and was down just one point — 36-35 — after Gary Forbes buried a three-pointer with 3:49 left in the first half.

Panthers forward Aaron Gray was the main focus on the UMass game plan. Gray was an All-American and Big East Player of the Year candidate last season. He averaged 13.9 points and 10.5 rebounds per game a year ago. He's a bruising 7-foot-2 with a nice shooting touch.

So the Minutemen's focus needed to be on Gray, or there was going to be a dunk parade at UMass' expense. The Minutemen's offensive game plan focused on getting Gray in foul trouble.

Everything in preparation for Saturday's game was geared towards stopping Gray.

But the big man wasn't the Minutemen's biggest problem. Levance Fields, Ronald Ramon, Tyrell Biggs and the rest of the Pittsburgh backcourt torched the Minutemen for 43 points.

"Those guards are very good," Ford said. "They probably don't get the credit that Gray gets. When Gray went out of the game, their guards just took over. And Biggs came in and made some big shots as well."

They ran Chris Lowe and Tiki Mayben (zero points on zero shots) all over the place in the half court and got their hands free for jump shots. When Mayben and Lowe did stay with them for 30 seconds of the shot clock, they buried contested shots as the buzzer sounded.

"I thought we played pretty well," Ford said. "I just think that Pittsburgh shot unbelievable. I can't complain about the defense we were playing. Some of the shots that they were making were just incredible. When teams are doing that it is very mtvU works with 750 colleges throughout the United States, and can be seen 24 hours a day.

Mental health stigma prevents college students from seeking professional help

BY JENNA SPATARO
COLLEGIAN STAFF

On the surface, many students appear to have it all together. What many people don't realize is that suicide is the No. 2 killer of college students across the country. On Nov. 8, mtvU launched a campaign called "Half of Us" to help decrease the student suicide rate.

mtvU is the largest television network broadcasted only for college students, according to a press release. It works with 750 colleges across the country and can be seen every hour of every day in dining areas, gyms, lounges and dorm rooms throughout the United States. It focuses on music, new artists, news, student life, events and pro-social initiatives. mtvU holds more than 300 events each year, including concerts and giveaways.

mtvU is known for entertaining its students, but it has have teamed up with the Jed Foundation to help launch the "Half of Us" campaign.

The Jed Foundation was founded by Donna and Phil Satow, whose son was a University of Arizona student who committed suicide. He had shown no warning signs when he took his own life. The Jed Foundation works to raise awareness about suicide prevention on college campuses.

"We are deeply heartened that mtvU has undertaken this campaign, and we look forward to working with them to reduce suicide rate among college and university students nationwide," said the Satows.

mtvU recently conducted research on how stress and depression are affecting college students nationwide. mtvU conducted a study called "mtvU College Mental Health Study. Stress, Depression, Stigma & Students," which found that 77 percent of those surveyed wouldn't want their friends to know if they were seeking help for emotional issues. It shows that mental health is highly stigmatized on college campuses, which causes a problem in students seeking help.

One in five college seniors say they have considered suicide, which is nearly triple the number of college freshman. The study also found that females find college more stressful than males. Sixty-three percent of female respondents agree they "feel the pressure to handle more and more stress" as opposed to 44 percent of males.

"Half of Us" will be working to reach college students from several different angles. The campaign will launch an on-air series of public service announcements, which will introduce other students who are also dealing with emotional issues. Its goal is for students to be able to notice when they have emotional problems and learn how to deal with the stress. mtvU will also begin incorporating mental health messages into its programming on a regular basis.

The center for the campaign will be located on the Web site halfofus.com. The Web site will connect students to resources beneficial to their mental health status so they realize they are not alone.

The site's components include a self-evaluator screening tool, which gives feedback on available resources based on the user's school. There will also be an action center that will show students how to get involved with spreading mental health awareness. mtvU will also be organizing campus events to help spread the cause.

Speaker promotes 'reproductive justice'

Gloria Feldt, former president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America, spoke to University of Massachusetts students, Thursday.

BY MEGHAN MURPH
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Former president of the Planned Parenthood Federation of America Gloria Feldt spoke at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center Thursday afternoon, asking students to be crusaders for the cause of what she calls "reproductive justice."

Feldt claimed that birth control saved her life when she was a 20-year-old mother of three by enabling her to care for her children and plan her own life.

During her speech, she asked audience members to think of people who would be "the new public health crusaders" for reproductive rights.

People in the audience suggested women such as Hillary Clinton and Shelby Knox, a University of Texas student who made a documentary about health education, but Feldt had an additional answer in mind.

"When I ask the question 'Who are going to be the next public health crusaders?' what I want to hear you all say is, 'I am,'" she said. "Every single one of you can be the next public health crusader for sexual and reproductive justice or — wherever your passion is and wherever you want to make a difference."

Feldt argued that sexual and reproductive health was a "public health imperative," saying that "every single day in the world — every minute, a woman dies from pregnancy-related causes, most of which are preventable — if we really had the political will to [prevent them]."

She described what she believes are the three parts to sexual and reproductive justice: the right to bodily integrity, the right to make childbearing decisions and the right to have access to good reproductive healthcare and accurate medical information.

"The simplest, most fundamental thing is to be able to own and control your own body, because if you can't do that, what else do you have?" asked Feldt.

She also stressed the importance of economic power for women so they can make their own childbearing decisions.

"A part of not being coerced, in my view, at least, is to have sufficient economic justice in order that a woman doesn't have a feeling of coercion about whether she can carry a pregnancy to term or not," she said. "It's a fundamental human right.

"Even the abortion debate is not really about abortion," she argued. "When you peel back the layers, it's really about sex, women and power."

Feldt said that by fighting for reproductive rights, activists are "creating a culture of real life that values a woman's life, that values the life of a family [and] that values the health and well-being and lives of the children that we bring into this world."

She outlined the legislative agenda for sexual reproductive justice, including the Prevention First Act, which mandates that insurance plans that provide prescription drug coverage cover contraception as well, increased public education and emergency contraception access, requires that sexual education programs funded by the government have to be medically accurate and provides family planning services for low-income women.

Campus renovations near completion

The new Central Heating Plant at the University of Massachusetts will have the same steam capacity as the old plant, but will also generate electricity and meet more stringent emissions requirements.

BY MICHAEL HERMAN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Students used to detours, delays, dust and noise of construction ubiquitous on campus will soon get a break.

A new utility line that blocked walkways between the Campus Center stairs and Draper Hall has been completed, as has another by Butterfield Hall. The Student Union renovation could be completed by the end of the month, weather permitting – all good news for students crossing campus.

"I don't know what I'll do with all the extra time I'll save walking to class," said senior Justin Jatrinski.

The new utility line completed between the Campus Center, Draper Hall and the East Experiment Station has been paved over, marking completion of a $3.6 million piece of the largest campus infrastructure project undertaken in the last 20 years, according to Jim Hunt, communications manager for the Facilities and Campus Planning department.

The piece just completed, officially called the Campus Center utility corridor, will carry power and steam to the new North Residential Area and the Integrated Science Building under construction next to Skinner Hall on North Pleasant Street.

The larger infrastructure project includes building a new Central Heating Plant behind the Mullins Center and tearing down the existing coal-fired plant on Hicks Way. The new plant will have the same steam capacity as the old plant, but will also generate electricity and meet more stringent emissions requirements.

Between the construction, demolition and new utility lines, the overall project will cost about $118 million and is scheduled to be finished in the summer of 2008.

According to Jason Verdiliti, a project manager for the Facilities and Campus Planning department, "infrastructure projects are ugly and get in everyone's way."

When such projects are finished, he said, they provide no visible benefit to students, but without them, the

UMass Faculty senate discusses campus construction project costs

BY HAYDEN MARX

Joyce Hatch, vice chancellor for administration and finance at the University of Massachusetts, addressed the Faculty Senate Nov. 16 about the need to raise money to repair and maintain campus buildings.

Hatch used information gathered by Sightlines, a facilities asset advisory firm that evaluates the status of the buildings on nearly 150 college and university campuses.

Sightlines advises the schools on how best to allocate their funds using a system called Return on Physical Assets (ROPA). ROPA filters funds by annual stewardship, service, asset reinvestment and operating effectiveness.

They then compare the data with like institutions they have previously worked with.

Sightlines projected that UMass has $1.34 billion in possible building repairs and updates, but not all of these repairs are necessary.

The cost of renovating some buildings may be more than the cost of building a new one due to fire and building codes put in place after their construction.

Hatch said a new regulation requires buildings' first floors conform to a zoning standard before their roofs can be replaced.

She said that if the roof of a noncompliant building was damaged in a storm, the cost of replacing the roof and getting the first floor to meet codes might be more than rebuilding from scratch.

She said such buildings would be considered to be under the category of "do not resuscitate."

Hatch said that UMass would continue to keep those buildings safe and livable but they would not make any expensive updates like adding elevators.

Hatch is looking to the state to help finance the repairs and maintenance.

UMass will receive 10 percent of its funding from the state for the years 2006 to 2011.

The University received 17 percent of its funding from the state from 2001 to 2006.

She said that she hoped the new governor, Deval Patrick, would have a different view of higher education funding than his predecessor.

Hatch said that one of the biggest problems UMass may have is its increasing debt burden.

For the 2006 budget its debt burden was 3.9 percent. By 2009 it will increase to 6 percent if no changes are made.

She said she hoped the board of governors

Two males, 18, 20, arrested in Sylvan parking lot break-in

BY KEVIN FOLEY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

A brief motor vehicle pursuit took place when two males were witnessed breaking and entering a car in a University of Massachusetts parking lot at 1:12 a.m. Sunday morning.

University of Massachusetts Police Department cadets observed the incident in UMass parking lot 44, north of the Sylvan Residential Area. Jared Haselton, 18, and Matthew J. Gibson, 20, entered the car and fled. They were later stopped at the Immanuel Lutheran Church at 867 North Pleasant St. in Amherst.

Haselton, 18, of 12 Pray Dr. in Greenfield, Mass. was arrested for breaking and entering a motor vehicle at night, which is a felony offense. Gibson, 20, of 95 Shaw St. in New London Ct. was arrested for operating a motor vehicle with a suspended license, failing to stop or yield and reckless operation of a motor vehicle.

Two other male parties who were seen at the scene were searched and released with no charges, according to police.

A search of People Finder for the two arrested parties turned up no results.

An Amherst police officer assisted the UMPD on this case.

In 2004, there were 36 motor vehicle thefts in Amherst, or 104.4 per 100,000 people. The national average of car thefts in that year was 421.3 per 100,000 people.

would make sure UMass had the funding to keep that from happening.

Hatch addressed the question of which buildings would be marked "do not resuscitate," saying that that information would not be released until the University was completely certain of which ones they would be.

The faculty member who spoke did not find that answer satisfactory and responded saying he did not expect facility members to throw themselves of the tops of their buildings because they heard their building would be closed down.

He said that most faculty members probably could tell if their building was going to be restored and that it would be better for them to know sooner rather than later.

WOMAN STRIKES DEER

9:14 a.m.

A woman struck a deer while she was on her way to work. According to the RP, another driver flashed their headlights when she passed to warn her of an oncoming obstruction. She drove over the body of the deer that had been previously struck, according to police. There was damage to the vehicle's front air spoiler, but any further damage is unknown.

MOTHER STEALS CHIPS, FLASHLIGHT

10:21 a.m.

A woman was involved in a confrontation with CVS employees at 76 North Pleasant Street over the payment of a bag of chips that one of her children was eating inside the store. The woman became hysterical when confronted and left the store with her two children. The RP reported that on Thursday, the same woman and her children opened a small flashlight package, which was never recovered. The woman was described as a white female with blonde hair and sunglasses. One of her children was wearing a pink jacket.

MAN ARRESTED FOR NOISE VIOLATION

6:57 p.m.

Ryan Fransico Ainslie of 73 Rural St. in Belchertown, Mass. was arrested for unlawful noise at Mill Valley Estates, 420 Riverglade Dr. in Amherst. The RP reported loud music coming from the residence.

WOMAN'S BACKPACK STOLEN

7:37 p.m.

A bag containing school books, notebooks, a titanium calculator, $7 in cash, a Florence Savings Bank ATM card, a Massachusetts driver's permit and a Verizon Wireless cell phone was reported missing after a female left it outside of the Bangs Community Center at 70 Boltwood Walk in Amherst.

MAN PUNCHES CAR

2:02 a.m.

Jeffery N. Carco of 13 Overlook Terrace in East Wareham, Mass. was arrested for disorderly conduct. Carco punched his Honda Civic and, according to police, was verbally abusive toward officers and was given a chance to go home but continued to argue with the officers and his friends.

MAN LAYS IN OWN VOMIT

4:44 a.m.

An RP reported that a 15-year-old male who was extremely intoxicated and having difficulty breathing needed medical assistance. He was laying on the ground in grass and his own vomit and was dressed in "goth" clothes and had painted black fingernails, according to police. He said he was partying with a friend who was only known to him as "Marne." He was transported to Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

MISSING MAN DEPORTED

11:08 a.m.

Joaquin Saravia was reported missing by his sister. She said that no one had seen him for 10 days, including his roommates, and that it was very unusual for him to not be in contact with her. Saravia also has children in New York whose mother was trying to contact him. Saravia was deported from the United States.

MAN THREATENED AT GUNPOINT

10:34 p.m.

A male resident of the Townhouses of Amherst was threatened at gunpoint by two unknown males on Friday evening. The two suspects demanded that the resident produce $2,000 for a drug deal. One of the suspects contacted the resident over the phone several times threatening him and his roommates if the money was not produced. The case is still under investigation.

STUDENTS THROW OBJECTS AT BUS

12:20 a.m.

Loud college-aged students threw objects at a PVTA bus while exiting at a bus stop near the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity house. The RP was concerned about a large party that was happening in the area.

MAN LIES IN ROADWAY

2:04 a.m.

A male was reportedly lying in the roadway on Massachusetts Avenue, near the corner of Sunset Ave., and was bleeding from the head. The male party was carried off by a group of people who were believed to be friends. A search of the surrounding streets turned up nothing.

LOUD PARTY BROKEN UP

2:12 a.m.

A loud party was reported on Main Street. There were approximately 15 guests including Benny the Bucket Man, according to police. The residents cooperated with police officers.

DRUGS AND PELLET GUN FOUND

2:15 a.m.

A backpack was found with a plastic pellet gun and a class D drug inside of it. The bag belonged to a person who is currently on probation. The parole officer will be contacted, according to police.

MALE TAKES PILLS AT FRAT HOUSE

5:55 a.m.

A male resident of the Sigma Phi Epsilon fraternity house called a female friend and told her that he had taken pills. The female called 911. When police arrived on the scene, there were numerous pills spilled at his bedside including diet pills, Pepto pills and Advil. The resident was extremely uncooperative, but eventually accepted a ride to the Cooley Dickinson Hospital.

8:05 p.m.

What appeared to be a homeless man was laying down on a table inside Dunkin Donuts on 312 College St. He refused to leave until police came, when he eventually went on his way.

Johns Hopkins pulls off first ever 5-way kidney transplant

BY ALEX DOMINGUEZ
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BALTIMORE — It took 12 surgeons, six operating rooms and five donors to pull it off, but five desperate strangers simultaneously received new organs in what hospital officials Monday described as the first-ever quintuple kidney transplant.

All five recipients — three men and two women — were doing fine, as were the five organ donors, all women, said Eric Vohr, a spokesman at the Johns Hopkins Comprehensive Transplant Center. The 10 participants came from Canada, Maine, Maryland, West Virginia, Florida and California.

Several triple transplants have been done at Johns Hopkins, but hospital officials said the five simultaneous transplants performed last Tuesday were a first.

Four of the sick patients had approached Johns Hopkins with a relative who was willing to donate a kidney but was an incompatible donor. The fifth patient had been on a waiting list for a kidney from a dead person.

Together, those nine people and an "altruistic donor" — someone willing to give a kidney to anyone who needed it — had enough matched kidneys among them to pull off a complex, five-way swap.

Once the swap was agreed to, the transplants were done all at the same time to prevent anyone from backing out later or in case someone fell ill.

Dr. Robert Montgomery, director of Hopkins' transplant center and head of the transplant team, pronounced the interlocking deal "a demonstration to the rest of the country that this is what's possible when people work together."

Sheila Thornton, 63, of Edgewood, said she felt "just joy, joy, it's almost inexplicable," after she learned she would receive a kidney from Sandra Loevner, 63, of Sarasota, Fla., whom she had never met.

"That really hit home," Thornton said of receiving a lifesaving gift from a stranger. "How do you thank somebody?"

The altruistic donor, Honore Rothstein of Martinsburg, W.Va., decided to donate a kidney after losing her husband to a brain hemorrhage and her daughter to an overdose. She did not know any of the donors or recipients.

"I'm thrilled I'm giving to somebody," Rothstein said, sitting next to Kristine Jantzi, 40, of Bangor, Maine, who received her kidney. "Her mom couldn't give to her, and I couldn't save my daughter."

The operations involved six operating rooms, 12 surgeons, 11 anesthesiologists, and 18 nurses, and took place over 10 hours. The removal of the donor organs began at 7:15 a.m. and was completed by 11 a.m. The kidneys were implanted in operations that began at 1 p.m. and were finished at 5:15 p.m.

Last year, Johns Hopkins doctors performed a triple transplant also involving an altruistic donor. The donor was from a Christian group, many of whose members have given kidneys to strangers.

she described was the Freedom of Choice Act, which guarantees that the government can't discriminate against women who choose whether or not to use contraception and whether or not to carry their pregnancy to term.

"If you want my opinion, it may take another generation to pass this," said Feldt. "So it's really going to require many of you who are interested in this subject to be the public health crusaders who do that and see that it happens."

She called the road to reproductive rights "fighting forward," because, as she says, "it's way too late to fight back – we've lost too many of these battles already."

"Be clear about your own opinion," she told audience members. "You have a right to it, and don't let somebody who believes otherwise get into your head and keep you from doing what you think is right."

She also suggested voting, organizing and understanding the legislative process.

"A democratic majority does not mean a pro-choice majority," she said. "[Politicians] really need to hear from us every single day – telling us what we expect of them, telling them why we cast our votes for them or not, telling them our stories."

"One person can move mountains, but if you have one and one and one and one, then we really can ... take on these really big issues and we can make a difference," she said.

Feldt was president of Planned Parenthood from 1996 to 2005 and has written two books, "The War on Choice: The Right-Wing Attack on Women's Rights and How to Fight Back" and "Behind Every Choice Is a Story," according to her Web site, www.gloriafeldt.com. Her third book, "Take the Lead, Lady!," will be released in late 2007.

"She's a woman of vision, she's a woman of passion, and she's a woman of conviction," said Eileen Breslin, dean of the School of Nursing.

"If nothing else, [this is] really a call to action to be able to put into your own lives the power of ... your belief system."

Jessica Parker, president of VD: Students for Choice at UMass, said she was impressed that Feldt posed the topic as an issue of public health rather than one of choice.

"Making the issue a public health imperative makes it easier to reach out to a broader audience about the issues of reproductive health and justice," said Parker.

"It doesn't matter how you stand on the issue, because you should be educated from all sides of the issue," she added. "When students have access to the information that speakers can provide, they can be educated and motivated enough to make efforts to make changes they want to see in the world."

Domestic cars fall short in U.S. insurance safety rankings

BY TOM KRISHER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

DETROIT — Imported models took all 13 spots on the U.S. insurance industry's list of safest vehicles this year, due mainly to a new requirement that all cars and sport utilities on the list have systems to keep them stable in an emergency.

The Insurance Institute for Highway Safety isn't bashful about its reasons for pushing electronic stability control, saying that its studies show up to 10,000 fatal crashes per year could be prevented if every vehicle had the safety feature.

"The research is so compelling that electronic stability control could help prevent many crashes from happening in the first place," institute spokesman Russ Rader said.

Winners for the 2007 model year included the Audi A-6 in the large car category; the Audi A-4, Saab 9-3 and Subaru Legacy (with optional stability control) for midsize cars, the Hyundai Entourage and Kia Sedona minivans, the Mercedes M-class and Volvo XC90 luxury sport utility vehicles; the Acura RDX, Honda Pilot and Subaru B9 Tribeca midsize SUVs, and the Honda CR-V and Subaru Forester small SUVs.

All 13 vehicles are tops in protecting people in front, side and rear crash tests based on institute tests during the year.

Pickup trucks were not included because the institute has not yet tested their side crashworthiness.

The National Highway Traffic Safety Administration has proposed requiring electronic stability control on all new vehicles by the 2012 model year, but institute President Adrian Lund said that's not soon enough.

"We think that they are too slow," Lund said. "Automakers will probably have it as standard equipment by the time the federal standards actually take full effect."

Domestic manufacturers had no models on the list of safest vehicles because they haven't moved quickly enough to add stability control to their models, Lund said in a telephone interview.

For instance, Ford Motor Co. would have had three cars — the Ford Freestyle crossover and the Mercury Montego and Ford 500 sedans — make the list if they had stability control, the institute said.

The 500 and the Montego earned top safety picks last year.

Ford spokesman Jim Cain said all three vehicles will get stability control for the 2008 model year, with versions equipped with the safety feature on sale sometime next year.

The company has not determined whether the feature will be standard or optional, he said.

"We're moving in the same direction as the institute," he said.

Ford has said previously that it would put stability control on its entire lineup by the end of 2009.

All 13 vehicles on the insurance industry's list are tops in protecting people in crash tests.

General Motors Corp. said nearly two years ago that it would make the technology standard in all vehicles by 2010, including all SUVs and some full-size pickups in the 2007 model year.

Toyota has said stability control would be a standard feature across all its models by 2009.

DaimlerChrysler AG said it will have the technology on 54 percent of its vehicles this model year and will meet the federal government's timetable for the rest.

All 2007 SUVs, pickups and minivans produced by Honda Motor Co. carry the technology, while Hyundai Motor Co. said it is standard equipment on 70 percent of its 2007 vehicles.

Several other vehicles, including nine Toyota Motor Corp. models, would have made the list if they had stability control, the institute said.

No small cars made this year's list. The Honda Civic, which won last year, was knocked off due to lack of stability control on most models. The one version that has the feature doesn't have head restraints for rear crash protection, the institute said.

SUVs were eligible to win for the first time this year because the institute conducted side-impact tests on many models.

The institute said the overall awards will help people quickly compare vehicles without having to review results from multiple tests.

MADD pushes alcohol-detecting devices to curb drunk driving

BY ANN SANNER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON — New technology such as alcohol-detecting devices in cars may hold the key to eliminating drunken driving, according to a campaign begun Monday by Mothers Against Drunk Driving.

The organization, along with the Department of Transportation, is pushing for such devices as well as tougher enforcement measures around the country.

"If we can't stop drunks from driving, we'll stop vehicles from driving drunks," said Glynn Birch, president of MADD, at a news conference. Birch said technology, along with tougher laws and enforcement, has put eliminating drunken driving "at our fingertips."

The organization wants states to pass laws requiring breath-test interlock devices in vehicles for all those who have been convicted of drunken driving. New Mexico has such a law for first offenders; 45 states and the District of Columbia allow the device for some offenders.

Interlock devices require drivers to blow into an instrument that measures alcohol. The vehicle won't start unless the driver's blood alcohol concentration is below a preset level. Other interlocks may require drivers to breathe into the devices periodically.

"The main reason people continue to drive drunk today is because they can and because we let them," Birch said.

MADD estimates that 1,900 lives could be saved each year if interlocks were installed in the vehicles of all convicted drunken drivers.

The American Beverage Institute, which represents restaurants, says MADD's campaign is overreaching.

"Our general position is that the interlock campaign is not about eliminating drunk driving, it's about eliminating all moderate and responsible drinking prior to driving and Americans should be outraged by this," said Sarah Longwell, spokeswoman for the association.

As part of the MADD campaign, safety experts will explore other technology options. Some alternatives could measure blood alcohol concentration by sampling air in the vehicle or tracking hand or eye movements that might indicate drowsiness or drunken behavior.

"Advanced technology is being developed that in the future may allow quick, accurate and reliable detection of drinking drivers in the time it takes to start a vehicle," said Susan Ferguson, senior vice president of research at the Insurance Institute for Highway Safety, who will chair the panel.

MADD also wants states to implement more sobriety checkpoints.

The federal government has set aside $7 million for advertising in December to remind drivers that if they are over the legal limit, they can be arrested.

Each year, nearly 13,000 people are killed in accidents involving drivers with blood alcohol concentrations of .08 or above, according to MADD.

Other organizations joining the campaign include the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration, the Distilled Spirits Council and the International Association of Chiefs of Police.

New plant to be more efficient campus would cease to function.

Venditti has managed the Campus Center utility corridor since construction began in April. He explained that the newly-upgraded steam lines include a low pressure line for general heating and a high pressure line for areas that the low pressure steam otherwise could not reach, including the top of the Campus Center, where a new restaurant for the Hotel and Tourism Management department has just been completed.

The low pressure line was upgraded from 16 inches to 24 inches, and the high pressure line from 10 inches to 16 inches. The added diameter increases the flow of steam enough to meet the demand from the construction on the east side of campus.

The corridor will also provide treated wastewater for cooling machinery such as steam boilers, saving an estimated 200,000 gallons of drinking water every day, according to the department's project description. That translates to less wastewater flowing to the Connecticut River and less water the University must buy to keep its equipment running coolly and efficiently.

The Student Union façade is still surrounded by fences, but as workers continue to repair the roof and replace masonry, it could be finished soon after Thanksgiving break. Most other projects will continue into next year, and some, even beyond.

The Utility Corridor project originally was scheduled to end Sept. 29. However, the work also uncovered sewer and water lines running to Draper Hall that had become corroded. Venditti said the extra work of replacing them added just over a month to the project.

Still, according to Hunt, it was the "classic on-time, on-budget project." The contractor fulfilled the terms of the contract on schedule and within its $3.6 million budget. For the purpose of the original contract, the added work is on a different schedule and is budgeted separately.

Venditti said that All State Boiler and Construction, the contractor for the Campus Center utility corridor, is responsible for any faults in workmanship that show up within one year, enough time to test the steam line under real winter conditions.

"It's a bumper-to-bumper warranty," Venditti said. Anything that goes wrong, such as a faulty valve or a burst pipe, will be the contractor's responsibility to fix, and should one the University nothing during the warranty period.

Although the construction stage of the Campus Center utility corridor project is complete, landscaping will continue through the spring, depending on the weather. New grass is already growing on some of the ground left bare by the project. The University is using "terraseeding," a proprietary process which blows soil mixed with grass seed over the area to be planted.

The landscaping already has included moving four trees from the project area to other parts of campus, and cutting down some too close to the Campus Center stairs to be relocated. In addition, the contractor rerouted the utility lines running to Draper around the large Beech tree in front of the building in order to save it. In the spring, more trees will be planted to replace those removed.

The new Central Heating Plant will burn natural gas and oil. It will integrate innovative heat recovery technologies to pass stringent new requirements on efficiency and pollution controls, according to the project description.

The requirements for the power plant will limit its carbon monoxide output to 20 pounds per hour when operating at full capacity, which will be 10 megawatt-hours. Particulates will be limited to seven-tenths of a pound per hour, and nitrogen oxides to three pounds per hour.

The new plant will produce half the emissions that power plants are currently permitted to produce, but about twice what they will be allowed to emit in 2012, according to the Massachusetts Department of Environmental Protection.

Overall, the steam project will cost $118 million to complete. The figure includes constructing the new Central Heating Plant, laying new utility lines and upgrading old lines, and tearing down the existing steam plant in the summer of 2008.

70,000 people await kidneys

Annie Moore, a spokeswoman for the United Network for Organ Sharing, the nonprofit organization that coordinates U.S. organ transplants, said she wasn't aware of any other quintuple kidney transplants. Triple transplants are the biggest that have been performed up to now, and paired transplants are more common, Moore said.

Most kidney transplants use organs taken from cadavers, but doctors prefer organs from live donors because the success rates are higher.

In a live-donor practice used increasingly in the U.S. over the past few years, a patient who needs a kidney is matched up with a compatible stranger if the patient lines up a friend or relative willing to donate an organ to a stranger, too.

About 16,500 kidney transplants were performed in the United States in 2005, of which about 10,000 involved organs taken from dead people and 6,500 from living donors, according to the Organ Procurement and Transportation Network.

About 70,000 people are waiting for a kidney transplant in the United States. The wait averages about five years, during which time 10,000 will either die or become too sick for a transplant, Montgomery said.

Montgomery called for a national kidney-swap program, saying it could help ease the shortage of transplant organs and cut costs by getting people off dialysis. He said 6,000 people on the waiting list for a kidney from a dead person have a willing but incompatible donor.

He noted, however, that live-donor kidney swaps present ethical problems for some institutions since federal law prohibits receiving something of value in exchange for an organ. Some institutions feel multiple arrangements come uncomfortably close to quid pro quo, Montgomery said. He called for a clarification of the law.

The complicated swap worked this way:

Rothstein donated her kidney to Jantzi. Jantzi was incompatible with the kidney offered by her adoptive mother, Florence Jantzi, a Christian missionary who donated her kidney to George Brooks, 52, a mechanic who was not compatible with the kidney offered by his wife, Sharon Brooks.

Sharon Brooks, 55, a telephone company maintenance administrator, donated her kidney to Gary Persell, 61, a retired film distributor.

Butts should be banned

Debbie Friedman

Over 40 million people in this country are hooked on the deadly cigarette. Most of them know by now they are increasing their chances of lung cancer, heart disease and stroke by gigantic percentages, because the statistics are out there, plain as day.

Cigarette smoking accounts for one out of every five deaths in the United States. More deaths are caused by cigarette smoke than HIV, illegal drug use, alcohol use, motor vehicle injuries, suicides and murders, combined. Yet, Americans still choose (emphasis on choose) to engage in this proven life reducer in spite of the facts.

Unfortunately, the effects on the remaining members of the population who choose not to smoke are not taken into account to the extent that they should be. Millions and millions of non-smokers are exposed to the harmful substances in cigarette smoke every day, causing numerous health problems.

Secondhand smoke is defined by the American Lung Association as the "mixture of the smoke given off by the burning end of a cigarette, pipe or cigar and the smoke exhaled from the lungs of smokers." They say, "it is involuntarily inhaled by nonsmokers, lingers in the air hours after cigarettes have been extinguished and can cause or exacerbate a wide range of adverse health effects, including cancer, respiratory infections, and asthma."

In fact, they estimate that secondhand smoke is responsible for 3,000 lung cancer deaths and up to 69,000 heart disease deaths in American adult nonsmokers each year. This means thousands of people are dying because of someone else's lethal hobby.

And while it may be a smoker's right to have this hobby, it is not fair to force the adverse side effects of cigarette smoke onto people who opt for health in a world where sickness already runs rampant.

November is Lung Cancer Awareness Month. The disease lacks public awareness, as evident in its nickname, "The Invisible cancer." Ironically this so-called invisible illness accounts for the most cancer related deaths in the United States.

The disease earned this title because it usually develops without specific signs or symptoms, causing a late diagnosis and a grim prognosis. Many lung cancer patients do not survive past five years after their diagnosis.

While lung cancer occurs primarily in smokers, it still plagues those who have never smoked a day in their life, mostly because of secondhand smoke. It is for this reason that clean air legislation and smoking bans should be considered vitally important to public health.

What's truly inconvenient is for someone who never touched a cigarette to be diagnosed with a life threatening illness simply because they were a bystander to someone else's bad habit.

It may be inconvenient for a smoker to leave a bar, restaurant, apartment or office to light up, but it's a chosen inconvenience. What's truly inconvenient is for someone who never touched a cigarette to be diagnosed with a life threatening illness simply because they were a bystander to someone else's bad habit. And it's more than inconvenient – it's completely tragic and unfair.

New York City, Austin and Columbus, Ohio have already banned smoking in all indoor public places, along with 2,000 other cities and towns around the country. Boston has banned smoking in all indoor workplaces.

These changes have made a significant difference in the air quality of all indoor facilities. A study conducted by researchers from Roswell Park Cancer Institute in Buffalo, found that in New York City, where the ban is the most stringent, there was only 25 micrograms of pollution per cubic meter of air. In Washington D.C., they found 392 micrograms per cubic meter of air.

Overall, they found that indoor air pollution was 82 percent lower in cities with a smoking ban compared to those without. Those striking numbers will certainly translate to lower numbers of sick people.

Some states are even taking the secondhand smoke crisis out into the streets. California has banned smoking on many beaches and parks. And many towns, cities and states are proposing to give fines to smokers who light up outside of public places.

Smokers may see these bans as an infringement on their rights, but really, it is an infringement on the rights of the nonsmoker to be involuntarily exposed to potentially cancer causing substances – especially when it can be easily avoided.

No one is trying to take the cigarette away altogether (even though it would save an immense amount of lives, put corrupt companies out of business and help save the environment) because citizens are entitled to their vices. But when vices such as smoking become harmful and dangerous to the public, they need to be regulated.

The connection between secondhand smoke and illness is too strong to be ignored. The right to health is more important than the right to smoke.

Standards need raising

Anthony David Rueli

I was in FYE (For Your Entertainment, to the layperson – a small pun) some time ago, browsing, when a terrible screeching sound erupted from the speakers above. Concerned, I made my way to the front desk to ask what all the commotion was about. The teenage boy at the counter replied, "Oh, it's Paris Hilton's new CD." Pretty good, huh? I somehow managed to formulate some sort of a fragmented response before quickly exiting FYE stage left.

I spent the rest of the day doing a little research on the so-called music of today's generation, and it left me fairly depressed. Until then, I hadn't completely realized how sordid the state of affairs was in today's music industry.

Musicians (and I use that term as loosely as it can be used) of today have absolutely nothing to say whatsoever. Certain actresses (wow, I don't know if I should even give them that much credit) have realized that they are so ridiculously popular in today's society that they could release absolutely anything they want. It doesn't even matter how wretched the quality happens to be. This is what leads them to the recording industry.

This particular group of people includes Paris Hilton, Hilary Duff, Lindsay Lohan, Jennifer Love Hewitt, Brittany Murphy and many more. Then there are those who are able to release commercially successful albums simply because of the fame of their siblings – Haylie Duff, Ashlee Simpson, etc. Most, if not all, of these artists play no instruments, take little to no part in the writing of their songs and some have even been caught lip-synching.

Bob Dylan said in a recent interview with Rolling Stone magazine that he has not heard "a record that sounds decent in the past 20 years, really." That is an exaggerated point of view, certainly, but I couldn't help but feel the same way when I read it. It's a horrible way to look at things, but nonetheless true, in my opinion.

Most, if not all, of these artists play no instruments, take little to no part in the writing of their songs and some have even been caught lip-synching.

Thankfully, there is another group of artists who made sure that all was not lost in the industry. It's as if all the great musicians out there from the past 40 or so years realized this same thing that I have been realizing, and they set about to change that.

These musicians are people who know how to play their own instruments. They are people who write their own lyrics and their own music. They are people who don't need to synthesize their voices, no matter how rough or scratchy they sound, because that's part of the charm of true music.

Say what you have to say, and say it in your own voice – not while hiding behind some machines and buttons. Most of all, they are people who strive to make a difference with their music, whether it be to the entire world or simply one person. As Arlo Guthrie once said, "Songs can change the destiny of nations."

This year was truly a phenomenal year in music, despite what you may be hearing on the radio. Many artists stepped forward to help those of us who have been appalled by recent music, including Tom Petty, Elton John, Neil Young, Bruce Springsteen, Paul Simon, Jimmy Buffett and Mark Knopfler, all of whom released new albums this year. In addition to all this, there were a few big surprises this year.

Bob Seger, for one, introduced his first new album since 1995. The Who's newly released "Endless Wire" is their first studio album since 1982. The Cars reformed to introduce their first new album since 1987.

Most importantly, Bob Dylan's "Modern Times," undoubtedly the best album of the year (and probably of many years past) was released. The album, which was released to a hail of critical and commercial praise, has not left Amazon.com's Top 20 bestseller list since its August release, which gives me hope that there are still people out there who appreciate amazing music when they hear it.

To anyone who hasn't heard of these artists, do yourself a favor and go check them out. You may be surprised. Also, to those who are fans, don't forget that these artists are still recording. Show them some support. In today's market, they just may need it.

So, thank you to all those who love music, and thank you even more to those brave artists who have the persistence and creativity to keep recording, no matter their age, style or popularity. Never stop writing. Never stop singing. Never stop making a difference.

Maturing the nature of politics

Katy Bruck

I'll admit it. I missed a few classes because I was completely glued to MSNBC, watching the outcome of the midterm elections. And I'll admit, as excited and anticipatory as I was seeing the blue states pile up, I was a little nervous, too.

After hearing Nancy Pelosi described as a "firecracker" and watching numerous Democratic political consultants whoop, cheer and snicker triumphantly, my faith in the sanity of moderate Democrats began to waver. I started to think maybe they'd all gone insane.

In a political atmosphere where the decisions of the current administration have been so decidedly controversial, it seems that moderate politicians are increasingly desperate. They feel that the only techniques they can use to defend themselves are the tactics used against them.

As made evident by the 2004 presidential election, neither Right nor Left decided to rise above character attacks or name-calling to progress their agendas. Instead of offering coherent choices for their constituencies, candidates decided that subverting their opponents was more efficient.

The resulting ambivalence on the part of the American people was evident in the close outcome of that election. People voted for Kerry because they didn't like Bush, and people voted for Bush because they didn't like Kerry. It's a dangerous thing when politics becomes a game of choosing the candidate you hate less instead of voting for one you believe in.

Unfortunately, it seems that voters across the nation were forced out of their apathy by the policy decisions of the last two years. The campaigning leading up to the recent election was less about personalities and individual platforms and more about packing in bodies.

Whatever Right-wingers want to say about how the country is going to be thrown into chaos, it was citizens who chose to change the direction of this country. But again, this change was elicited as a result of discontent, not inspiration in the face of a new political movement.

So now, all we can do is wait. Being, after all, a real person and not a waffling, talking caricature of ignorance, Bush made a conscious choice to find a more moderate, experienced replacement for Rumsfeld. Bush has conceded that mistakes have been made. Now steps must be taken to re-evaluate the situation in Iraq, since it is without a doubt the biggest financial and morale-draining issue on the table.

Hopefully, the Democrats can swallow their bitterness and frustration, step up and play the game they've entered so late.

And while I disagree with descriptions of Bush being bullied into yielding to every Democratic whim, he is now forced to let them into the decision-making process. Hopefully, the Democrats can swallow their bitterness and frustration, step up and play the game they've entered so late.

I have faith that they will. And my faith stems from looking ahead to the 2008 presidential election. As traumatic and difficult as the past decade has been for the Democratic Party, I believe that they have the power to mature the nature of politics in this country.

Since the beginning of his administration, George W. Bush has never had the support of the Democratic Party, and as his terms progressed, he even began to lose their cooperation (not that he needed it with a Republican majority in Congress).

There is a strong argument to be made that Bush attempted to run the country without even acknowledging the interests of his opposing party. Needless to say, at this point, Democrats across the nation are more likely to spit in his face than shake his hand. But we're in an interesting position as a country, and the Democrats are in an interesting position as a representative party.

They have the ability now to work alongside a personality they have so vehemently abhorred for years. Though certain ethical issues are bound to be confronted, the Democratic Party now has the power to take the high road.

They can discard the mutual animosity for the sake of political change, which in reality is what the voice of the people called for last Tuesday. Both the Democratic and Republican parties have lost the trust of much of the American people. And at this moment in history, both have the potential to regain that trust, by working together in a mature, bipartisan way.

And who knows, by the time 2008 comes along, perhaps both parties can present us with moderate candidates, perhaps with even tempers and secular policies. If Bush's office and the new Democratic Congress can work together, instead of kicking each other in the knees every chance they get, we might be in for a treat in two years. It all goes well, I'm inclined to believe that animosity could indeed be disassociated from American politics.

I am writing to respond to the article "One DC at sub-par level" by Colin McDonald, with both regret and disappointment. I regret that we do not meet the high expectations that student McDonald is looking for at each meal. That's our job – we will continue to improve.

On the other hand, I feel compelled to tell the other side of the story of the beef tips after talking to our staff at Franklin. The beef tips on the Restaurant Night were "Espresso seared tenderloin tips," a recipe that we used from East Side Grill, a popular local restaurant.

Beef tenderloin tips had an espresso rub to get the distinct flavors. We thought it would be nice to serve something different, and the students that I talked to enjoyed the meal.

I encourage students that have suggestions to please contact the managers at each DC or myself directly through e-mail.

During this Thanksgiving season it is important to put things in proper perspective. I understand McDonald's frustration; however, any negative article like his is really a downer for the hard working staff (many are students) who take pride in serving UMass.

Please do not forget to say "thank you" to them as we begin the Holiday Season.

Montgomery tribute packs the Iron Horse

BY MICHAEL TRABERT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Local guitar virtuoso Joe Belmont, accompanied by a band that was right in the groove, took the audience on a trip through the life of guitar legend Wes Montgomery Sunday at the Iron Horse.

"I put this together to promote Wes and re-familiarize people with his music," said Belmont, right before breaking into a version of Montgomery's "4 On 6," an upbeat song with sharp rhythms and blistering guitar.

It took no time for this group to settle in, they got onstage and were immediately in the groove.

The set opened with the band behind singer Jill Connolly performing a version of "God Bless the Child," her smooth timbre was reminiscent of Dinah Washington and mixed well with Belmont's quick trebles and Claire Arenius's exquisite brush work.

Atmosphere in the Iron Horse was great that night, consisting mostly of an appreciative middle age crowd whose low murmurs during breaks mixed well with the warm smell of food and thick lager.

The first highlight of the night came when the band sat out to let Belmont and Connolly do an acoustic duet. Their version of "Somewhere" had a Joe Pass styled guitar part that was a perfect complement to Connelly's voice.

Afterward, Connelly got off stage and Belmont talked about Wes Montgomery's life for a bit, describing him as "one of the greatest jazz guitarist."

Other songs played at the show were "California Dreaming" with special guest Bruce Diehl on the saxophone and "D-Natural Blues."

Belmont's band was furiously on top of every song and communicated amazingly during the performance.

The stunning chops of Dave Shapiro's upright bass work where well developed and right in the groove. His solo in the song "Caravan" made use of dissonant pizzicato chords, great phrasing, and warm bottom end that left the crowd going nuts.

Locked in with Shapiro was drummer Claire Arenius. She impressed the crowd with her solos and proficiency in complementing the rest of the band.

Paul Arslanian, the piano player, had some great moments as well. He used his sharp skills to keep the group moving, and his touch on the ivories was incredible.

Shapiro, Arslanian and Arenius were so cohesive during the show that the energy between them was making them smile. You could tell that these

Vapid comedy puts viewer behind bars

ANN ARBOR, Mich. — A quick search of IMDb.com shows that few actors have as much on their plates right now as Will Arnett. The rave reviews that heralded "Arrested Development" even into its premature cancellation have left the quirky gesture comedian (who played the self-promoting magician and perpetual screw-up Gob Bluth on the show) in high demand, although most of his projects so far have failed to take advantage of his considerable comedic instinct. The latest cinematic misstep, "Let's Go to Prison," is an abject attempt at satirical humor gone disastrously awry, despite the good intentions that seem to have gone into it.

"Our justice system sucks," declares John Lyshitski (played by Dax Shepard of "Employee of the Month"), the protagonist of "Prison" and self-proclaimed victim of that system. When he was eight, John tried to steal the Publisher's Clearing House van, mistakenly thinking there would be money inside, and ever since his life has been a virtual carousel in and out of prison.

Once he's finally out of lockup, John looks immediately to taking revenge on the judge who ruined his life, Nelson Biederman III. But when he learns that the old judge is dead, John focuses his vengeance on his bratty son Nelson IV (Arnett), framing him for an armed robbery and ensuring himself a place in Nelson's cell. In prison, the fresh-faced Nelson gets beat up, choked, stabbed and otherwise violated, much to John's delight. But as Nelson grows accustomed to prison ways, he makes John angrier, leading to a final death match out on the yard.

Despite tasteless humor and no screenings for critics, there isn't anything overtly painful about the film.

Even with the many miscalculated gags and totally vapid writing, the film is not always unwatchable, but it fails in its persistent, desperate attempts at both humor and sentiment. We're supposed to sympathize with John, and – considering that he's been in trouble with the law since the tender age of eight – you'd think

Amherst Cinema alive again

BY MATTHEW ALVEY
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

The Amherst Cinema, located in downtown Amherst, welcomed the public to tour the newly renovated theater after an opening ceremony on Saturday morning.

Spirits were high, community members were hopeful and the smell of popcorn lingered in the air – Amherst had its cinema back.

Just before 11 a.m. the crowd began to gather outside Amherst Cinema at 28 Amity Street. They hosted a ribbon-cutting ceremony on Saturday, Nov. 18 to celebrate the opening of the completely renovated cinema that has been closed for seven years. The cinema will re-open on Wednesday, Nov. 22.

After the cinema was forced to close in 1999, citizens formed the Amherst Cinema Arts Center, a non-profit group that aimed to rebuild the cinema, and bought the building off an auction block in 2000.

Anne Awad, a speaker at the ribbon cutting ceremony, remembered the day vividly.

"We celebrated that day because of the vision of our group," she said.

Six years later, that vision has come clearer into view.

Carol M. Johnson, president of the group, greeted the crowd of around 150 that had gathered outside the cinema.

"This is a day to celebrate and say thank you and please," she said, referring to the help the community has given and how much more is needed to make this effort successful.

Congressman John Olver and Senator Stan Rosenberg also spoke at the ceremony.

"This is a milestone in the history of Amherst," said Rosenberg.

Olver also received a warm greeting from the crowd when he declared that "the arts are an engine for economic development."

Other speakers included Larry Shaffer and real estate owner Barry Roberts. An emotional Johnson thanked Roberts, saying this project would not have happened without his help.

Just before cutting the ribbon, Johnson informed the crowd that the group is just $100,000 shy of reaching its yearly goal of raising 1.5 million. She said that another $1.5 million is needed next year to keep the cinema running.

Once the ribbon was cut, the public was invited inside for a tour of the beautiful new cinema. Volunteers were on hand to answer questions and hand out mints, chocolates and, of course, popcorn.

Dennis and Annick Porter, who have lived in Amherst since 1971, were frequent moviegoers to the cinema before it closed in 1999. While looking wide-eyed around the inside of the new building, they reminisced about braving snowstorms to see their favorite films.

"At the end [in the late 1990's] there was no heating, we would have to bring blankets with us, it was run down," said Annick.

"This is the best thing to happen to Amherst in 30 years," said Dennis.

The cinema contains three screens, all with stadium-style seating. They contain 49 seats, while the larger room seats 190. The larger screen also has a stage that Johnson says will serve as a performance area in the future. They hope to host symposiums, dance performances and children-friendly events such as readings and puppet shows.

On opening day the theatre will shows two movies, Christopher Guest's "For Your Consideration" and Stephen Frears' "The Queen."

Guest is best known for directing 2000's "Best In Show" and 2003's "A Mighty Wind." In both these films, Guest makes fictional documentaries about events such as dog shows and folk festivals. He has used a similar cast that includes Eugene Levy in each film. "For Your Consideration" will examine the phenomenon that is the movie business.

"The Queen" takes a look at Windsor Castle during the Princess Diana tragedy. Frears is known for directing 2000's "High Fidelity" and 1990's "The Grifters." "The Queen" stars Helen Mirren as Queen Elizabeth II.

Johnson said a third movie, "Shut Up & Sing," a documentary on the Dixie Chicks, will be showing soon.

Tickets prices are comparable to other major theatres. Students pay $7.50 to see a night flick, while regular adult admission is $8.50. The cinema also offers a membership program. For $60 a year ($40 for students) patrons get a dollar off each admission, four free bags of popcorn each year and e-mails about newly arriving films.

If successful, Amherst Cinema will provide Amherst with an outlet for independent films. Congressman John Olver believes it will also boost the economy and revenue for areas in the nearby shops and eateries.

As Johnson said just before cutting the ribbon, "Let the movies begin."

On Saturday the Amherst Cinema re-opened its doors at a ribbon-cutting ceremony. The cinema is opening again after seven years, and is set to screen "The Queen" and "For Your Consideration" this week.

Loving the leftovers: How to make Thanksgiving last and last

BY ALETA WATSON
SAN JOSE MERCURY NEWS

The weeks of planning, shopping and cooking are over. Happily stuffed family and friends have pushed away from the table and freshly washed pots are sitting on the drainboard. Now comes the unsung blessing of Thanksgiving – a refrigerator full of leftovers.

With a long weekend stretching ahead, there are few better feelings than the satisfaction of knowing most of the heavy lifting already has been done in the kitchen. Those leftovers are the cook's ticket to go shopping, hit the hiking trails, catch a movie or just hang out with friends.

After all the T-Day indulgence, it feels good to eat simply. My family is usually content to merely warm up the bounty for at least one meal. Then we turn to sandwiches.

Roast turkey seems made for tucking between slices of bread or rolling into a tortilla. The mild-mannered meat is an ideal foil for flavorful cheese and lively condiments. Change the bread or vary the garnishes and you have a whole new taste with minimal effort.

The most basic sandwich places turkey on good sourdough bread with a little mayo and some lettuce. I like to add cranberry sauce for a tart sweet touch. Some adventurous souls also add a layer of stuffing to the mix.

But that's only the beginning. Without a lot more effort, you can give your sandwich an Italian or Mexican personality. Stir together a salsa verde, or green sauce – with chopped olives, herbs and garlic, lemon and olive oil – to punch up slices of turkey on a soft ciabbata for a panino that would be at home in Tuscany. Or head South of the border with a two-fisted torta that brings black beans, avocado and simple pickled red onions to the party.

Along more familiar lines, it's hard to beat the homey twist on a grilled turkey sandwich from Palo Alto, Calif., chef Jesse Cool's enchanting little cookbook, "Toast" (Chronicle). It calls for provolone and sweet, almost jammy caramelized onions, which play well with thick, slices of rustic whole grain bread. Buy an unsliced loaf and cut it yourself.

Tortillas stand in for the bread in a handheld variation on the traditional Cobb salad, born as a late night snack at the Brown Derby in Hollywood some 80 years ago. The original salad called for chicken, but turkey works nicely. For an extra bit of color, you could use a tomato - or spinach-based tortilla.

To accompany the sandwiches, you might want to make a simple soup by simmering the turkey carcass – trimmed of meat and broken into large pieces – in a large pot of water with chunks of onion, carrot and celery for a few hours. If you cook the broth in a pasta pot with a strainer insert, you can just lift out and discard the bones and spent veggies before correcting the seasoning and adding any fresh vegetables, pasta or rice you would like.

On the other hand, you could always freeze the carcass in a zippered plastic bag for up to three months and make soup on a cold and rainy day when your spirits could use a boost.

Think of Thanksgiving leftovers as a gift to the cook rather than an obligation.

Valente gains 'Loveless' response with latest ' Letters' album

By David Humphreys
Collegian Correspondent

It's a wonder why Ricky Valente has not been recognized on more of a national level. Using a seamless blend of atmospheric hard rock and lighter vocals, "Loveless Letters" (his second album release) typifies what many of today's more famous artists strive for over multiple albums: an emotional and somewhat meaningful musical presence.

With a better backing band, more musical variation and a wider distribution, "Loveless Letters" might have given Valente a glimpse at stardom. Instead, it just cements his fan's appreciation for his music while the rest of us are left unsatisfied.

Although Valente is a talented musician, all his hard work just does not manage to get him off the ground. Citing Jimi Hendrix, Thelonious Monk, The Beatles, David Gilmour, The Queens of The Stone Age, Jeff Buckley and Beethoven as some of his influences, Valente really does not really epitomize any one of these musicians. His style is, as his influences suggest, a melting pot of musical history. With hard rocking, screaming solos coupled with sparse acoustic interludes and surprisingly meaningful lyrics, "Loveless Letters" tries to vary just as much as Hendrix and Beethoven do. Try as it might, though, it does not succeed.

One of "Loveless Letters'" major shortcomings relies on the fact that it bridges the gap between 1980s and 1990s music.

Unfortunately for everyone, it came a decade too late. With grunge gone and hair-metal out of style, "Loveless Letters" lies precariously balanced between the likes of Van Halen and The Gin Blossoms, with only a hair holding it into our decade.

One main problem is the soloing. Sounding like an amateur Steve Vai (still amazing), Valente does manage to tear through some riffs but betrays "Loveless Letters'" image in the process. Using less hard rock and sticking to a softer sound, even during ripping solos, would make the album more realistic and appreciative.

"Loveless Letters," with under a half-hour of running time, dwindles and becomes repetitive and uninspiring. Valente's lyrics and composition of "Loveless Letters" are what a lot of musicians look to strive for, yet his newest EP follows too strict of a formula in all of its songs. After the phenomenal "The Borderline," all of his other songs seem repetitive. The six tracks that follow seem to reap upon its greatness in the same fashion in which Ricky Valente does: mimicking the sound of something more successful.

In "Loveless Letters," it seems that Valente tries to be someone he isn't: a national artist. With local roots and ties, he should stick to what he knows and not try and be anything else, unless he can. With a few more tracks and more time spent cutting and editing, "Loveless Letters" could really stack up to be a decent sophomore album.

While his singles might be played on a Top 40 radio station someday, it is doubtful. Valente needs to focus on building a stronger, less regionalized fan base, one with which he can elevate his status and try and outgrow what he and "Loveless Letters" ended up being: mediocre at best.

"Loveless Letters" can be bought online at CDbaby.com for $10.

Little rages on Brand New album

By Allie Roth
Collegian Staff

The latest Brand New album, "The Devil and God Are Raging Inside of Me," is not great, but has several redeeming factors that help pull it through. The dark and dismal allure that was present in 2003's "Deja Entandu" still shines through and lead singer Jesse Lacey's voice is still laced with sex appeal.

But somehow, something is missing. There is not as much variation on this album. This absence makes one question the direction that Brand New hopes to take their sound, too similar to the last two releases by fellow Long Island band Taking Back Sunday than one would expect. At some points, the devoted fan may yearn for the days of "Soco Amaretto Lime," "Okay I Believe You, But My Tommy Gun Don't" and "Play Crack the Sky." With this release, the fan of acoustic Brand New may leave unsatisfied.

After the band battled with several titles, they decided to use "The Devil and God Are Raging Inside of Me," a reference to a conversation Lacey had about friend suffering from schizophrenia. On the surface, it appears that Brand New's sound is not schizophrenic. All the songs seem to derive from the same morose and destructive place. However, the themes of the songs do reflect typical schizophrenic struggles: deciding who you are, becoming who you wish to be and coming to grips with an assumed role.

The album opens with "Sowing Season (Yeah)," a song that many fans may recognize as "Untitled 8" (from the largely Internet-circulated demos). The single is non-nonsense in its formula. It progresses from low and solo to loud and group focused. First, it's just Lacey's voice. Then Lacey's voice is joined with electric guitar notes.

When the chorus comes in, backing vocals, roaring guitars and pounding drums enter into the mix. The lyrics appear to be a plea to turn off the spotlight. Lacey sings, "I am not your friend/ I am just a man who knows how to feel."

The same sentiment reappears in the first lines of the next song, "Millstone." The band recognizes that they are looked upon as idols of many and has trouble coming to grips with the correct way to handle being "a burning example" (as referred to in the song).

"Jesus Christ" has obvious religious overtones, but one could wonder if Lacey is actually sincere in expressing pious concerns. Especially during the chorus, the vocals contain a pronounced element of sexual mystery and passion.

"Degauasser" reflects a similar sentiment of frustration to that of "Failure by Design" (from 2001's "Your Favorite Weapon"). Although lyrically and musically the band has grown since the release of "YFW," they maintain the same splendid ability to convey frustration and self-destructive dissatisfaction through song. The chorus has background and foreground vocals. The lyrics "I can't shake this tiny feeling/ I'll never say anything right" and "I love you so much that it hurts my head" stick with the listener even after the song ends.

In typical Brand New fashion, the album closes out with a slow, emotion-filled song. "Handcuffs" is genius in that it really displays Brand New's songwriting skills. The whole track features repeating images laced with overtones of bitterness, inflicting pain, struggle and revenge.

Placing a hit at the close of the album is almost a façade to mask that the few songs before it are largely unsatisfying. But "Handcuffs" is a redeeming factor and shows that Brand New has enough songwriting talent to pay the bills and then some. Maybe though, they tried too hard to force a typical epic post-punk rock release when instead they should have stuck to the diversity-song formula that made "Deja Entendu" such a resounding success.

Rapper Jay-Z reclaims his throne

By Gerrick Lewis
The Lantern (Ohio State U.)

COLUMBUS, Ohio — Since announcing his retirement in 2003, Jay-Z hasn't slowed down. He did a joint album and tour with R. Kelly that ended sour. He collaborated with Linkin Park on the successful mash-up, "Collision Course." He squashed his beef with longtime rival Nas in the epic "I Declare War" concert. He collaborated with Beyonce, both on her second solo album and on the final Destiny's Child album. Not to mention he became the CEO of Def Jam Records.

It should be no surprise he boasts, "I am the Mike Jordan of recording" in his new single, "Show Me What You Got" off his first album in three years, "Kingdom Come."

"Kingdom Come" shows Jay-Z still commands respect and proves he is worthy of the title MTV gave him on his tenth solo album.

The notable difference in "Kingdom Come" is from his other collaborations. He doesn't feature any other rappers on the disc, but chooses to share the mic with vocalists ranging from Beyonce naturally – to, oddly enough, Coldplay's Chris Martin.

"I see your jealously as you're watching ... it's the life, you're blinded by the action, you need that Hollywood," Beyonce sings over Jay-Z's rhymes. "Hollywood" explains the glitz and glamour and seems to be a look into the relationship between the two superstars. Jay-Z worked with the best as far as producers go, including The Neptunes, Just Blaze, Dr. Dre, Kanye West, Swizz Beatz and Chris Martin.

The resulting collaboration between Jay-Z and Martin, "Beach Chair," is unexpected and a far departure from the rapper's previous works. Jay-Z raps "Life is but a dream to me," while Martin sings with his familiar soothing tone.

Jay-Z addresses the treatment of blacks during Hurricane Katrina on the dark "Minority Report."

Jay-Z said in an interview with MTV he got the inspiration for the title of the CD from the Superman comic that bares the same name, where Superman returns from self-imposed exile to a chaotic and apocalyptic world.

With all of his ventures, including being a part owner of the NBA's New Jersey Nets, owning a club, owning a shoe and fashion line, recently being named GQ's man of the year and being coined the "Greatest MC Of All Time" by MTV, Jay-Z may as well compare himself to Superman.

"Kingdom Come" is rap's Superman stepping out of retirement and facing the rap world, which, lately, is purely gimmick and lacks substance, with songs such as "Walk It Out" and "Money in the Bank" clouding the airwaves.

With this album Jay-Z has not only upped the ante for the rap game but proved he won't be retiring again anytime soon.

Exploding Hearts return with mediocre album, 'Shattered'

By Andrew Dambeck
The Daily Cardinal (U Wisconsin)

MADISON, Wis. — Why is it that it takes a brutal death for some bands or musicians to reach their pinnacle of commercial popularity? Even though the likes of Elvis Presley, Jerry Garcia and Biggie Smalls did their best stuff while living (obviously), why was their deity status solidified only when they kicked the bucket?

Although the Exploding Hearts were nowhere near and probably never will be along the lines of those names, they too gained their prominence in the power-pop genre after the tragic overturn of their van during their 2003 tour supporting their first and final release "Guitar Romantic." Three of the four band members were killed; the fourth (guitarist Jerry Six) received minor injuries and has since then found a home with a similarly leather-clad quartet called Nice Boys.

After the crash, the Exploding Hearts experienced a quaint resurgence around the West Coast largely through message board enthusiasts. In response to this revival, Dirtnap Records released a singles/never released complication called "Shattered" – an album that closes the curtains on a band that left the music scene entirely too soon.

The Exploding Hearts could be best described as the joining of David Bowie's vocals (circa 1972 "Suffragette City" style) with a hodgepodge of misfits to play at a battle-of-the-bands competition at the suburban community center. While "Guitar Romantic" as a whole seemed like it was quickly slopped together, the first half of "Shattered" (primarily unreleased material) effectively breaks through that lackluster cloud of bland, cookie-cutter material. While remaining in the two-and-a-half-minute time frame, the songs "Busy Signals" and "(Making) Teenage Faces" translate the youthful exuberance this band represented while conducting events of vandalism and the universal hate of high school – fun the whole family can enjoy.

After nine new tracks, the folks at Dirtnap Records took the liberty to piece together all of the alternate mixes (many of them already leaked) from "Guitar Romantic" which, to say the least, makes that whole album seem much more noteworthy. The past favorites "I'm a Pretender," "Modern Kicks" and "Thorns in Roses" show a polished sensibility about them in these newer mixes, alluding to a 1970's Buzzcocks-like, Britpop sound.

"Shattered" signifies the closure of a band that was undeniably on the cusp of becoming a genuine force in pop music, if not for their tragedy. Without a single member over the age of 24 and a pending contract with Lookout Records (Green Day's old label), they were only moments away from sparking a new generation of power-pop enthusiasts. Instead of flowing through the radio waves, the Exploding Hearts will remain as a glimpse into true happiness through music all the way up to their demise. There was nothing ever too outwardly flashy about the Exploding Hearts, but they were on the verge of perfecting their craft, and above all, were having the time of their lives doing so.

UMASS PARKING ANNOUNCES
Opening of New Visitor's Parking at Athletic Complex

UMASS Parking Services announces the opening of new visitor's parking adjacent to the Athletic Complex on Stadium Drive. This 275 space lot will provide additional parking for visitors to the campus, as well as parking for athletic events at Rudd Soccer Field, the new field & track and the softball complex. The lot will be serviced by two paystations at a rate of 60¢/hour. The paystations operate on pay-by-space and do not require patrons to return to their vehicles to display a receipt – a common complaint with older paystations. The new paystations offer multiple payment options -- bills, coins, or credit cards.

This lot is serviced by UMASS Transit's Campus Shuttle, Routes 34 & 35, from 7:00 a.m. to 2:30 a.m. five days a week.

Contact Parking Services at 413-545-0065 or http://www.parking.admin.umass.edu for further information.

New 'Prison' movie needs escape plan that sympathy would be easily conjured. Instead, watching him spit in people's coffee and shout up phone booths – not to mention con an innocent man into prison – we're left hating the supposedly tragic protagonist. That's never a good sign.

And Nelson, though his innocence and childish demeanor is awkwardly out of place for most of the film, could be a character easily salvaged if he were just a little bit funny. Arnett brings his trademark smug vanity to the role, but in the absence of perceptive writing, his antics are forced and lame. The lesson here is that though Arnett played one of the funniest characters in recent TV history, his humor is a simply a product of the material at his disposal.

We all know by now of the "Seinfeld" curse, whereby the cast members who played some of the most memorable characters ever could find no success after the show ended. Arnett's empty schtick in both "Prison" and his last effort "RV" indicates that the chances of a similar "Arrested Development" curse are strong. It's possible that in his many upcoming roles, Arnett will find the writing to take his routine back into top form, but for the time being, his failures should help us appreciate even more the genius creation "Arrested Development" really was.

Another penguin flick freezes at top of nation's box offices

By Tarek Karroutly
Daily Toreador (Texas Tech)

LUBBOCK, Texas — Director George Miller ("Mad Max," "Babe: Pig In The City") has delivered something entirely thoughtful and charming with his latest animated epic, "Happy Feet." It's known to some as "March Of The Penguins: The Musical," yet known to millions of moviegoers as one of the most adorable movies ever to freeze itself at the No. 1 slot at the box office.

Now we've all got "Happy Feet."

Surprisingly enough, the story behind this gathering of musically gifted penguins proves to be a place of distress for the peculiar penguin Mumble, whose visible talent lies within his two-stepping webbed feet.

Mumble wants nothing more than to fit in with the rest of the gang, a group whose members choose to classify the younger penguins' potential by their ability to sing, which in Mumble's case is nothing more than a ghastly brittle squeal.

The routine of both every male and female penguin in the community is based upon finding a desired mate. Yet, unbeknownst to us human aliens, these penguins attract their mates by the seductive quality of song, and every penguin alive has a delicate song in his or her heart.

Most of the songs shared throughout the hearts of this community are original re-recordings of famous artists such as The Beatles, The Beach Boys, Earth Wind and Fire, Queen and Stevie Wonder that have been re-orchestrated by composer Jamal-Ski.

Mumble's attempts to fit in land him in several rejected relationships, which leave him alone and in search of new friends. The only penguin in the community offering any sort of affectionate support is a potential love interest named Gloria (Brittany Murphy).

The goings-on in this penguin community closely mimic the narrative of the documentary "March Of The Penguins." It can be described best as a harvest cycle taken in turn between husband and wife to gather food for their newborns. Yet a tragedy has been discovered in this penguin community. Because of huge ice-breaker fishing vessels, there is a shortage of fish. Mumble discovers one of these vessels while escaping the clutches of a hideous sea otter and is then determined to find out who is leading this group.

Robin Williams furnishes his voicing talent to a number of characters, including, most notably, the plump spiritual guru of the Arctic named Lovelace. Lovelace believes he carries unique powers given to him by a special necklace that was placed on his neck by aliens. The "necklace" is actually a plastic soda can holder, which could provide a few hints as to what type of species these aliens might be.

One day this special necklace begins to clasp a little too tightly to Lovelace's neck, which sets Mumble and a group of mini-penguins from another penguin community out on a journey to find these aliens and save Lovelace's life.

We get a little taste of voice-talent nostalgia knowing that the newborn Mumble's voice was created by the likes of E.G. Daily, famous for voicing Tommy on Nickelodeon's "Rugrats." You'll probably recognize her best as Pee-Wee Herman's love interest, Dottie, in "Pee-Wee's Big Adventure."

Yet, Mumble's voice as an adolescent and beyond was provided by the likes of Elijah Wood, whom we all know has mastered the art of playing the exiled-outcast-turned-lovable creature. Other notable characters include Mumble's parents, the notorious double-finned Elvis impersonator named Memphis (Hugh Jackman) and the heavy-breathing, whispery likeness of Marilyn Monroe, Norma Jean (Nicole Kidman).

There's even a reserved place in the film for the masked talent of Hugo Weaving, who provides an Irish dialect voicing an antagonistic elder penguin named Noah. The most surprising voice talent involved is that of the recently departed Crocodile Hunter himself, Steve Irwin, who provides the voice for an Australian sea otter named Key.

Overall, the screenplay, which was written by George Miller, John Collee, Warren Coleman and Judy Morris, is a rather familiar format affiliated with most animated features. Still, there is nothing more pure and enjoyable than the constant adorableness of seeing a group of newborn penguins move their feet to Stevie Wonder's "I Wish."

The early scene of a young Mumble toe-tapping his way across the ice while flapping his fins back and fourth in amusement purely defines the endless ride of action-packed adventure that awaits a melody-loving penguin community in search of endless harmony. In other words, "Happy Feet" is the most adorable movie ever made.

Arctic musical "Happy Feet," the latest animated film by director George Miller, has secured a top place at box offices around the nation due to its adorable characters and vivid IMAX animation.

Belmont pays respect to jazz musician Wes Montgomery

At the Iron Horse in Northampton on Sunday, Joe Belmont and his band played several songs from Wes Montgomery's albums.

were seasoned musicians who loved performing for the crowd that night.

Throughout the show, Belmont told of Montgomery's life and career. He would introduce each song with the story behind it, adding another level to the show. According to his Web site, the show was "the result of a year [Belmont] spent extensively playing along with learning the music on Wes' CDs."

Belmont asked the crowd if they were fans of Charlie Christian, then went on to explain that Montgomery followed his work. He learned guitar on his own and played furiously. Montgomery was finally made famous by his album "The Incredible Jazz Guitar of Wes Montgomery," from which the group played two songs.

Another great moment of the night was the song "No Blues," which Joe said was from the album "Smokin' at the Half note." They also played "Unit 7," another song from that album. Belmont said that song was used as Cannonball Adderley's theme song.

Bruce Steel's sax was a great complement to a couple of the songs that night. He was able to jump right in with the band and use his mellow tone to give the songs a different feel.

Near the end of the set Connells got back on stage and beautifully accompanied the band with the song "Round Midnight." The band then went all out on the tune "Jingles" then told the crowd to have a good night, thanked us for coming out, and got off stage.

After three minutes of yelling and clapping from the crowd, Belmont and the band got back on stage. Belmont asked the sound manager from the stage if they could do an encore. They then played a fast and fun Charlie Parker tune to end the night on a great note.

Overall, the concert was a great event. Check out Belmont's Web site at www.joebelmont.com for future performance information.

UMass sophomore goaltender Jon Quick has posted an impressive 5-1-1 record in 2006. His 1.74 goals-against average ranks second in the Hockey East behind Vermont's Joe Fallon. The No. 14 Minutemen take on Fallon's Catamounts tonight at the Mullins Center.

Near Miss

Goaltender Jon Quick gave the UMass Faithful a scare in the first period of Saturday's contest, when a puck snuck past him and into the crease. Skating to the top of the crease to challenge the oncoming Husky skater, Quick appeared to bobble a hard wrist shot that came at him from his right at the blue line.

Moments later the puck dropped behind him as it slipped through his jersey. Confused after not hearing a whistle, Quick began searching for the puck. He found it behind him creeping toward the goal line.

He reached to stop the puck on the goal line with his stick, turning and diving to the ice. A very early whistle had stopped the play with the puck still slowly sliding, voiding Quick's efforts and keeping the shutout intact for the time being.

Injury List Beginning To Grow

A pair of UMass players missed Saturday's win with injuries, and a third had to be carried off the ice during the game.

Matt Burto, who suffered a horrendous crash into the boards back on Nov. 3 against Providence, has yet to return to action since suffering the head and neck injury.

Sophomore Topher Bevis missed his first game with a shoulder injury, prompting Cahoon to move senior assistant captain Mark Matheson back to defense, where he began his collegiate career.

Freshman Martin Nolet also missed some time on Saturday. He had to be helped off the ice after injuring his shoulder. UConn's B.J. Bayers checked Nolet into the boards behind the net. Nolet then landed awkwardly, hurting his shoulder.

After not immediately getting back to his feet, the UMass trainer went out on the ice and carried him off with the help of one of Nolet's teammates. He returned later in the game and resumed normal duties playing alongside Mike Kostka.

Wildcats use win over Maine as turnaround

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

The New Hampshire Wildcats could very easily look back at their six-goal victory over Maine (8-2-1, 3-2-1 Hockey East) on Nov. 12 as the turning point of the season. There's nothing like putting up eight goals on the former No. 1 ranked team in the nation to boast team morale.

Although No. 8 UNH (7-2-1, 5-1-1 HEA) had a few solid wins in the first few weeks of the season, its inconsistency left many uncertain if it would be one of the conference elites. But fresh off two weekend victories over UMass Lowell (3-5-3, 2-3-2 HEA), there is no doubt that the Wildcats are playing well right now. They are unbeaten in their last six games, with five wins and one tie over that stretch.

Hockey East

On Friday night, UNH defeated the River Hawks, 5-2, on the road. Sophomore forward Jerry Pollastrone posted a four-point game, with two goals and two assists, earning him Co-Player of the Week honors. Junior goaltender Kevin Regan made 16 saves en route to a victory.

UNH's talented first line handled the bulk of the scoring against Lowell on Saturday. Mike Radja and Brett Hemingway each tallied once, while left winger Jacob Micflikier assisted on both goals.

The Wildcats also demonstrated their depth in goal, electing to start freshman Brian Foster. He stopped 26 shots in both his first collegiate start and shutout. The league named Foster its Rookie of the Week for his efforts.

It's generally a good position for a team to be in, having two dependable goalies. However, Foster will have difficulty unseating the established Regan unless he gets more opportunities to prove himself.

With the two Hockey East wins, New Hampshire moved up to first place in the conference with 11 points.

Two-faced Eagles

The challenge for Boston College coach Jerry York is to get his No. 5 Eagles (7-3-1, 4-1-1 HEA) to play two good games in a row. With the exception of the team's weekend sweep of defending national champion Wisconsin (4-8-2) in October, BC has either followed up hard fought wins with bad losses, or vice versa.

On Friday night, the Eagles basically gave away a win to Northeastern (2-7-2, 0-6-2 HEA). Junior goalkeeper Cory Schneider allowed NU senior Mike Morris to find the back of the net with only 2.6 seconds remaining in regulation. Although BC managed to preserve the score in overtime, only earning one point against a team with zero conference wins probably feels like a loss to the players and coaches.

But before the weekend came and went, Boston College more than made up for its blunder the night before. The Eagles defeated Maine, 4-3, in overtime before a sold-out crowd on the road.

Senior forward Joe Rooney scored the two most important BC goals of the game. He tied the score, 3-3, with less than six minutes to play, and tallied the game-winner in the fifth minute of extra time. The HEA named Rooney Co-Player of the Week as a result of his late-game heroics.

Maine Falls to No. 2

After spending a majority of the opening weeks of the season on top of college hockey, the Maine Black Bears relinquished the number one spot to WCHA power Minnesota (10-1-2).

They dropped their last two games, and now have only a mediocre conference record of 3-2-1, good enough for just a share of fifth place. But it's saying something about the depth of Hockey East when the No. 2 ranked in the country is in fifth place in league standings.

The Black Bear's overtime loss to BC on Sunday afternoon snapped their undefeated streak of 115 games when leading after two periods. Maine's most important statistic is its number of power play goals. The Black Bears have scored an astounding 20 goals with the man advantage in 80 opportunities. Their percentage of 25 is best in the conference ... The league named goaltender Joe Fallon of Vermont (5-4-1, 3-1-1 HEA) its Defensive Player of the Week. The junior won two games last week, stopping 36 shots in all ... No. 11 Boston University (3-2-4, 3-2-3 HEA) extended its shutout streak at home to 123 minutes with a 1-0 victory over Providence on Friday ... Ninth place Merrimack (1-9-1, 1-5 HEA) has scored one goal or less in eight of its 11 games this season ... Four freshmen and one senior scored the first goals of their careers this past week in Hockey East play. Defensemen Mark Fayne and David Cavanaugh of Providence (3-8-1, 2-5-1 HEA), forwards Ben Smith of Boston College and Chris Auger of UMass Lowell all began their scoring careers. Not to be outdone by four freshmen, senior defenseman Shawn Vinz of New Hampshire scored his first collegiate goal against UMass Lowell on Saturday evening.

UNH could face UMass in second round

for quite the test, as YSU boasts one of the nation's best ground attacks. The Penguin offense averaged 240.6 rushing yards per game, which was good enough to end the regular season ranked fifth nationally.

"[Youngstown's] offensive statistics speak for themselves," Matthews said. "They're fifth in the nation in rushing offense and they're 94th in passing offense. That all being said, I think their quarterback, when called upon, throws the ball very well and they have some good receivers but they'd prefer to run the ball if they could.

"They really started running the zone option and like to involve their quarterback as a runner," he added.

Senior tailback Martyus Mason led the Penguins with 1,496 yards and 19 touchdowns while only playing in nine of the team's 11 games. Fellow senior tailback Monquantae Gibson ran for 527 yards on his own, adding eight touchdowns.

Junior quarterback Tom Zetts was third on the team with 368 yards and three touchdowns.

The Dukes' offensive production came from a number of sources this season. Their rushing offense finished the season 12th in the nation. Junior tailback Eugene Holloman ran for 1,025 yards and eight scores, while senior tailback Alvin Banks added seven touchdowns of his own.

YSU's rush offense may be one of the nation's best, but its rush defense is anything but spectacular. The unit ended the season tied for 57th in the nation – allowing over 140 yards per game.

The Dukes will need to exploit this in order to be successful and advance to the tournament's next round.

UNH vs. Hampton

The No. 9 New Hampshire Wildcats (8-3, 5-3 A-10) began the season atop the national polls. Three midseason losses later and the Wildcats found themselves on the verge of extinction when they traveled to No. 24 Maine (6-5, 5-3 A-10) for their regular season finale over the weekend.

Freshman running back Chad Kackert's six-yard touchdown run in overtime gave the Wildcats the victory for their eighth win of the season.

Eight wins is the de facto minimum for teams hoping for a place in the field of 16. However, it was by no means a certainty that the Wildcats would get that spot.

So, when the teams were announced and the Wildcats saw themselves in the championship bracket, the entire UNH team breathed a collective sigh of relief.

The Wildcats travel to Virginia to take on the No. 8 Hampton Pirates (10-1).

Many people picked UNH as the preseason favorite, but those three losses force it to play its first game on the road. The Wildcats may get a chance to avenge one of those losses. If it defeats Hampton and UMass defeats Lafayette, UNH will travel to Amherst for a rematch of its Nov. 4 loss to the Minutemen.

The game would be a matchup of a prolific offense against a stingy defense. The Wildcats average 36.45 points per game, which is good enough for third in nation, while Hampton allows just 12.09 points per contest, placing them fourth in the nation.

UNH is led by junior quarterback Ricky Santos. The Wildcat offense led the A-10 with 401 total points.

He threw for 2,681 yards and 23 touchdowns, and opponents intercepted him just five times in 366 attempts. His favorite target was, once again, David Ball. The senior caught 82 passes for 990 yards and 11 touchdowns – all of which were tops in the A-10.

The Wildcat defense, however, will certainly need to pick up its performance. UNH was just 42nd in the country in total defense and 59th in scoring defense, allowing more than 22 points per game.

Hampton boasts one of the nation's best defenses. The Pirates are led by senior linebacker Justin Durant. The Buchanan Award candidate recorded 84 total tackles and 12 tackles for a loss during the regular season.

Allowing just 119.64 yards through the air per contest, Hampton's defense ranks number one against the pass. This may force Santos to use his legs to beat the Pirates, and that very well may be UNH's best chance for a win. Hampton is just 53rd in the country against the run – allowing 139.18 yards per game.

A top-ranked UNH team fell to an unseeded Northern Iowa squad in the quarterfinals of last year's NCAA Tournament. The Wildcats hope that this year, they can be the team pulling the upset.

Senior running back Steve Bavlark and No. 3 UMass host Lafayette on Saturday at McGuirk Stadium in the first round of the playoffs.

UNH sophomore forward Jerry Pollastrone was named the Hockey East Player of the Week on Monday. He had five points over the weekend.

Cubs make bold move in Soriano signing

By Ronald Blum
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Alfonso Soriano is the latest beneficiary of the Chicago Cubs' spending splurge.

Soriano and the Cubs agreed Monday to a $136 million, eight-year contract.

"We're here to win and win quickly," said general manager Jim Hendry, acting aggressively following a 66-96 season.

Over a busy weekend following the annual GM meetings:

First baseman Nomar Garciaparra agreed to an $18.5 million, two-year contract to stay with the Los Angeles Dodgers.

Outfielder Moises Alou and the New York Mets closed in on a one-year contract worth about $8 million to $9 million, a baseball official said on condition of anonymity because the deal had not yet been finalized.

Cincinnati agreed to a $14 million, three-year contract with shortstop Alex Gonzalez and a $5.5 million, two-year deal with left-hander Mike Stanton, then sent catcher Jason LaRue to Kansas City for a player to be named.

Outfielder Frank Catalanotto and Texas reached a preliminary agreement on a $13 million, three-year deal, a Rangers official said.

Right-handed reliever Justin Speier agreed to terms of a four-year contract with the Los Angeles Angels, a deal worth about $18 million and contingent on the 33-year-old passing a physical.

On Monday, the Mets had to inform Tom Glavine whether they will exercise his $14 million option or the team has said it will be declined, allowing the left-hander to choose between New York and a return to the Braves. If he goes to Atlanta, the Mets are likely to try to sign Barry Zito.

Also, the Boston Red Sox are expected to discuss possible trades involving Manny Ramirez, owed $38 million over the final two guaranteed years of his contract. The Angels are a possible trading partner, but Ramirez can't be dealt without his consent.

Soriano, a former second baseman, could play center field and give the Cubs a leadoff hitter with a combination of speed and power. He had 46 homers and 41 stolen bases last season with the Washington Nationals, batting .277 with 95 RBIs and 41 doubles.

"Suffice it to say a contract like that simply doesn't fit in with trying to build a team from where we are," Nationals president Stan Kasten said. "We wish Alfonso well. We have been expecting it, and we're ready to move on."

In total dollars, Soriano would trail only Alex Rodriguez ($252 million for 10 years), Derek Jeter ($189 million for 10 years), Ramirez ($160 million for eight years) and Todd Helton ($141.5 million for 11 years).

After hiring Lou Pinella as its new manager, Chicago re-signed third baseman Aramis Ramirez to a $75 million, five-year deal, added second baseman Mark DeRosa ($13 million over three years), acquired left-hander Neal Cotts from the White Sox and re-signed pitchers Kerry Wood ($1.75 million) and Wade Miller ($1.5 million), and backup catcher Henry Blanco ($5.25 million over two years). All this activity comes as the team's parent company, Tribune Co., is weighing options to sell all or some of its holdings.

"In that ballpark and in that city, they should be very excited," said former White Sox manager Jerry Manuel, currently the New York Mets' bench coach. "Because of the lack of pitching in our industry, if there is a lack in this area you have to load up on the other side – and people are going to load up on offense. He's a tremendous player."

The 33-year-old Garciaparra won the NL comeback player of the year award last season, shifting to first base with the Dodgers. A former shortstop and third baseman, Garciaparra had a .303 batting average and hit 20 homers, matching J.D. Drew for the team lead. He was slowed late in the season by quadriceps and oblique muscle injuries.

Catamounts crawl into Amherst

UMass looks to make it five straight against renewed rival

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

After man-handling Atlantic Hockey's Connecticut, 8-1, on Saturday afternoon, the Massachusetts hockey team returns to Hockey Last play tonight at the Mullins Center.

The Minutemen welcome the Vermont Catamounts to Amherst for the first meeting this season between the two teams. The Catamounts enter the game tonight with a record of 5-4-1 (3-1-1 HEA). The puck is set to drop at 7 p.m.

UMass (6-1-1, 4-1 HEA) used the non-conference game on Saturday to practice its goal celebrations. The Mass Attack jumped out in front of the Huskies, 4-0, before five minutes ticked off the clock in the first period. It added four more goals in the third before it was all said and done.

But UVM is a much different opponent than UConn. Although the Catamounts have a few shaky performances up to this point, they are still one of the better teams in the conference.

"Vermont is a transition team," UMass coach Don Cahoon said after Saturday's game against UConn. "They have good skating speed. They aren't so unlike us in that they have assembled a good power-play unit, they have good transition speed and play good team defense [We] are very evenly matched."

UMass and UVM squared off on the Tuesday before Thanksgiving last season as well. The Minutemen won that game in Burlington, Vt., 2-1. With the score knotted at one apiece deep into the third period, sophomore Chris Davis beat Vermont goaltender Joe Fallon for the game-winner. UVM was the No. 5 team in the country at the time.

The all-time series between the two teams stands at 25-11-4 in favor of the Catamounts. The UMass and UVM rivalry that existed in the middle part of the 20th century picks up again, as the Catamounts are in their second year in HEA.

This year has been a little different for Vermont. It tallied a five-game winless streak early this season where the Catamounts were 0-4-1. Included in the streak was a tie with Northeastern, two losses to Michigan Tech, and a loss each to Boston College and Dartmouth.

A midseason exhibition with Ottawa got the Catamounts back on track. Since winning that game, 5-2, they have reeled off three-straight victories over Providence, Boston University and Merrimack.

UVM currently sits directly in the middle of the conference standings. In fifth place, the Catamounts are looking up at the Minutemen, and down at Maine – despite its standing in the league, the Black Bears are the No. 2 team in the nation.

The conference named Fallon Defensive Player of the Week for his efforts against the Terriers and Warriors. Fallon stopped 36 of the 38 shots he saw in those games. The junior started all but one of the Catamounts games this season. With 193 saves, Fallon has allowed 15 goals this season – a mere 1.66 goals-against average.

The most goals Fallon has allowed this season is four against Michigan Tech on Oct. 20. In that game, Michigan Tech beat him in overtime to win the game.

"Fallon has been a very formidable goaltender," Cahoon said on Saturday. "It will come down to, at the end of the day, how hard each team plays. But beyond that it will be about execution. I flort is always a factor, but execution is every bit a factor, if not more. We can anticipate having to play at a very high level to have success on Tuesday."

Senior Chris Capraro had two goals and three assists in UMass' 8-1 win over UConn on Saturday night. The Minutemen host UVM tonight at 7 p.m.

Minutemen ranked No. 14

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts hockey team's weekend performance made waves throughout hockey nation. The Mass Attack jumped six spots in the national polls after earning its fourth straight win.

UMass is currently No. 14 in both the USA Today/American Hockey Magazine and the USCHO/CSTV polls.

It marks the highest ranking of the season for the Minutemen and the highest since 2004. The Minutemen reached the 14th spot on the USA Today list on Jan. 14 of that year, and on Feb. 2 they were No. 14 on USCHO poll.

UMass Hockey

That year the team reached No. 7 in the nation en route to a Hockey East finals appearance.

UMass was the 20th vote getter in both polls leading into Saturday's matinee scoring spree. The 8-1 margin of victory over regional rival Connecticut was impressive enough to bump the Minutemen up six spots in the polls.

The Minutemen continued their season-long undefeated streak at home, which has now stretched to five games. The team is 4-0-1 at the Mullins Center, with the lone tie coming in the second game of the season against No. 17 Clarkson.

LIGHTING IT UP

The Mass Attack's eight goals were the most in a single game in nearly two years. The Minutemen beat Hockey East foe Merrimack 8-2 on Nov. 5, 2004. It also marks the largest margin of victory during that period.

UMass has developed a penchant for putting up big numbers against its state-line rival. The Minutemen have tallied six or more goals in four of the last five meetings with the Huskies.

The Mass Attack has netted six and eight goals twice, each during that span, including Saturday's win. The only low-scoring affair was a 2-3 overtime loss on Oct. 24, 2004.

PLAYER OF THE WEEK

Sophomore Cory Quirk was named UMass/Dinn Brothers Co-Athlete of the Week for his performance against UConn.

Last year's Co-Rookie of the Year, Quirk and linemates Chris Capraro and Chris Davis seemed nearly unstoppable Saturday, as the trio accounted for six goals and 15 total points.

Quirk earned his first career collegiate hat trick and added two assists while being on the ice for the first seven of UMass' eight goals. He currently leads the team in scoring with 12 points on six goals and six assists.

His linemates, Davis and Capraro, are second and third with eight and six points, respectively.

SOLID BACKUP

Freshman goaltender Dan Meyers saw action for the second time this season, spelling starter Jon Quick with just under 10 minutes to go in the third period.

With the score already 7-1, coach Don Cahoon pulled Quick, who skated off to a standing ovation after making 27 saves on 28 shots. Meyers finished the game with five saves and held the Huskies to a single goal.

Meyers is now 1-0 on the season after winning his only start, the season opener against Sacred Heart. He holds a 1.72 goals-against average, making 23 saves on 25 shots for a .920 save percentage.

Koepplin and Burris lead UM

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Massachusetts football team had trouble finishing its drives on Saturday, and that's where Chris Koepplin stepped in.

UMass' junior kicker converted three field goals on the day to give the Minutemen some much needed points in their 22-16 win over Hofstra. He converted attempts from 34, 19 and 31 yards.

Koepplin now has 13 field goals in his career at UMass – all of them coming this season. Both rank him in the Top 10 in two different UMass records. The 13 is good for third-most in a season, and seventh most in a career.

UMass Football

Several of UMass' drives stalled, forcing UMass coach Don Brown to call on Koepplin to put some points on the board. Koepplin's three field goals came at the tail end of drives consisting of 10, six and eight plays.

He kicked his 19-yarder with no time remaining on the clock in the first half. Quarterback Liam Coen and company began the drive at the 50-yard line with 55 ticks remaining in the quarter. Three completed passes, an eight-yard Steve Baylark run and a pass interference call on Hofstra put the ball on the Pride's 2-yard line.

With four seconds left on the clock, the field-goal unit trotted onto the field. Koepplin easily kicked it through the uprights for the 19-6 halftime lead.

The Atlantic 10 named him the Special Teams Player of the Week for his performance.

ABSENCE DOESN'T DECREASE PRESSURE

UMass was without starting defensive end John Hatchell against the Pride. As part of the Senior Day festivities before the game, Hatchell limped out to the 50-yard line wearing only his game jersey and black wind pants.

Hatchell is a big reason the Minutemen allow just 96.4 rushing yards per game. He has 28 tackles on the season, including six for a loss. But the UMass defense didn't let the loss of its strongest player be bench presses over 500 pounds get the best of it. David Burris stepped up his play in the absence of Hatchell.

Burris who usually plays opposite Hatchell turned in a stellar performance against Hofstra. He recorded eight tackles on the day, good for third on the team, including 4.5 for a loss. Burris reached Pride quarterback Anton Clarkson 2.5 times for a loss of 11 yards.

UMass junior placekicker Chris Koepplin was named the Atlantic 10 Special Teams Co-Player of the Week on Monday.

Darnel DeLaire filled in for the injured Hatchell and recorded two tackles on the afternoon, including a half-sack.

Clarkson was on his back for the majority of the third quarter. Brown called for a lot of pressure on the Pride veteran. Senior safety James Ihedigbo knocked Clarkson down a few times, some of which didn't appear the quarterback would get up from.

Hofstra finished in the red for rushing yards Saturday. The Minutemen pushed the Pride back for a total of -1 yards on the ground. It stands as the lowest total UMass allowed since it held Albany to -7 yards a season ago.

After the game, Brown didn't say when he expects Hatchell to return, only that he hopes it's in time for Saturday's first-round playoff game against Lafayette.

PLAYING OUT OF CHARACTER

The usually sure-handed Baylark fumbled twice on Saturday. One came in the red zone midway through the first quarter, which Hofstra recovered at its own 4-yard line. The other bounced out of bounds in the second quarter.

Baylark's first miscue stalled a UMass drive that started back at its 37-yard line. After a Coen pass to running back Matt Lawrence gave the Minutemen 1st-and-goal at the 4-yard line, the Minutemen gave the ball to Baylark to pound into the end zone. Except this time Hofstra's Gian Villante knocked the ball out and it was recovered by DeWayne Whitaker.

But the defense had Baylark's back. Four plays later the Maroon and White forced a turnover of its own. Jason Hatchell stripped Charles Sullivan of the ball and recovered the fumble himself. Coen completed a 22-yard touchdown pass to J.J. Moore on the very next play.

The fumbles didn't take away from Baylark's performance on the afternoon. He ended with 125 yards on 21 carries.

Baylark finished the regular season with 1,308 rushing yards and 4,680 for his career. He moved past Rene Ingoglia into second all-time for the Minutemen.

His 2,163-yard performance for Coen pushed his season total to 2,179 yards. That number is good for the fifth-most in a season by a UMass quarterback ... The win was the Minutemen's ninth in a row, the longest such streak in UMass history ... The win over Hofstra also capped an undefeated conference season for UMass. No A-10 team ran the table in the conference since Villanova accomplished the feat in 1997.

Junior defensive lineman David Burris led the Minutemen with 2.5 sacks for a loss of 11 yards in Saturday's 22-16 win over Hofstra.

Playoff matchups set after selection show

BY JON MELONI

Massachusetts football coach Don Brown was not the only Atlantic 10 coach tuned into the Division I-AA College Football selection show Sunday afternoon.

Mickey Matthews and the No. 6 James Madison Dukes (9-2, 7-1 A-10) impressed the selection committee enough to warrant a bid to the NCAA Tournament – they'll travel to Ohio for a showdown with the fourth-seeded Youngstown State Penguins (9-2). The Penguins occupy the four spot in the Sports Network I-AA College Football Poll, as well as receiving the tournament's No. 4 seed.

A-10 Football

The Penguins play in the Gateway Football Conference. The A-10 historically sees these teams very rarely, so Matthews and his staff will spend the next week working around the clock to construct a game plan for their first-round matchup.

"We do not play the Gateway Conference in out-of-conference play," Matthews said. "I think Maine has played Youngstown early, so we'll review that tape to try to get a feel for their personnel. But that's the great thing about the playoffs; you never know how you match up against a team because there aren't many common opponents."

Youngstown State played Maine on Sept. 9 and defeated the Black Bears 34-14. The Penguins were one of two teams to score more than 20 points against Maine – the other was Boston College.

The Dukes led the A-10 in scoring offense with 36.1 points per game and ranked third in scoring defense, yielding 16.9 points per match – only Maine (9.5) and UMass (11.1) held opponents to fewer points per contest.

JMU's fourth-ranked rush defense is led by senior linebacker Akeem Jordan – the unit held opponents to just 84 yards per game. The Buchanan Award finalist will need to prepare

Consumer group alerts shoppers of toy hazards

MASSPIRG highlights hazards posed by magnets

Jessica McGowan-Vanderbeck, Campus Organizer with MASSPIRG, holds a toy gun. A recent study conducted by MASSPIRG warned consumers of the dangers in certain types of children's toys.

Hazardous toys are still sold in stores across the country, according to the 21st annual toy safety survey released today by the Massachusetts Public Interest Research Group (MASSPIRG).

"While we can report substantial progress after more than two decades of advocacy on behalf of America's littlest consumers, MASSPIRG still found trouble in toyland," said Jessica McGowan-Vanderbeck, Campus Organizer with MASSPIRG.

According to the Consumer Product Safety Commission (CPSC), 73,000 children under the age of five were treated in emergency rooms for toy-related injuries in 2004. Sixteen children died from toy related injuries that same year.

"Even one toy-related death is too many, because these deaths are preventable," continued McGowan-Vanderbeck.

The 21st annual MASSPIRG Trouble in Toyland report offers safety guidelines for purchasing toys for small children and provides examples of toys currently on store shelves that pose potential safety hazards. MASSPIRG's research focused on several categories of toy dangers: toys that pose choking hazards, toys with powerful magnets, toys that contain lead, and toys that contain toxic chemicals.

In 1979, the CPSC banned the sale of toys for children under three if they contain small parts. The 1994 Child Safety Protection Act mandated an explicit choke hazard warning on toys with small parts for children between three and six.

MASSPIRG researchers found toys for children under three with small parts and toys with small parts for children under six without the required choke hazard warning.

Children continue to choke on toys that meet the letter of the law. In September, Playskool recalled the Team Talkin' Tool Bench after two children suffocated when the toy's oversized plastic nails became lodged in their throats. MASSPIRG found several toys on store shelves that are shaped like corks or these toy nails that could pose similar suffocation hazards.

"Toddlers put everything in their mouths," said McGowan-Vanderbeck. "CPSC should make the small parts test more protective of children under three and consider warning labels for toys shaped like corks or the toy nails that caused two children to suffocate."

Yogurt may help manage diabetes

BY MEGHAN MURPHY

UMass researcher Kalidas Shetty.

Yogurts that contain fruit or soy could help control Type 2 Diabetes and high blood pressure, scientists at the University of Massachusetts announced Wednesday.

Researcher Kalidas Shetty, who worked with doctoral students Emmanouil Apostolidis and Young-In Kwon in the study, said that blueberry and soy-enriched yogurts had the greatest effect on diabetes management, while peach and strawberry yogurts also yielded some positive results.

The researchers targeted the early stages of diabetes in an attempt to slow the breakdown of sugar and its absorption into the intestine.

They studied the effects of different types of yogurt on inhibition of enzymes involved in the breakdown of sugar, which then "slow[s] the pathway towards Type 2 Diabetes," said Shetty. This allows more time for insulin, a hormone that carries sugar into cells, to act.

Certain dietary factors may be able to "moderate the wear and tear of insulin receptors," possibly slowing the development of the disease, he said.

Shetty said that based on clinical studies, there may be a possibility that eating yogurt could help reduce the need for medication and adverse side effects that go along with it for patients with early stages of Type 2 Diabetes.

"[A] balanced diet can definitely contribute to longevity and quality of life with less disease," said Shetty. "Surely, this will be preventative for chronic diseases and [patients] will need less medication.

"Over time, we have to collect the data on long-term effects [of yogurt on Diabetes]."

He also outlined further benefits of yogurt such as probiotics, or "good bacteria," and antioxidants that "can provide overall protection to cells."

Doctors say how we taste affects health

BY LAUREN NEERGAARD
ASSOCIATED PRESS

A Rutgers University food science graduate student demonstrates a taste test in New Brunswick, N.J. Doctors say how we taste food seems to affect our health and our Thanksgiving menu.

WASHINGTON—Woe to those who have a cold on Thursday. If you can't smell the roasting turkey, it just won't taste as good. And if you think the brussels sprouts are bitter, well, blame how many taste buds you were born with, not the chef.

But never fear: Even after you're pleasantly stuffed from second helpings, there's a little spot deep in your brain that still gives a "Wow" for pumpkin pie.

How we taste is pretty complicated, an interaction of the tongue, the nose, psychological cues and exposure to different foods.

But ultimately, we taste with our brains.

"Why do we learn to like foods? When they're paired with something our brains are programmed to see as good," says Dr. Linda Bartoshuk of the University of Florida, a specialist in the genetics of human taste.

Sorry, brains are programmed to want fat, probably an evolutionary hangover from times of scarcity. But what's necessary for survival isn't all the brain likes. University of Michigan researchers just uncovered that eating something tasty can spark brain cells that sense actual pleasure to start firing rapidly.

More provocative, how intensely people sense different flavors seems to affect how healthy they are.

Are you among the "supertasters," people who shun vegetables because they find them more bitter than the average person does? Supertasters may be more at risk of developing colon cancer as a result, says a recent University of Connecticut study.

It's research that sheds light on more than how we eat at food-rich holidays like Thanksgiving. If scientists can prove those connections, it would be empowering information for people struggling to eat better year-round.

"People pile a lot of guilt on themselves," says Connecticut's Dr. Valerie Duffy, who is leading research into the links between inborn "preference palates" and health.

"We know oral sensation varies," she adds. "Instead of making one dietary recommendation for all, can we individualize it for what people like to eat?"

One in four people is what scientists call a supertaster, born with extra taste buds. "They live in a neon taste world," as Bartoshuk puts it.

They find some vegetables horribly bitter, and hate the texture. They get more burn from chili peppers, and perceive more sweetness than other people. Nor do they care for fat. They tend to be skinny because they're such picky eaters.

Scientists came up with the name because these people give an extreme "Yuck!" when given a certain bitter

Sister says young bride was scared

BY JENNIFER DOBNER

ST. GEORGE, Utah—A 14-year-old girl cried and was clearly troubled in the weeks preceding an arranged marriage to an older cousin, her sister testified Tuesday at a hearing involving the leader of a polygamist sect.

"She was 14," said Rebecca Musser, whose sister has a different last name. "It was just shocking and horrific.... She didn't want to get married."

Warren Jeffs, leader of the Fundamentalist Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, is charged with rape as an accomplice for his alleged role in forcing the girl to marry her 19-year-old first cousin in 2001. Musser was the first witness at a hearing to determine if there is enough evidence to send Jeffs to trial.

Looking gaunt in a dark gray suit, Jeffs, 50, sat nearly motionless for the first few hours. He smiled at family and fellow church members in the audience.

Musser is a former member of Jeffs' church who was married to his late father. She recalled Jeffs telling her to counsel her teenage sister after the wedding at a Nevada motel.

"You need to encourage her to be happy. God has put this marriage together. You need to encourage her to be submissive and obedient," Jeffs said, according to Musser.

At the time, Utah and Arizona were cracking down on marriages involving minors. She said Jeffs warned her that "this marriage could cause us some problems."

In court documents, prosecutors say the bride, identified as Jane Doe No. 4, objected to the marriage and later begged to be released. The Associated Press does not identify victims of sexual assault.

The church arranges marriages for young girls and believes plural marriage ensures exaltation in heaven. Jeffs assumed leadership in 2002 after the death of his father. Followers revere him as a prophet who communicates with God.

Births out of wedlock on the rise

BY MIKE STOBBE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

ATLANTA—Out-of-wedlock births in the United States have climbed to an all-time high, accounting for nearly four in 10 babies born last year, government health officials said Tuesday.

While out-of-wedlock births have long been associated with teen mothers, the teen birth rate actually dropped last year to the lowest level on record. Instead, births among unwed mothers rose most dramatically among women in their 20s.

Experts said the overall rise reflects the burgeoning number of people who are putting off marriage or living together without getting married. They said it also reflects the fact that having a child out of wedlock is more acceptable nowadays and not necessarily the source of shame it once was.

The increase in births to unwed mothers was seen in all racial groups, but rose most sharply among Hispanics. It was up among all age groups except youngsters ages 10 to 17.

"A lot of people think of teenagers and unmarried mothers synonymously, but they are not driving this," said Stephanie Ventura of the National Center for Health Statistics, a co-author of the report.

The government also reported that the rate of births by Caesarean delivery continued to climb in 2005 to a record high, despite efforts by public health authorities to bring down the number.

Many experts believe a large number of C-sections are medically unnecessary and done only for the convenience of the mother or her doctor.

The government report includes information from 99 percent of U.S. birth certificates filed last year. The information for 2005 is considered preliminary, but officials said it is not expected to change much.

About 4.1 million babies were born in the United States last year, up slightly from 2004. More than 1.5 million of those were to unmarried women; that is about 37 percent of the total. In 2004, about 36 percent of births were out of wedlock.

Several factors may be contributing to the trend, said Dr. Yolanda Wimberly, an adolescent-medicine specialist at Atlanta's Morehouse School of Medicine.

More women in their 30s and 40s, bearing their biological clock, are choosing to give birth despite their single status. Younger women are not as worried about being unmarried, either, she added.

"I think it's more acceptable in society" to have a child without getting married, she said.

Just because a mother is not married does not mean the father isn't around, Ventura noted. She cited 2002 statistics that showed that about 20 percent of all new mothers under 20 were unmarried but living with the father at the time of the birth. That same was true of about 13 percent of all new mothers ages 20 to 24.

According to census figures, the median age at first marriage was 27 for men and 25 for women last year, up from 23 and 20 in 1950. Meanwhile, the number of unmarried-couple households with children has been climbing, hitting more than 1.7 million last year, up from under 200,000 in 1970.

The birth rate among teenagers declined 2 percent in 2005, continuing a trend from the early 1990s. The rate is now about 40 births per 1,000 females ages 15 to 19. That is the lowest level in the 65 years for which a consistent series of rates is available.

The U.S. teen birth rate is still the highest among industrialized countries.

Births to women in their early 20s rose slightly, to 102 births per 1,000 women ages 20 to 24. Births to women in their late 20s — the most productive group in terms of childbirth — was about the same from the previous year, at about 116 per 1,000 women ages 25 to 29.

The C-section rate rose to 30.2 percent of all births in 2005, an increase of 1 percentage point from the previous year. The rate has risen by nearly half since 1996.

O.J. Simpson book, TV special canceled by News Corp.

BY HILLEL ITALIE
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK—O.J. Simpson's book and TV special were canceled Monday, an astonishing end to an imaginary confession that had sickened the public as the very worst kind of tabloid sensation.

"I and senior management agree with the American public that this was an ill-considered project," said Rupert Murdoch, whose News Corp. owns both Fox Broadcasting and publisher HarperCollins. "We are sorry for any pain that this has caused the families of Ron Goldman and Nicole Brown Simpson."

"If I Did It," in which Simpson was to have described how he would have killed his ex-wife, had been scheduled to air as a two-part interview Nov. 27 and Nov. 29 on Fox. The book was to have followed on Nov. 30.

HarperCollins spokeswoman Erin Crum said some copies had already been shipped to stores but would be recalled, and all copies would be destroyed.

"I think News Corp. finally stepped up, admitted they made a mistake and did the right thing," said Jonathan Polak, the lawyer for Fred Goldman, Ron's father. "This is everything we have been asking News Corp. to do for the past two weeks. We want to thank the American people for helping make this happen."

Denise Brown, sister of the late Nicole Brown Simpson, holds a news conference at Temple University in Philadelphia, Sept. 21, 1995.

Simpson's attorney, Yale Galanter, told The Associated Press: "We had known for three or four days that this was a possibility."

Galanter said he did not know whether the deal between Simpson and News Corp. was contingent on a TV interview being shown or a book arriving in stores.

"There are only three possible reactions: anger, happiness or indifference. He's totally indifferent about the fact that it's been canceled," said Galanter, who added that he didn't know if Simpson was paid upfront.

Simpson told The Associated Press in a phone interview late Monday he could not comment on the situation "until I know legally where I stand."

He added, "I would like nothing better than to straighten out some things that have been mischaracterized. But I

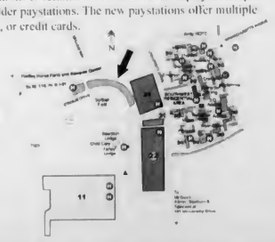
UMASS PARKING ANNOUNCES
Opening of New Visitor's Parking at Athletic Complex

UMASS Parking Services announces the opening of new visitor's parking adjacent to the Athletic Complex on Stadium Drive. This 275 space lot will provide additional parking for visitors to the campus, as well as parking for athletic events at Rudd Soccer Field, the new field & track and the softball complex. The lot will be serviced by two paystations at a rate of 60¢/hour. The paystations operate on pay-by-space and do not require patrons to return to their vehicles to display a receipt — a common complaint with older paystations. The new paystations offer multiple payment options -- bills, coins, or credit cards.

This lot is serviced by UMASS Transit's Campus Shuttle, Routes 34 & 35, from 7:00 a.m. to 2:30 a.m. five days a week.



Contact Parking Services at 413-545-0665 or http://www.parking.admin.umass.edu for further information.

Study finds perks in eating yogurt

Since Type 1 Diabetes is genetically influenced, dietary solutions such as yogurt consumption would only affect people with Type 2, who make up 90 percent of all Diabetes patients, he explained.

"Soy-fruit yogurt is promising and must be pursued further and integrated as part of overall Diabetes solutions," said Shetty. "It may not be a magic bullet for all forms of Type 2 Diabetes, and never for Type 1 Diabetes, which is largely genetic and where insulin-making cells are not functional."

For now, the researchers' goals center around designing the right yogurt to fit this purpose, he said, pointing out that not all types will work because many are "loaded with sugar."

He said that research suggests that eating the right types of yogurt could even help to prevent Diabetes in some people in the future.

"Our goal is [to prevent] disease, and since Diabetes is largely a diet-related disease, diet can be the best countermeasure for prevention," said Shetty.

"From this study, better diet designs can be part of a range of treatments depending on the stage of the Diabetes and the genetic predisposition of the patient.

"Our goal is to develop the best diet design for this essential goal before one gets too sick and needs more expensive medical care."

Type 2 Diabetes is growing due to higher rates of obesity, he said, adding that there are 1.3 billion obese people in the world today as opposed to .8 billion undernourished people.

20.8 million people in the United States have Diabetes, according to the National Diabetes Information Clearinghouse. Complications of the disease can include heart disease, kidney disease, stroke, blindness and limb amputations.

MASSPIRG finds dangers in toys

Toymakers have started using powerful magnets in building toys and magnetic jewelry. If a child swallows more than one magnet, they can attract each other in the body and cause a bowel obstruction or life-threatening perforation. A little boy died last Thanksgiving and many others have had life-saving surgery after swallowing magnets from MEGA Brands' Magnetix toys.

"Swallowing a magnet is not like swallowing a penny. Powerful magnets can wreak havoc inside the body," cautioned McGowan-Vanderbeck.

MEGA Brands has modified the design of Magnetix and placed a label on the toy's packaging warning parents about the dangers of magnets. MASSPIRG called on CPSC to require a warning label on all magnetic toys that tells parents to seek immediate medical attention if a child swallows magnets.

Children exposed to lead can suffer delayed mental and physical development or even death. In February, a four year old died of lead poisoning after he swallowed a bracelet charm that contained 99% lead. MASSPIRG researchers went to just a few stores and easily found four items of children's jewelry that contain high levels of lead, ranging from 1.8 percent lead to 34 percent lead by weight.

"We've known for decades that lead poses serious health risks to children, so it is unacceptable that consumers can still find lead-laden children's jewelry on store shelves," continued McGowan-Vanderbeck.

MASSPIRG called on CPSC to enact and enforce mandatory requirements for jewelry manufacturers, retailers, and suppliers to ensure their products do not contain lead.

Prolonged exposure to sounds at 85 decibels or higher can result in hearing damage, which can slow a child's language development. ASTM International set 90 decibels as the voluntary standard for most noise-making toys in 2003. MASSPIRG researchers still found several toys that produce sounds at more than 90 or even 100 decibels.

"Loud toys are more than just annoying to parents—they can hurt a child's hearing," said Jessica McGowan-Vanderbeck. "Manufacturers can make toys a little quieter without sacrificing play value," added McGowan-Vanderbeck.

Phthalates, a class of chemicals used to soften plastic toys and teethers, have been linked to a range of health effects, including reproductive defects and early onset puberty. Some manufacturers have started labeling their products as "phthalate-free." MASSPIRG commissioned an independent laboratory to test 10 children's toys and childcare articles with this label. Two of these products tested positive for phthalates.

MASSPIRG urged the Federal Trade Commission to investigate manufacturers that may be misleading consumers with the "phthalate-free" label and renewed its call for the CPSC to ban phthalates in all products intended for children under age five.

"Children's products simply should not contain toxic chemicals," said Liz Cole, Director of Dolphin Daycare in Northampton.

Clare Higgins, the Mayor of Northampton, reiterated the importance of parental monitoring of toys, and advised consumers that this is the first line of defense against toy hazards.

McGowan-Vanderbeck reminded parents that the toy list in the MASSPIRG report is only a sampling of the potential hazards on store shelves.

"Shoppers should examine all toys carefully for hidden dangers before they make a purchase this holiday season," she added.

MASSPIRG is a statewide nonprofit, nonpartisan public interest organization dedicated to environmental protection, consumer rights, and good government. The full report is available at www.masspirg.org.

Health affects Thanksgiving menu

chemical widely used in taste research — a chemical that certain other people, dubbed nontasters, can't even detect.

Those nontasters make up another quarter of the population. They like veggies, but unfortunately prefer heart-clogging fat, too, along with sweets and alcohol. Everybody else falls somewhere in-between.

The good news: You can train your taste buds. The variety of foods you ate as a child, and the emotional connections to certain foods, are more important than biology in determining food preferences, Bartoshuk says.

You may trick taste buds, too.

Consider: Duffy thinks many supertasters generalize, thinking they don't like most vegetables just because broccoli made them pucker. She calls Thanksgiving a great day for supertasters to try to expand their horizons because the traditional menu is heavy on sweetened vegetables — and sugar trumps bitterness.

Pair a bite of sweet potatoes with the broccoli, and veggie-haters might find the greenery tastes OK after all, she suggests. Or try caramelizing the leeks. And remember, taste dulls with age — so the Brussels sprouts you hated at 20, you may like at 50.

But taste starts before a food actually touches the tongue. Even more important than sniffing its aroma is chewing, which releases vapors up the back of the nose. You think you're tasting a flavor that really you're unconsciously smelling. It's called retronasal olfaction, and it sends flavor information along a different, more sensitive brain pathway than traditional sniffing does.

The brain, meanwhile, is busy trying to regulate competing signals from stomach hormones that say "I'm full" with the yum factor.

Michigan researchers recently implanted electrodes into the brains of rats to track a pleasure-sensing region called the ventral pallidum. That region's cells fired in a frenzy when the rats ate a flavor, sweet or salt, that they craved, but slowly stopped as the rats got tired of eating the same old thing.

People have the same brain region, and Michigan psychologist Kent Berridge predicts it'll be in full swing at Thanksgiving dinner.

think I'm legally muzzled at this point."

Any hopes of commercial reward were quickly overwhelmed by near universal revulsion to last week's announcement — from those who knew Goldman and Brown, from booksellers and advertisers, even from Fox News Channel personality Bill O'Reilly.

A dozen Fox network affiliates had already said they would not air the two-part sweeps month special, and numerous stores had either declined to sell the book or had promised to donate any profits to charity.

"I really don't think there would have been very many advertisers who would have been willing to participate in this show," said Brad Adgate of the ad buying firm Horizon Media.

With little advertising, Fox would miss the chance to profit from the show. If there were no advertisers, the show wouldn't even be rated by Nielsen Media Research — so the number of people watching would have done nothing to help Fox's season average, he said.

The cancellation was a stunning setback for ReganBooks, an imprint of HarperCollins — and Judith Regan, who had labeled the book and interview Simpson's "confession." She insisted that she had done it not for money, but as a victim of domestic violence anxious to face down a man she believed got away, literally, with murder.

ReganBooks is known for gossipy best-sellers such as Jose Canseco's "Juiced" and Jenna Jameson's "How to Make Love Like a Porn Star."

The Simpson interview also was a low for Fox, which has long tested viewers with risky reality programming dating back to "When Animals Attack."

O'Reilly had urged a boycott of any company that advertised on the special.

Simpson was acquitted in 1995 of murder in a case that became its own TV drama. The former football star, announcer and actor was later found liable for the deaths in a wrongful-death lawsuit filed by the Goldman family.

The TV special was to air on two of the final three nights of the November sweeps, when ratings are watched closely to set local advertising rates. It has been a particularly tough fall for Fox, which has seen none of its new shows catch on and is waiting for the January bows of "American Idol" and "24."

The closest precedent for such an about-face came when CBS yanked a miniseries about Ronald Reagan from its schedule in 2003 when complaints were raised about its accuracy. It was seen on CBS' sister premium-cable channel, Showtime, instead.

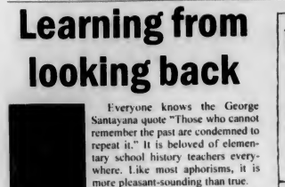
EDITORIAL OPINION

Learning from looking back



Andrew Freeman

Everyone knows the George Santayana quote "Those who cannot remember the past are condemned to repeat it." It is beloved of elementary school history teachers everywhere. Like most aphorisms, it is more pleasant-sounding than true.

History is complex, convoluted and contentious. One can find parallels and echoes across time and space. But to say categorically that history repeats itself is to blind oneself to the immense differences that separate one situation from another. The quest for historical insight is fraught with danger, and the perceived lessons of history often have no relevance to the present.

I've been thinking about the lessons of history since reading about Bush's visit to Vietnam for an international trade meeting. It marks his first appearance there. During the Vietnam War, Bush joined the Air National Guard, thereby avoiding service overseas, and he did not even complete this minimal commitment.

Despite his lack of personal experience, our president spoke on the relevance of the Vietnam War. He noted the tendency to want "instant success," and stressed that "it's going to take a long time" to conquer "an ideology of hate." With this proviso, Bush declared "we'll succeed unless we quit."

The conception that this country quit on South Vietnam is a popular one for some people. To a certain extent it is true – after over a decade of U.S. intervention in the region, American soldiers were removed in 1973, and South Vietnam collapsed in 1975. If our troops had remained, the status quo could well have been preserved for years.

The reason for the United States' withdrawal from Vietnam was the failure of the war effort. Neither President Nixon's massive bombing campaigns of Communist North Vietnam, nor his expansion of the war into neighboring Cambodia, were able to break the will of the Communists.

The South Vietnamese government failed to achieve lasting legitimacy in the eyes of its citizens, perhaps because it came to be characterized by dictatorship and frequent coups. The goal of a self-sufficient South Vietnam, safe from Communism, was not being achieved, and there was no indication that it ever would be.

If one were to draw lessons from the conflict in Vietnam, the importance of staying the course and the inevitability of American victory are not among them.

If one were to draw lessons from the conflict in Vietnam, the importance of staying the course and the inevitability of American victory are not among them. U.S. involvement lasted 20 years, and our troops were there for over a decade; the Communist takeover happened regardless once we left.

The war in Vietnam did not stem from ignorance of history. Its architects were acting on the perceived lessons of World War II: that the U.S. should confront anti-democratic movements, like Fascism, rather than ignore or try to appease them. Thus leaders in the United States sought to contain Communism, lest it threaten them as the Nazis did, and they saw Vietnam as just one more battlefield in this global war. That these concepts might not apply to Vietnam did not occur to them.

Johnson, Nixon and all the others involved in the war remembered the past. They were determined not to repeat its mistakes. They made different ones. Their interpretation of history blinded them to the realities of the present, because it was based on ideology.

Similarly, Bush, Cheney and Rumsfeld remember the past. The war in Iraq was waged with the belief that deposing Saddam Hussein would spark a democratic revolution across the Middle East, akin to Eastern Europe after the collapse of the Soviet Union. In an April 2005 speech to soldiers, Bush explicitly linked the two events: "The toppling of Saddam Hussein's statue in Baghdad will be recorded, alongside the fall of the Berlin Wall, as one of the great moments in the history of liberty."

Knowledge of history does not prevent political mistakes. Moreover, even with detailed knowledge of a nation's past, one can still be ignorant of its present, and completely misjudge the situation there. The conflicts in Vietnam and Iraq have many differences, but they were both born out of ideology – beliefs that obscured both the present and the past.

The whole concept of the lessons of history should be reexamined. No one ever speaks about the lessons of art or the lessons of poetry, yet we seem to assume that there are discreet lessons of history. The course of the future is extremely unpredictable. At the height of the war, how many Americans or Vietnamese would have predicted that in 30 years their countries' leaders would be discussing trade?

If history has any lesson, it is that we cannot foresee the consequences of our actions and must tread carefully, while remaining aware of both the past and the present.

A different kind of celebration

Hinlan Wong

Oh Thanksgiving, such a wonderful time of year. The beginning of the holiday season leading up to New Years Day, with stuffing, mashed potatoes, corn, a big old turkey and those things you can never find at a restaurant or dining commons. Of the 20 out of my 21 years of life, I have never had a great big turkey. In fact, turkey was never a favorite meat of mine until recently.

One year though, somewhere in grammar school, between realizing "Sesame Street" was not an actual street and beginning to think that Santa Claus might not be real, I convinced my entire family to have a Western-style Thanksgiving dinner.

It was a complete disaster. Well, at the time I imagined it was a complete disaster. My mother and father are both extremely versed in Chinese/East Asian culinary delights, and Thanksgiving dinner was not like anything I expected.

From what I remember, my mother, while making the stuffing, mixed in Bok Choy and Soy Sauce.

On that Thanksgiving I cried because it was nothing like I had imagined. It was a nightmare. Nothing tasted or felt like anything I saw on television or what my friends had told me in school.

From what I remember, my mother, while making the stuffing, mixed in Bok Choy and Soy Sauce. My father can make a tasty roasted duck like the ones found in Chinatown. But when it came to carve his turkey, we just had to throw it out. The American dishes my folks cooked that day caused more frustration and anger in my family, thus ruining such a festive holiday.

How could I blame my parents for messing up Thanksgiving, especially my father? He had come to America at the height of the Cultural Revolution, escaping from planting rice at a prison labor camp. He and two of his eight siblings fled Mainland China, swimming hours in the ocean to meet a fishing boat to take them to the former British territory of Hong Kong.

From there, with a small suitcase he still keeps in the closet that could only fit a week's worth of clothing, he moved to the United States and gained his citizenship.

My father has a lot to be thankful for. What would have happened if he had been caught escaping from the labor camp, or while swimming in the middle of the ocean with my aunt and uncle? What if the fisherman decided to cut and run, and had left them to drown in the cold, harsh South China seas?

My father gambled with his life multiple times, similar to the people who landed on Plymouth Rock. I am thankful my father came out of the Peoples Republic of China at a low point in its history compared to now.

On Thanksgiving, food is always important. Martha Stewart even devoted two weeks of her television show to making the perfect turkey or mashing the potatoes just right.

But does it really matter if instead of turkey we have lobster sautéed in ginger and scallions and roasted duck? If stuffing becomes white rice, and mashed potatoes are replaced with stir-fried Chinese greens?

I am sure I am not the only one who celebrates Thanksgiving differently, not the stereotypical stuff you see on television at least. My family and I are sure other foreign families have tried and failed to have a traditional American Thanksgiving. You are not alone, and I proudly celebrate Thanksgiving differently from everyone else.

This year I've convinced my entire family to celebrate Thanksgiving outside of our home, and try to loosely re-enact the Pilgrims breaking bread with the Native Americans. We'll be traveling over to Foxwoods and Mohegan Sun to play some slot machines and Black Jack.

Where we celebrate Thanksgiving is not important. What's important is being around people you love. So, while I'm hoping to beat the dealer, I know my family will be behind me cheering me on or with me at the tables hoping to win. Now that's what I call a great Thanksgiving.

'They had best learn to compromise'

John Gruenenfelder

Last week in a New York Times column John Tierney wrote about the forthcoming "do nothing" Congress. The idea is both Congress and public opinion are so nearly split on most issues that we won't see any real progress for the next couple of years. There is most certainly some truth to this, but the optimist in me wants to hope that the Democrats will do a better job. After six years of a "do whatever the President wants" Congress, could they really do any worse? With the public so evenly split on many issues, shouldn't the rational response be a bipartisan Congress?

Because the country is so closely split, at least in terms of two-party voting, it is not unreasonable to want the two halves of Congress to work together.

It has been just two weeks now for the new Democrat controlled Congress, but here's hoping they can work better in the spirit of bipartisanship than the previous Republican Congress. I'm certainly rooting for the Democrats, and, had my early voting ballot actually arrived before the election, I would have voted for them as well. But just because I fall primarily on one side of the isle doesn't mean that I think the Democrats are always right.

The red state blue state partitioning of American thought only serves to reinforce the idea of strict divisions in political ideals, and it is not helping at all. This country isn't one big happy middle ground, though. The Northeast is rather solidly Liberal just as the South is solidly Conservative. Yet, if you look at a map of the results from the last election, you will quickly see that the majority of the country is a deep shade of purple.

My home state is consistently in the red state category even though it continues to re-elect the Democratic governor and also voted down a ban on gay marriage. I'm currently living in a very blue state which has had a Republican governor for the past several years. The election results only enforce this duality. There are now 15 states where the two senate seats are split between the parties, and those states also typically have very close vote counts as well.

Because the country is so closely split, at least in terms of two-party voting, it is not unreasonable to want the two halves of Congress to work together. The Democrats have a majority so they get to call the shots, but they won't actually accomplish anything without some votes from the Republican camp. So, unless they really want to do nothing, they had best learn to compromise.

The spirit of compromise starts with not alienating the other party just so you can puff up your chest in front of your constituents. The Republicans did a terrible job of this, especially after winning the presidency. President Bush, despite not having a majority of the popular vote in 2000, maintained that the election had given him a wealth of political capital and a mandate from the people. This sort of divisive talk is part of the reason the media has latched onto the idea of a harshly divided nation.

Shortly after the election, a number of Democrats went on record to say that the president would not be impeached. Some of the Democratic base likely cringed when they heard that, but compromise also means not unduly angering the other side. While some Democrats definitely want to see the president impeached, political reality says this has no chance of occurring. So, rather than angering Republicans for no reason, it is best to move on.

At this point, so soon after the election, it is hard to say how strongly the public wants action on issues raised during the campaign. The big exception, of course, is the war in Iraq. Would the voters be content with Congress as long as the next two years pass without any major scandal provided progress is made in withdrawing from Iraq? I hope not.

I hope the voters make it known that change is necessary. Though the war will likely shape much of the political discourse in the near future, issues like medical and immigration reform shouldn't be left on the shelf.

The Democrats are perhaps concerned that any legislation they can muster enough votes on will be vetoed by the President. Stronger bipartisan support on a bill can help to mitigate that, and can make gathering enough votes far easier. And even if the President does veto a bill, that's just the way the game is played. It's about time he dusted off his veto stamp.

The end of the world

Nov. 1: 65 degrees. Nov. 9: 69 degrees. Nov. 11: 65 degrees. Nov 12-17: 60-67 degrees. Along with global warming, nuclear testing and improved military technology coupled with the spread of mounting tensions worldwide, I am pretty certain the end is near. I'm giving it 25 years (give or take a year). This might sound pessimistic, but I assure you, it's actually pretty funny.

Out in North Korea is the crazy ruler Kim Jong-il, or as I like to call him "Lil' Kim." The man is balls to the wall nuts. Just a few weeks ago, for the sake of scientific knowledge, Lil' Kim decided to detonate a nuclear bomb just north of the city of Kilju which created a small man-made earthquake. It registered a 4.2 on the seismic scale.

So, now that Lil' Kim has the power to induce earthquakes, knowing the mindset of our leader, I am sure President Bush wants the United States to produce a weapon with the same capabilities. By "the same capabilities," I mean a weapon which can sink the Tibetan Plateau in less then an hour while simultaneously giving the finger to the French.

Speaking of insane military death inducing technology, it was reported on Nov. 17 by Israeli newspapers, that Israel is producing a hornet-size weapon which flies into tight spots to kill enemies with a lethal sting.

To go along with this, if the hornet doesn't get the job done, Israel is also producing, what I am affectionately calling "pop your head off like a zit" gloves. These gloves, will do just as my implied name suggests: squeeze an enemies neck with enough force to make his head pop off his shoulders and go rocketing down a dark alley with the speed of say, a small bottle rocket.

With the possibility of nuclear war, man-made earthquakes and killer hornets causing the start of World War III, we also have to factor global warming into the ending equation.

As stated at the start of this column, this November has been one of the warmest on record and in remembrance. Accordingly, due to the emission of Co2 and other greenhouse gases, 2005 was the warmest year to be recorded in the past century (1998, 2002, 2003 and 2004 were all runner's up). For us northern dwellers, the warm weather doesn't seem or feel all too bad, however, although we are now able to get a tan in late November, looking orange all year round like Lindsay Lohan is not advisable.

For us northern dwellers, the warm weather doesn't seem or feel all too bad, however, although we are now able to get a tan in late November, looking orange all year round like Lindsay Lohan is not advisable.

Seriously, from 1990 to 2100 global air temperature is expected to rise anywhere from 2.5 to 10.4 degrees. With the air being warmer, a greater amount of warm moisture is put back into the oceans via rainfall, which in turn makes the seas hotter by a couple of degrees. A couple of degrees might not seem like a drastic change. However, one of the main reasons why Hurricane Katrina devastated New Orleans so severely is due to the increased temperatures of the oceans.

Scientist's are now beginning to fear, with the overall rise in global temperature, hurricanes like Katrina won't be a once in a century occurrence, rather an annual event globally.

Alright, so let's assume the worst possible situation actually happens. The world divulges into a nuclear bomb launching, killer hornet infested, 'Incredible Hulk' glove wearing World War III situation. The Middle-East, along with the devout folk in the United States all declare the revival of religious crusades (President Bush would be the first to sign the bill).

Alliances would be forged (England siding with the United States while the rest of the world, naturally led by France, takes up the opposition), and sides would be drawn in the sand. With nuclear bomb earthquakes taking place, mechanical hornets killing everyone and men dressed in oversized funny green suits walking around waiting to pop your head off, the world would descend into mass chaos.

Oh yeah, not to mention, while all this takes place, fresh water streaming from the Artic Ice caps, the new and improved F1 Niño and Hurricane "Oh St You're Screwed" sinks coastal cities worldwide. Sounds like a hell of a party, huh?

Finally, my history teacher in high school, Mr. Haveron, predicts the rapture will occur on Nov. 12, 2007, when aliens invade Earth (oddly enough, he was a great teacher). On the same note, the ancient Mayan calendar predicts the world's demise will occur in December of 2012. Either way, give or take the five years, both predictions seem accurate to me.

I know this all sounds pessimistic, but think about it this way. For everyone out there who is religious, you will finally meet your maker and relax in heaven by watching never ending reruns of "Happy Days," and that porn on "Ice" entitled "All Richard's go to Jane."

As for me, I'm atheist, so I will delight in the fact that I will never have to see Kevin Federline or Ryan Seacrest ever again. Twenty-five years (give or take a year). 2031, yeah, sounds about right.

This week at Durfee Greenhouse

It maybe a short week for us here at UMass, but Durfee is just as active as ever. The Holiday Plant Sale is up and running, from now until the end of the semester. You'll notice beautiful fragrant pine wreaths hanging as you walk into house five, all hand-made by our Durfee staff for you to bring home. They're also beginning to fashion festive decorated baskets for sale too. There are various plants for sale to fill these baskets of course, ranging from cacti and succulents, to African violets and geraniums, to hibiscus, spider plants, flowering white velvet leaf, and even Aloe vera and bonsai trees.

If you do visit the greenhouse this week, you might notice bonsai artist Peter Holmsten's work in House One. A portion of Durfee's bonsai collection is actually on loan from Peter's personal collection. He recently returned from duty in Iraq a newly promoted major in the air force, and will most likely be returning to active duty in Iraq or possibly Afghanistan in less than six months. While he's home he's spending some time with the bonsai trees here at UMass.

The Durfee Conservatory is open Monday through Friday 8:30 - 4:30 p.m.

Peter brought his collection to Durfee in 2002 when he was called overseas, entrusting them to the care of John Tristan, Durfee's former director. When John left, current director Armand Prevost took over, who, lucky for Peter and his bonsai trees, is a bonsai artist himself. Some of you out there might know that Armand teaches Bonsai Art through Continuing Education here at the university. Both Peter and Armand will be grooming and tending to the many bonsai trees in House One throughout the week, wiring (a process that shapes the tree branches), repotting, and styling each plant. Be sure to keep an eye out for Peter as you peruse the greenhouse, it's a rare chance to speak with a bonsai expert and artist, a personal collector and a benefactor of Durfee. (Check in next week for more on Durfee's bonsai collection and House One.)

Once more this week House Three, the Tropical Rainforest Room, has a special treat for the eyes, a new Bird of Paradise flower that began to bloom just yesterday. See if you can spot this radiant flower on your way through the room.

That's all for now folks. Remember, even though it's a holiday break Durfee will be open this Friday Durfee and all the staff hope to see you soon, and wish you all a happy and restful break!

Durfee Conservatory is open for your enjoyment Monday through Friday, 8:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. It is located across the street from UMass Health Services.

Paul Jackmauh is a regular volunteer at Durfee and a plant enthusiast.

Bonsai trees, like the ones shown above from a greenhouse in France, are plentiful and thriving in UMass' own Durfee Conservatory.

One student's voyage for a "Wii" console

By Matthew Caldwallader
Collegian Correspondent

At about 3:30 in the morning, when the lights from the nearby highway have decreased to only a few per minute and my boredom had reached both unprecedented and unbearable levels, I found myself asking, what am I doing here? Why would anyone subject themselves to a night of attempted sleep on the freezing pavement outside some over sized electronics box store for a video game system? But then I realized that my questions serve nothing but negativity, so I pushed on, whiling away the hours pretending to sleep. Yeah right, like anyone could sleep with the temperature easily below freezing and the wind howling louder than a starving coyote half mad from overexposure to electric fences. This, for better or worse, was my Saturday night.

The purpose was simple, to spend the night outside the Worcester, Massachusetts Best Buy in a twisted attempt to get my hands on one of the brand new, highly-touted Nintendo "Wiis". There was little chance of me accomplishing this by myself without succumbing to complete insanity, so I dragged along my little brother to keep me company. Well, "dragged" might not be the best way to put it, he had been drooling over the "Wii" for a solid year and was all too happy to spend his Saturday night bundled up in no less than 73 blankets just so he might be among the first to get one. Say what you will about his motivation but at least it was pure, insofar as satisfying your cravings could be considered pure. I had far more nefarious intentions in that it was simple greed that spurred me along. I, unlike the majority of my fellow masochists on the sidewalk, was purchasing a "Wii" with the sole intention of reselling it on eBay for profit. Sure, it might seem harmless enough, but that's because I can simply disregard the image of some brat kid crying on Christmas morning because his mommy couldn't procure a "Wii" for a decent price. I just didn't care that much. The similarly hyped Playstation 3 was released two days before the "Wii" and was already selling for as much as 3 times its value online.

So there I was, freezing my ass off with a weird cross section of nerds, geeks and freaks and I couldn't for the life of me figure out why any of us were here. Sure, I was there to make a quick buck, but that was only because I knew people were so obsessed with this thing that they would wildly overpay for it, even with knowledge that they could get one for sticker price if they just waited a week or two. The man-child two spots ahead of me personified the whole messy ordeal with his Nintendo themed attire. Nintendo controller hat, check. NES T-Shirt shown through an open jacket despite the arctic climate, check. Crazed look in the eye, check. The release of a new video game system to basement dwellers everywhere is roughly equivalent to an uber-opening day at Fenway Park, except new video game systems only come out once every five or six years... to say this was a big deal to these people would be a bit of an understatement.

This fact wasn't lost on the store management. Their undeniable power over us gave rise to

FEMA acquires water-making machines for disaster areas

FEMA will store two water-generating machines in Lake Mary, Florida. Each unit will produce roughly 1,200 gallons of purified water daily.

By Gary Taylor
Sun Sentinel (Fort Lauderdale, Fla.)

LAKE MARY, Fla. — The next time a disaster strikes, the air you breathe may become the water we drink.

Federal disaster officials recently unveiled a machine that uses salt to draw as much as 1,200 gallons of water a day from the air, and does it at a fraction of what it costs to truck water into remote areas.

"The core technology took decades to perfect," said one of its inventors, Abe Sher. He founded Aqua Sciences, the company that makes the machine that was hailed recently by Time magazine as one of the best inventions of 2006.

"I'm thrilled with the technology," said Scott R. Morris, who heads up the Federal Emergency Management Agency's Florida office in Lake Mary.

After Morris learned about the capability of the water-generating machine, FEMA officials worked with North Miami Beach-based Aqua Sciences to design a unit capable of drawing water from the air while at the same time purifying water from other sources such as ponds or wells.

The units also had to be easily transported to wherever they were needed; so the FEMA units are built in 40-foot containers that can be shipped by truck, train or boat.

The — water-generating machines cost about $500,000 each and both will be stored at FEMA's Lake Mary office. They are mounted on trailers and in the event of an approaching hurricane, will be moved to a staging area near where the storm is expected to hit, Morris said.

Because the machines are capable of dispensing either cold or hot water, they could prove to be a valuable asset if it becomes necessary to set up a portable hospital, Morris said.

While Florida has the only two FEMA-designed units that Aqua Sciences has manufactured, Morris predicted his agency will buy similar units for other areas, especially after there is a chance to see them in use.

Just as a salt shaker attracts water, so does the salt in the machine, which is a much higher grade than table salt, Sher said. The water is drawn from the air and then ejected from the salt, which serves to purify it. It is then filtered, but since the water is so pure when it leaves the salt, the filters last a long time, Sher said.

While the normally high humidity in Florida may increase the rate at which water is produced, the machine will work anywhere, even in the desert, Sher said.

The U.S. military is already using the water-making machines, some small enough to fit in the back of a truck, Sher said.

But the FEMA units are unique in several ways, beginning with the steel containers that house them. There are nine of the water-harvesting machines in the unit, so if one fails, the unit would continue to work.

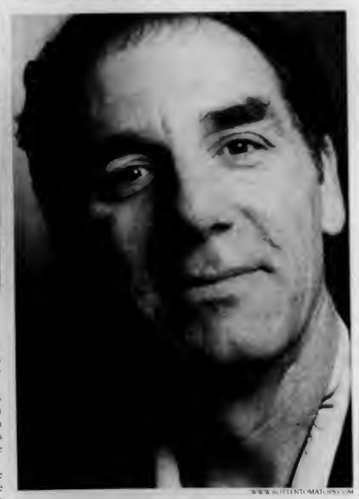
It also has two generators and can store enough fuel to run 24 hours a day for five to seven days. If an electrical source is available, it can be used in place of the generators.

But FEMA wanted to increase the machine's capacity. So while the unit is pulling water from the air, a separate component can purify up to 8,000 gallons of water a day drawn into it from lakes or wells, Sher said.

The distribution system was also designed specifically for FEMA. Water is placed in durable 5-liter plastic bags, which are then placed in a cardboard carton with a spout on the side.

It costs about 30 cents a gallon to remove the water from the air, Morris said. It can easily cost $15 to $30 a gallon to supply water when it must be trucked to remote disaster areas, he said.

N-word furor may affect his life, says 'Seinfeld' namesake



Michael Richards is best known as his character Cosmo Kramer on the hit television series, "Seinfeld."

NEW YORK — The real Kramer imagines it's all about nothing.

"Every comic can have a bad night," Kenny Kramer said Monday.

Kramer had just seen an online video clip of comedian Michael Richards exploding into racist invective at the Laugh Factory in Los Angeles over the weekend, at one point using the N-word five times in a single poisonous breath.

Richards has until now been known for playing Cosmo Kramer, the character on the "Seinfeld" show based on the real-life Kenny Kramer, who continues to reside here in New York.

Richards will now also be known as the standup comic who hurled the N-word repeatedly

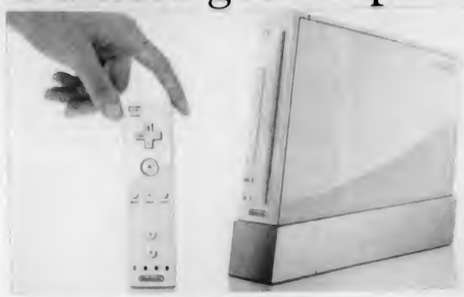
Gamers get desperate



Nintendo's new "Wii" console has been one of the hottest products to hit shelves this year. Thousands of video-gamers and collectors have been eagerly awaiting it's release last Saturday.

a power trip the likes of which I haven't seen since grade school. "Stand up against the wall," the manager boomed, "NO talking, don't move." I was a prisoner, not of the manager but of my own greed, that was after all why I was there in the first place. The manager was just capitalizing on it in his own sadistic way by making us stand at attention for two hours in 30 degree weather while his cronies leered at us for reasons beyond my comprehension.

The system was simple, you stand in line and follow all orders, err, instructions and they deem you worthy, you are rewarded with a ticket which you then redeem for a "Wii". After a half-dozen head counts, the manager began walking down the line, handing out the tickets with an entourage of blue-clad employees in tow, each with something to sell. Whether it was the Best Buy credit card, or the low cost financing or the super duper extra special Best Buy warranty, guaranteeing that if I slip and fall and accidentally drop kick the thing, they'll give me every assurance that it isn't covered.

The store finally opened at 9 a.m. and I was in and out by 9:30. The mad dash home had less to do with the "Wii" than our combined urge to get to a bathroom as soon as possible, holding it in for 6 hours will wreak havoc on your urinary tract, or so I'm told.

The "Wii", for those who haven't been caught up in the massive console wars media machine, is truly a revolutionary system. In fact, its codename before it was officially named the "Wii" was in fact, the Revolution. Ever since the inception of console video games, there has been no more important body part than the thumb. For thirty years the thumb has dominated all interaction with everything from Pong to Grand Theft Auto III. The only real difference has been the number of buttons. The "Wii" has ended the tyrannical rule of the thumb by using motion to control the game. The console comes with a game called "Wii sports," a collection of games such as tennis, baseball, golf and some others designed to showcase the new system's capability. We first tried tennis and were blown away. It is remarkably intuitive and simple, as evidenced by my mother's short learning curve. To hit the ball, you swing the controller like a racket in the direction of the ball, if you want to hit it harder then you swing harder and so on. Let it be said right up front that anyone attempting to play the "Wii" should put a good bit of distance between themselves and anybody or anything around them. Our first tennis match had us jumping around the living room like madmen, diving across the room in vain attempts to volley back. It blew away all my hours of previous gaming experience.

The way — see it the "Wii" is a cool little toy. I'm not sure it's worth braving the elements like my brother and I did, but it certainly is interesting. My only hesitation is that it might get old quick, something that happens to everything. Sure, it was a big novelty to actually punch my opponent in boxing, but what if I want to just play a game sans workout? I guess that question will be left up to time. For now, I'm going to stand up and enjoy this new brand of video game.

Foo Fighters' new album presents a live look at old foundations

By Ellie Steever
Texas Daily (Texas U.)

MEDFORD, Mass. — Dave Grohl has everything a rock star could want: cred as the drummer for Nirvana, his own band and a sweet beard. After five consecutive platinum albums (two of which were double-platinum), the Foo Fighters needed some way to commemorate their success. Instead of doing a typical "greatest hits" compilation, Grohl opted for a live album, this time: "Skin and Bones." An accompanying DVD will be released Nov. 28.

Originating from Seattle, the Foo Fighters have certainly been successful from the get-go, with four singles reaching No. 1 on the U.S. Modern Rock chart. Only one of these hits, "Best of You," appears on "Skin and Bones."

Grohl wrote songs throughout his tenure with the legendary Nirvana, but was afraid to show them to other members for fear of causing conflict that could result in his being booted out. After the demise of Nirvana in 1994, Grohl was prepared to create his own record. A little over a year after Cobain's death, the Fighters released their first album with Capitol Records.

This latest compilation, released by RCA Records, was recorded over a three-night stay in L.A. "Skin and Bones" is all acoustic — Grohl has recently displayed a penchant for the sound hole. This may seem a strange choice for an alt-rock old-timer, but calm down, die-hards: about half of the songs on "Skin and Bones" are originally acoustic anyway.

New to the Foo Fighters cast on "Skin" is violinist Petra Haden, a regular with The Decemberists and The Rentals and contributor to bigger names like Beck, Green Day and Weezer. Also making an appearance is Pat Smear (go ahead, giggle), ex-guitarist of Nirvana and Foo Fighters drop-out.

The biggest obstacle with a live album is bringing something new to songs that have already been released. If a band fails to do this, the audience is simply listening to an old playlist on shuffle. Grohl toes this line throughout the album, metering inspirational variants of his with exact replicas of old songs — except for the echo of a concert recording and applause at the end.

Songs like "Razor" and "Over and Out," both off 2005's "In Your Honor," are too similar to the original recordings to deserve a spot on "Skin and Bones." If someone's paying good money for this live record (or spending valuable time pirating it), several tracks are kind of a rip-off; it's like the audience is paying twice for the same recording.

However, Grohl does bring something new to the record's closer, "Everlong." The acoustic setting adds a new level of quiet emotion that Grohl appropriately punctuates with guttural grunts or yells. Similarly, "My Hero" sounds very different on "Skin," marked with inspirational chimes and piano-led melodies (as opposed to guitar in its original form). In these two songs, the change in instrumentation is appreciated and creates a stirring, quiet-yet-powerful feel.

However, some modifications fall flat, such as the added violin in "Cold Days in the Sun," creating a campy, Counting Crows aura that the Foo Fighters aren't used to. The acoustic styling choices do add a new intensity to several tracks on "Skin and Bones," but as a whole, it serves to expose the Foo Fighters as an ultimately pop-driven band. Without powerful electric guitar chords and strong drumming, they are left with extremely melodic, lyrical songs that are beautiful in their simplicity, yet undeniably pop-oriented.

A surprising number of tracks on "Skin and Bones" are relatively unknown compared to the platinum hit singles Grohl could have filled this album with. For example, "Marigold" is a Nirvana B-side that Grohl initially wrote for 1993's "Heart Shaped Box" single. Also, the title track, "Skin and Bones," is off the Foo Fighters' single "D.O.A." (2005), a somewhat rare release.

Although many songs on "Skin and Bones" are mere reproductions of their original recordings, the tracks in their original form were good, and so they still are here. Yet, as a fan, is it really worth it to buy an album that you already own?

Maybe Grohl would have been better off releasing a "greatest hits" album.

Richards in a large heap of trouble over racial profanities against some African-American patrons who had the temerity to heckle him during his show.

He employed the dreaded epithet too many times and too clearly to even try to say he was merely using a little hip-hop lingo, as some have done in recent months. He was using that word as unmistakably and as hatefully as a Klansman.

Even the television Kramer would have understood that this was a moment that will forever change how people look at Richards. That surely includes "Seinfeld" reruns.

But the real-life Kramer remains convinced that the incident will not affect the Kramer Reality Tours he conducts, allowing him to continue to cash in on his association with the "Seinfeld" show.

The weekend bus tours of "Seinfeld" landmarks embark from West 44th Street, cost $17.50 a head and routinely sell out. Kramer does not expect that to change.

"I'm sure nobody associates me with what he did," Kramer said.

He paused.

"At least I hope not."

He then was all confidence again.

"Art imitates life imitating art imitating life," Kramer said. "But he's not Kramer."

Kramer was speaking of the TV character, not himself.

"I don't think his actions reflect on Kramer in the least," Kramer went on. "He's Michael Richards. Kramer is a television character."

The real-life Kramer allowed that several people had asked if he thought the remarks would cause him trouble.

"I'm thinking no," Kramer said. "I don't see how it could hurt me. I didn't say any of these things."

Then the real-life Kramer suddenly sounded like Kramer the TV character.

"I think it's going to help," he said. "I'm getting all this publicity."

Kramer did allow that the incident is sure to have professional repercussions. For Richards, Kramer compared it with Mel Gibson's anti-Semitic tirade.

"Rehab could be a career move at this point, even if he doesn't need it," Kramer said. "But obviously Michael is not as big a star as Gibson."

In fact, Richards has ceased to be much of a star at all, which explains his fury at those who accorded him less than their complete attention at the Laugh Factory on Friday night.

The real-life Kramer was himself a standup comic for years, and he allowed that any experienced comedian should have known to respond to hecklers with some quick wit.

"Then the audience is on your side," Kramer said.

Kramer insists Richards is no racist, but the words came from somewhere. Richards could have attacked his adversaries' physiognomy or attire, but in choosing their race, he was a racist by its very definition.

His adversaries responded by calling him "cracker" and "white boy," but those words do not carry any real hurt. One adversary got personal, noting that Richards had done nothing of note since he ceased playing Kramer.

"'Seinfeld,' that's it," the man said.

Richards tried to play it off like he was not bothered.

"Oh, I guess you got me there," he said. "You're absolutely right. I'm a one-hop."

If he was not washed up then, he almost certainly is now, despite Monday's apology and declaration he is not a racist. One question is whether time will continue to pack the toxic run by the real-life Kramer and inspired the TV character — the show about nothing — a character you had to love ... until now.

Michael Richards has been in hot water recently, over his use of the N-word in a weekend stand-up performance.

Above, Foo Fighters' Dave Grohl sings but comes up short with the new "Skin and Bones" release — a live look at the booming foundation of his growing rock band.

Last stretch for savvy seniors

Veterans gear up for final run at a national championship

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

Bring out your book of cliches. It's time for the playoffs.

Do or die, win or go home, must-win situation — yeah, it's all of those things for the Massachusetts football team.

For sportswriters and fans it is tiring to hear all of the repetitive banter that precedes important games. But for UMass coach Don Brown and the Minutemen, it is anything but that. This is the culmination of an entire year of hard work.

On Saturday, UMass will face Lafayette — the winner of the Patriot League that received an at-large bid after defeating Lehigh in the final game of the season in the first round of the I-AA playoffs.

UMass took two days off on Sunday and Monday, and now the Minutemen are back at work, preparing for the second season.

"We're going uppers for the first time on a Tuesday," Brown said. "We usually wear full pads Tuesday, Wednesday and uppers Thursday. We'll take the mindset of learning the game plan on Tuesday, executing it on Wednesday in full pads and then back to the clean up on Thursday."

It's business as usual. No alterations or ruffles for playoff time. No change in mentality or rhythm. And that is a tribute to the team's veterans.

This team is chock full of seniors. Center Alex Miller, guard David Thompson, safety James Ihedigbo, running back Steve Baylark, punter Christian Koegel, defensive lineman John Hatchell and linebacker Brad Anderson are all impact player that will be lost to graduation.

Brown didn't have to be the master motivator this year. There are way too many guys with one precious season left — guys that will ride their teammates until there is no gas left in the tank because there isn't time to slack off.

Younger teams might not have been as consistent as this year's Minutemen. There has been no lapse in effort or preparation. No lapse in mental or physical effort. That is a direct compliment to the seniors, the players who have been around long enough to know what hurts a team and how to avoid it.

Senior linebacker Brad Anderson mans the second-best running defense in the Atlantic 10 against Lafayette's 1,000-yard rusher, Jonathan Hurt.

Saturday will be another test, a greater test. It's bigger than Navy, bigger than New Hampshire, bigger than Hofstra or Colgate or Maine. The UMass philosophy this season has been the one-game-at-a-time mentality and it has worked, and Brown is sticking to the routine.

"Game plans are game plans, but you better be ready," he said. "There's no coming back next Sunday and fixing it. [You have to] make sure you go with the things that you know, that your kids are comfortable with, so that your players can play fast. You certainly, at this time of the year, want your guys playing and not thinking."

"We're still going to be moving fast," Baylark said. "We'll execute our plays, learn from our mistakes and work on the little things. We don't want the little things to cost us in a game [like this]. I think coach Brown has us organized really well. When you're in the playoffs, you don't want to get your guys too banged up, you want to take it easy a little bit, but you also don't want to lose that mentality that it's the playoffs. It's not the regular season. You have to prepare a lot different than regular season."

Now, what the Minutemen were trying so hard not to see down the road is here. UMass found out Saturday that Lafayette is the next opponent, and the Minutemen have 60 minutes of football this weekend that can define an entire year of thunderous hits, great catches and long touchdown runs.

This is the last shot for the seniors. There isn't a next year or a get-'em-next-time consolation after a loss. For the last four years of their lives, there has been nothing but UMass and football. Some of these guys will not be moving on to professional careers, so this could be the last of their playing days.

And as Brown says, there is no next Sunday without a W on Saturday.

Freshman Tony Nelson breaks a tackle in the Minutemen's 22-16 win over the Hofstra Pride in the last game of the regular season.

season and, according to Brown, is the type of line "that can maul you."

As Ihedigbo did, Brown also mentioned Lafayette quarterback Brad Maurer. He's thrown for 2,099 yards this season and 11 touchdowns, but has thrown nine interceptions. Maurer is also the Leopards second-leading rusher behind Hurt. On 89 rushing attempts this season he's amassed 283 yards.

"You're going to be good on defense, you're going to get to this level. You need to be able to stop the run," Brown said. "That's always your No. 1 concern and that will be our No. 1 concern Saturday."

Not to be lost in the shuffle is the Minutemen's own 1,000-yard rusher. Baylark could have a big game against the Leopards as Lafayette allows just over 130 rushing yards a game, while Baylark averages 118.9 per game on his own.

Looking at the Leopards on tape, Baylark says they are a lot like the Minutemen in that pressure is their main focus.

"It's going to be a very blitzing team," he said. "They're going to throw everything at us, but we're going to work our tails off this week to prepare for the blitz game. I still think no matter what, coach Brown still has the best defense out there."

No matter what the numbers say, Brown says his team faces big challenges every week.

"Well they've had four wins in a row, so I'm sure they've been building confidence over the last month," he said. "They're on a roll, but I wouldn't exactly say we're not. There's nobody playing Saturday that's not a good football team, that doesn't have great quality. The reality is, it's strength versus strength."

mulated 73 points so far this season and is the team's leading scorer. She has a .619 shooting percentage, going 26-for-42 from the floor and 21-for-26 from the charity stripe.

Mills has also shown a Minute Bird-like ability — using her long arms to block eight shots, each of them with a loud, deafening thud.

Guard Pam Rosario is second on the team with 50 total points.

The tough, hard-nosed sophomore is also arguably the Maroon and White's best player on the other side of the court, consistently exhibiting tenacious defense.

Rosario plays "D" with ruthless aggression and uses her body to barricade any opposing player, not allowing them an inch of room to work with.

"She can just give you that energy," Dacko said. "She wears her heart on her sleeve. She's gutsy, she fills the lane, and she'll dive on balls. She's a winner."

Dacko will also be looking for big games from the pint-sized pet project known as Kim Benton.

The freshman guard from Springfield, Pa., has proven to be a dominating sharpshooter at the college level. She is 6-for-16 from the perimeter this year and Dacko has repeatedly said that she gets better and better with each passing game.

All of Benton's shots will have to be on target this weekend if the Minutewomen are going to remain perfect after their visit to the Sunshine State.

Catamounts shutout UMass in Amherst

HOCKEY from page 8

"[Mitchell's] line has a lot of confidence right now," Catamounts coach Kevin Sneddon said. "He was Johnny on the Spot tonight. Good players put themselves in good positions, and Torrey is one of the better ones in the league."

With UMass defenseman John Wesbecker sent to the penalty box for interference, the Catamounts turned up the pressure. On the power play, UVM tried numerous times to catch Quick on the move.

The Catamounts rotated the puck around to the left post. From there they centered the puck looking for a one-time attempt. Three times the visitors tried this, with increasing success each time.

"UMass challenged us down low pretty hard, and pretty aggressively so we wanted to change from one side of the ice to the other side and back up and around to try to get, not only Quick on the move, but also to get their defenders to move," Sneddon said.

Then, at the 12:55 mark the UMass penalty kill broke down. Mitchell's second tally of the night accounted for UVM's second goal of the game. But it didn't come the way the Catamounts previously planned.

Peter Leraes took a shot from the point. Quick saved the initial try, but the rebound ricocheted off his pads and bounced in front of the left faceoff circle. Moving in toward the net, Mitchell easily collected the puck and sent it past Quick for the 2-0 lead.

Sensing a need for some offense, the Minutemen picked up their offense at the tail end of the middle period. Their best look came with just over a minute remaining. Mike Kostka sent the puck in from the blue line. Senior Matt Anderson got his stick on the puck and deflected it towards the UVM net.

The deflection beat Joe Fallon, but not the right post. The puck hit off the bottom of the post and bounced off. Both Anderson and Cahoon believed the Minutemen didn't create enough offense on the night, reflected in the 27-15 shots advantage for Vermont.

"It almost seemed like we got it going there at the end [of the second]," Anderson said. "It would have been nice if the puck went in going into the third. But you make your own breaks and that's how it went. When you're winning battles and controlling the game, you control your own breaks."

UMass didn't bring the little momentum it gained into the third period. The Minutemen only mustered two shots on Fallon and the Catamounts sealed the scoring with an empty-net goal at 19:21.

their struggles. We play 18 games in [the Mullins Center], and at this level, I wish that all 18 could be great games, but it's not likely."

Just three days prior, UMass was celebrating a convincing win of the Huskies, but then had to quickly get ready for a Hockey East contest, having little time to enjoy the victory or prepare for the next game.

This is the first of three consecutive weeks in which the Minutemen follow a weekend game with another matchup the following Tuesday. However, Cahoon said he was not concerned with having a shorter amount of time to prepare for the next game.

"We had a couple of practices since [Saturday's game against UConn]," Cahoon said. "I think it's more difficult when we play a Lowell on a Friday night, and then have to play Providence on Saturday night."

The Minutemen's first two games of the season involved such a scenario. UMass defeated Sacred Heart 3-2 before battling Clarkson to a 3-3 tie at the Mullins Center.

UMass' next such weekend is Jan. 26 and 27. The Minutemen visits UMass Lowell that Friday and then returns home to host Boston University the very next day.

"Then you really don't have time to clean up what you did the night before," Cahoon said, "except through maybe some coaching with video and some discussion. We don't have any ice time to really straighten any of that out."

Cahoon said he was happy with how is team practiced during the short week, saying the team played up-tempo, clean hockey. He was disappointed with the way his team came out against the Catamounts.

"I don't think [the short week] really had anything to do with our performance tonight," said Cahoon. "I think Veront had something to do with out performance tonight, and I think we just didn't execute as well as we had been in previous games."

Dukes off to improbable start in A-10

Rhode Island flashes offensive brilliance with subpar defense

By Kevin Dooley
Collegian Staff

The Steelers aren't the only team in the local Pittsburgh area looking to get back on the winning track.

Despite an 87-82 overtime loss to Northern Illinois Monday night, the Duquesne Dukes have started the year at 2-1 with wins over North Carolina-Asheville (77-76) and Youngstown State, 81-75.

But the 2-1 start is no ordinary one for the Dukes. The team has only eight players under scholarship and is coming off a 3-24 season last year, the worst record a Duquesne team has posted in school history. Duquesne did not grab its second win of the year last season until Dec. 20 with a win over Robert Morris, 73-58.

The Dukes are led by four first-year starters, including 6-6 freshman Scott Grote, who sealed the victory over North Carolina-Asheville Saturday by stealing the inbounds pass after he made two critical fouls shots to put the Dukes up for good. Grote finished with a team-high 18 points in the win.

Grote also made a little history in Duquesne's first win of the year over Youngstown, a game in which the Dukes started three true freshmen. Grote had 23 points with nine rebounds and four assists. Grote's 23-point performance is tied for third-most by a Duquesne player in a first varsity game.

Duquesne has had just one winning season in the last 10 years and was not expected to make much noise this season under new head coach Ron Everhart, who brought in 10 new players in his first 50 days at the job, four of whom were shot before the season began in September.

A-10 Basketball

Everhart has a reputation for turning programs around. When Everhart came to Northeastern in 2002, he inherited a team that finished with less than nine wins in six consecutive seasons. Everhart went on to produce 19, 21, and 19 victories his first three seasons at the helm of Northeastern and averaged 16.4 wins during his five-year tenure.

The Dukes soon will get a chance to see if they really have begun to turn the page in their program when they square off with inter-state rival, the No. 4 Pittsburgh Panthers on Dec. 6. Duquesne lost its last game to the Panthers 71-60 last December.

The Rams Achilles' Heel

The Rhode Island Rams have been unstoppable on the offensive side of the ball, but so have their opponents.

Rhode Island is lighting up the scoreboard this year, averaging a league-high 86.4 points a contest. The Rams are shooting close to 46 percent from the field and are shooting a remarkable 47 percent from beyond the three-point line. Leading the way for the Rams are juniors Will Daniels and sophomore Kaheim Seawright, averaging just over 15 points a game each. Seawright is shooting 60 percent from the field and over 80 percent from the free throw line. Head coach Jim Baron's squad has four players averaging double figures in points.

On the flip side, however, there is a reason why the Rams, despite their prolific offensive attack, are sitting at 3-2 instead of 5-0. Teams are scoring just over 80 points per game against them in five games this year and Rhode Island has allowed over 80 points in their two losses to Troy and the Houston Cougars.

On the Wrong Side of History

The No.12 Texas A&M Aggies could teach the aforementioned Rams a lesson or two when it comes to clamping down on defense. No one needs to tell that to the St. Louis Billikens, who experienced first hand the Aggies stifling defensive attack last Sunday in a record-setting defensive performance.

The Billikens were held to just 20.8 percent from the field in the Aggies 69-33 win over 3-1 St. Louis. The Aggies also had eight blocks and seven steals by day's end.

St. Louis was held scoreless on 15 straight possessions and scored just 13 points in the first half. The anemic first-half performance from the field tied the record for the fewest points allowed by an Aggies squad in school history. The 33 points allowed by Texas A&M was the fewest the Aggies allowed in a game since it beat Texas 73-29 back on Jan. 16, 1959.

Taking Advantage of Charity

The George Washington Colonials have won their first three games of the season by an average margin of 24 points, including a 94-49 trouncing of the Dartmouth Big Green last Tuesday.

A contributing factor to the all of the blowout wins this year for the Colonials is its ability to knock down their shots from the charity stripe. The Colonials are shooting just over 80 percent from the free throw line prior to Tuesday night's game against Kennesaw. George Washington is second in the A-10 in free-throw percentage only to the La Salle Explorers, who are shooting 82 percent from the line.

Senior Carl Elliot is having his best season in his career from the line for the Colonials, shooting 23-for-24, good for fifth in the A-10. Elliot was a career 60 percent from the charity stripe coming into this season.

Grab a Snickers Coach Giannini

Barring any unforeseen circumstances, LaSalle head coach John Giannini will be a fixture on campus for some time to come. It was announced last Monday by LaSalle Director of Intercollegiate Athletics Dr. Thomas Brennan that Giannini was signed to a contract extension through the 2010-2011 season.

Giannini and the Explorers began the season with a 66-60 win over St. Mary's Saturday night. In only his second season at the helm, Giannini led LaSalle to an 18-10 record and finished third place in the A-10 standings, the team's best showing in the A-10 regular season since the 1995-1996 season.

Lafayette visits Amherst for first-round matchup Saturday

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Everything that happened in the past 11 weeks means little to the Massachusetts football team. Starting yesterday, the Minutemen entered the playoff season when they took the field for their first practice of the week.

Saturday the Minutemen (10-1, 8-0 Atlantic 10) take on Lafayette in the first round of the Division I Football Championship. The game against the Leopards is set for a noon start at McGuirk Stadium.

Up until Sunday, UMass knew little about Lafayette (6-5, 5-1 Patriot League). All they knew was that the Leopards were the champions of the Patriot League, and were coming to Amherst the following week. Now, after a few days of intense film study, the Minutemen feel they are ready to play.

"We have a pretty good game plan for these guys," senior safety James Ihedigbo said. "They have a solid quarterback with the ability to be elusive at times, [he] settles in the pocket and can throw it around. [They] have a 1,000-yard rushing back. He's what I call a patient runner, so we have to be patient on defense."

That runner is senior Jonathan Hurt, who was named the Patriot League's Offensive Player of the Year, the same day UMass' Steve Baylark was bestowed as the Atlantic 10's Co-Player of the Year.

Hurt racked up 1,124 yards during the 2006 regular season. He is the featured back on a team that averages 174.2 rushing yards per game. In addition to his four-digit yardage numbers, he's crossed the goal line 15 times to lead Lafayette in touchdowns.

"We're just going to do what we do. We're a pressure defense," Ihedigbo added. "There's nothing new about that, we just go after [them]. That's our plan. We're just really going to try and get after it."

UMass is no stranger to stopping the run. Against Hofstra on Saturday they allowed -1 yards on the ground. As a team this season, the Minutemen have only surrendered 96.4 yards per game on the ground.

The performance against Hofstra was without the services of senior defensive end John Hatchell. He missed the game due to a knee injury, but UMass coach Don Brown says that if Hatchell can practice this week, he should be ready to go come Saturday.

"He'll definitely give us a lift in the run game. I want to see him move around and make sure he can defend himself and do things properly," Brown said. "If I know John Hatchell, I've seen his brother do it with no ACL for a whole year. And he's similar in terms of strength make up. My hunch is we'll get a pretty good effort from him over the next couple of days."

Brown said Hurt isn't the only reason Lafayette earned spot in the postseason. The Leopards offensive line paved the way for the runner all

Minutemen fall to Catamounts, 2-0, in wake of UConn win

The visiting team came out on top of the Massachusetts hockey team and Vermont's annual pre-Thanksgiving Day tradition for the second year in a row as UVM defeated the Mass Attack, 2-0, last night.

The Minutemen were shutout in front of 5,339 fans at the Mullins Center.

"Vermont played a great road game," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "The game had much do with our inability to generate anything because of the battles we lost, and because of our inability to make clean plays."

UMass (6-2-1, 4-2 Hockey East) takes the ice again on Saturday against Union. The Minutemen travel to Schenectady to face the Dutchmen over the holiday weekend. Game time at Frank L. Messa Rink is set for 7 p.m. The Minutemen recorded one of their biggest wins of the season over the Thanksgiving weekend a year ago. That was a 4-3 win over No. 3 Colorado College in Amherst.

Vermont (6-4-1, 4-1-1 HEA) broke a scoreless tie early into the second period last night and never looked back. Overall, play picked up in the period for the Catamounts. They saw more chances in the opening minutes of the second as they did all of the first period.

Mitchell easily put the puck by Quick, who remained stationed at the right post. The junior then doubled the Catamounts advantage deep into the period.

The week of Thanksgiving has been a week of ups and downs in recent years for the Massachusetts hockey team, and this year has been no different.

The Minutemen trounced Connecticut on Saturday by a score of 8-1, the Maroon and White's highest scoring game for over two years. The Mass Attack fell from hard from that win, laying a pre-Turkey Day goose egg Tuesday night, losing to Vermont 3-0.

The loss marks the first time the Minutemen have been shutout at home in 360 days, the last coming on Nov. 26, 2005, the Saturday following Thanksgiving.

Last year's blanking also followed a big win, as the Maroon and White upset third-ranked Colorado College the night before losing to Denver 4-0. The loss to the Pioneers was the second shutout at home that year for UMass, who fell to Maine a month earlier by the same score.

The Minutemen had gone 11-3-1 at home since last leaving the ice without netting a single goal. UMass coach Don Cahoon felt the presence of the holiday and the home-ice advantage had little to do with why the team failed to score against the Catamounts.

"I don't know if it says anything other than we didn't play well enough to win, and we didn't generate enough offense as a result of that," said Cahoon.

The Minutemen appeared sluggish through most of the game, save for a few spurts of offensive pressure in the second and third periods. The UMass fans were growing gradually less enthused as the night progressed, and the home-ice advantage that usually proves to be such a favorable intangible for UMass soon disappeared.

"We play enough games [at home], but unfortunately these things occur," Cahoon said. "I think every team has

Roundball Classic begins this weekend

The Massachusetts women's basketball team (4-0) won't have much time to digest its Thanksgiving turkey, as it plays games on Saturday and Sunday as part of the Best Western Roundball Classic.

The Minutewomen journey to Florida to take on the Stephen F. Austin University Ladyjacks (2-2) followed by a matchup against South Florida (4-0) or St. Francis (1-0) - pending the results of a first round of games.

After surrendering a loss to Southern Methodist University on Monday, SFA now has a .500 record heading into the weekend.

Forward Evelyn Edwards is the newest recipient of the Southland Conference Player of the Week award, having been given the honors yesterday for helping the Ladyjacks in a 65-55 win over Louisiana Tech on Friday.

Edwards played 31 minutes in the upset, going 4-for-10 from the floor and snatching nine total rebounds. The 22-year-old business major is currently fifth on the Texas-based squad with 33 points on the season. She has drained 15 of her 34 shots (.441) and is 3-for-4 in free throws.

Another component UMass will have to keep its eyes on is SFA's leading scorer: Charity Egenti. Originally from Nigeria, the 6-foot-3 post player is averaging 12 points a game and has tallied 48 on the year. She is 20-for-51 thus far and has also blocked six shots. Despite these impressive credential numbers, however, she is 3-for-11 from behind the arc - a mere .273 shooting percentage.

Having one point less than her classmate, Nikki Carr is the team's runner-up in scoring category with 47 points. The junior guard is 15-for-36 in the season's first four games and, at .417, actually has a higher percentage than Egenti.

Sunday's nemesis won't be determined until much later. UMass will square off against either the Bulls or the Terriers pending Saturday's results.

The Minutewomen hope to keep rolling along with their undefeated season and will need the assistance of their top guns if this weekend is going to be any sort of success.

Though UMass coach Marnie Ducko says she demands solid performances from her entire roster every game, she knows she can rely on a few golden gooses to deliver that little something extra.

Junior forward Kate Mills has accu-

UMass banquet aims to raise global hunger awareness

This holiday season students at the University of Massachusetts are hoping to increase awareness of the global hunger problem by hosting a hunger banquet in the Campus Center Auditorium of UMass.

The event will be held Tuesday, Dec. 5 from 6:45 p.m. until 9:00 p.m.

The purpose of the event is to increase knowledge about the realities of hunger around the world. The banquet is modeled after a program run by Oxfam, an organization created over 30 years ago.

Every guest at the event will be given a ticket, which randomly designates them as members of the high, middle or low-income economic class. The number of people assigned to each class is scaled to represent the real percentages around the world. Fifteen percent of guests will be in the high-income class, 25 percent will be in the middle-income class and the remaining 60 percent will be in the low-income class.

Each group will be fed a different meal. The high-income group will be served a full-course meal. The middle-class group will be given rice and beans. The remaining (and largest) class of people will eat only rice.

The meal is not the only component of this event. There will also be a community service fair, a food drive, a slide show presentation from Oxfam and a speech from State Representative Ellen Story.

This event is being co-sponsored by MassPIRG, Hillel Tzedek, the UMass Red Cross Club and Earthfoods Café.

SGA discusses budget proposal

By Debleena Mitra
Collegian Staff

The Student Government Association held a forum on Nov. 14 to discuss solutions for arising problems in the new budget plan. Many registered student organizations (RSOs) are dissatisfied with the rising activities fees. The new budget proposed that there would be an increase from the current rate of $40 to $43.

The forum started as everyone from participating organizations introduced themselves. Clubs ranging from the International Relations Club to various sports teams were represented at the meeting. SGA President Elvis Mendez started the meeting by saying "the basic idea of this forum is to have a frank and open discussion about our budget."

After Mendez and other members of the SGA explained the proposed budget outline, students shared their ideas and reactions. One student suggested that the SGA and other RSOs focus on fundraising instead of cutting back money. Most attendees made it clear that they believed the activities fees were already too high for students.

One representative spoke for the women's ice hockey team and expressed her frustration with the overwhelming amount of money athletes are expected to spend.

Unfortunately, the SGA is not equipped to handle the costs of intramural sports at the University, and little can be done to stop rising costs. The SGA receives a stipend of $1.4 million per year, which is less in comparison to other New England colleges.

However, the SGA has been under criticism in the past. They have been accused of not using their money to fund enough programs, and ending each year with a significant surplus.

Overall, the intent of the SGA was to open up the issues to the students and hear their opinions. In this instance the budget was requested by the administration on such short notice that there was only time for one forum. However, Mendez says in the future the SGA would like to have a series of open forums so that the UMass community will be able to eventually come to an agreement on how its money should be spent.

Anti-war protester suicide fails to make significant impact

By Ashley M. Heher
Associated Press

CHICAGO — Malachi Ritscher envisioned his death as one full of purpose.

He carefully planned the details, mailed a copy of his apartment key to a friend, created to-do lists for his family. On his Web site, the 52-year-old experimental musician who'd fought with depression even penned his obituary.

At 6:30 a.m. on Nov. 3 – four days before an election caused a seismic shift in Washington politics – Ritscher, a frequent anti-war protester, stood by an off-ramp in downtown Chicago near a statue of a giant flame, set up a video camera, doused himself with gasoline and lit himself on fire.

Aglow for the crush of morning commuters, his flaming body was supposed to be a call to the nation, a symbol of his rage and discontent with the U.S. war in Iraq.

"Here is the statement I want to make: if I am required to pay for your barbaric war, I choose not to live in your world. I refuse to finance the mass murder of innocent civilians, who did nothing to threaten our country," he wrote in his suicide note. "... If one death can atone for anything, in any small way, to say to the world: I apologize for what we have done to you, I am ashamed for the mayhem and turmoil caused by my country."

There was only one problem: No one was listening.

It took five days for the Cook County medical examiner to identify the charred-beyond-recognition corpse. Meanwhile, Ritscher's suicide went largely unnoticed. It wasn't until a reporter for an alternative weekly, the Chicago Reader, pieced the facts together that word began to spread.

Soon, tributes — and questions — poured in to the paper's blogs.

Was this a man consumed by mental illness? Or was Ritscher a martyr driven by rage over what he saw as an unjust war? Was he a convenient symbol for an anti-war movement, or was there more to his message?

"This man killed himself in such a painful way, specifically to get our attention on these things," said Jennifer Diaz, a 28-year-old graduate student who never met him but has been researching his life. Now, she is organizing protests and vigils in his name. "I'm not going to sit by and I can't sit by and let this go unheard."

Mental health experts say virtually no suicides occur without some kind of a diagnosable mental illness. But Ritscher's family disagrees about whether he had severe mental problems.

In a statement, Ritscher's parents and siblings called him an intellectually gifted man who suffered from bouts of depression. They stopped short of saying he'd ever received a clinical diagnosis of mental illness.

"He believed in his actions, however extreme they were," his younger brother, Paul Ritscher, wrote online. "He believed they could help to open eyes, ears and hearts and to show everyone that a single man's actions, by taking such extreme personal responsibility, can perhaps affect change in the world."

His son, who shares the same name as his father, said his father was

Iraqi leaders call for end to sectarian violence

Local Iraqis dance atop burnt police vehicles in Buhriz, a predominantly Sunni village about 35 miles north of Baghdad, yesterday.

By Thomas Wagner
Associated Press

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Sunni, Shiite and Kurdish leaders called on Sunday for an end to Iraq's sectarian conflict and vowed to track down those responsible for the war's deadliest attack.

But as they went on national television to try to keep Iraq from sliding into an all-out civil war, fighting between Iraqi security forces and Sunni Arab insurgents raged for a second day in Baqouba, the capital of Diyala province north of Baghdad.

By the end of the day, the province's latest casualty figures were a microcosm of the brutality in Iraq: 17 insurgents killed, 15 detained, 20 civilians kidnapped, three bodies found, one U.S. Marine killed and two wounded. The mayor of a municipality also narrowly escaped an assassination attempt that killed one of his guards and wounded three.

During Saturday's fighting in Baqouba, police killed at least 36 insurgents and wounded dozens after scores of militants armed with assault rifles and rocket-propelled grenades attacked government buildings in the city center, police said. The fighting raged for hours in the city, about 35 miles northeast of Baghdad.

On Saturday, officials including Defense Minister Abdul-Qader al-Obaidi and Gen. George Casey, the top U.S. commander in Iraq, met and decided to fire Diyala's police commander, saying he was unable to stop infiltration of the force by Sunni insurgents, two Iraqi officials said on condition of anonymity as is often the case in areas subjected to widespread fighting and revenge killings.

One of the main challenges for U.S. and British forces in recruiting and training Iraqi military and police forces is that they are often infiltrated by insurgents who kill and kidnap in disguise.

"We promise the great martyrs that we will chase the killers and criminals, the terrorists, Saddamists and Takfiri (Sunni extremists) for viciously trying to divide you," Shiite Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki, Sunni Parliament speaker Mahmoud al-Mashhadani and Kurdish President Jalal Talabani said in their joint statement on state-run TV.

In addressing "the great martyrs," they were referring to the 215 people who died when suspected Sunni insurgents attacked Sadr City, the capital's main Shiite district, on Thursday.

Al-Maliki also urged his national unity government of Sunnis, Shiites and Kurds to end their public disputes and curb sectarian violence.

"The crisis is political, and it is the politicians who must try to prevent more violence and bloodletting. The terrorist acts are a reflection of the lack of political accord," al-Maliki said.

He is facing strong criticism from top Shiite and Sunni Arab leaders alike as he prepares for a summit in neighboring Jordan with President Bush on Wednesday and Thursday.

Al-Maliki visited Sadr City on Sunday afternoon and paid condolences to some of the relatives of those killed Thursday in the bombings, but as he drove away at the end of his visit, several teenagers hurled stones at his motorcade, residents said.

The challenges that Bush faces across the region were evident to Jordan's King Abdullah, who said the problems in the Middle East go beyond the war in Iraq and that much of the region soon could become engulfed in violence unless the central issues are addressed quickly.

"We could possibly imagine going into 2007 and having three civil wars on our hands," he said, citing conflicts in Iraq, Lebanon and the decades-long strife between the Palestinians and Israelis.

"Therefore, it is time that we really take a strong step forward as part of the international community and make sure we avert the Middle East from a tremendous crisis that I fear, and I see could possibly happen in 2007," he told ABC's "This Week."

Elsewhere, two U.S. Marines were killed Saturday in Anbar province, the area of western Iraq where many Sunni-insurgent groups are based, raising to at least 2,875 the number of U.S. servicemen who have died since the beginning of the Iraq war in March 2003. So far, 56 American service members have died in November.

In Baghdad, the government partially lifted a 24-hour curfew it had imposed in response to the bombing and mortar attack in Sadr City, and some Iraqis went shopping at vegetable and fruit

Holiday shopping season starts strong

By Anne D'Innocenzio
Associated Press

NEW YORK — Retailers got what they wanted over the Thanksgiving weekend – a strong start to the 2006 holiday shopping season as consumers crowded stores in search of huge discounts on flat-screen TVs and other hot merchandise.

Stores and malls that opened as early as midnight on Friday drew a bigger-than-expected turnout, and robust sales for the first day of the season offset slower business as the weekend wore on, according to early reports.

The biggest winners appeared to be electronics chains such as Best Buy Co. Inc. and popular-priced department stores including J.C. Penney Co., which pulled in shoppers with good deals. Yet Wal-Mart Stores Inc., which promised the most aggressive discounting ever, was an exception, announcing Saturday that same-store sales for November will be slightly below its already lackluster forecast. Wal-Mart has struggled for months to appeal to both higher-income shoppers and low-price fans.

The question for the retail industry overall is whether the bargain hunters who raided stores for early bird specials over the weekend will have the same zeal as they shop between now and the end of the season, when the Anti-war protester self-immolates after writing suicide note

Anti-war protester Malachi Ritscher set up a video camera, doused himself with gasoline and lit himself on fire, Nov. 3, 2006.

trying to cope with mental illness. Suicide seemed to be the next step, and the war was a way to give his death meaning.

"He was different people at different instances and so, so erratic. I loved him no doubt, but he was a very lonely and tragic man," said Ritscher, 35, who is estranged from the rest of the family. "The idea of being a martyr I'm sure was attractive. He could literally go out in a blaze of glory."

Born in Dickinson, N.D., with the name Mark David, Ritscher dropped out of high school, married at 17 and divorced 10 years later. Eventually, he would change his name to match his son's and, coincidentally, a world-famous prophet. At the end, he worked in building maintenance and was a fixture in Chicago's experimental music scene.

He described himself as a renaissance man who'd amassed a collection of more than 2,000 musical recordings from clubs in Chicago. He was a writer, philosopher and photographer. He was an alcoholic who collected fossils, glass eyes, light bulbs and snare drums. He paid $25 to become an ordained minister with the Missionaries of the New Truth and operated a handful of Web sites protesting the Iraq war.

A member of Mensa who claimed to be able to recite the infinite number Pi to more than 1,000 decimal places, he titled his obituary "Out of Time." Friends, who seemed surprised about his death, found themselves searching for answers. Ritscher's death became even more enigmatic than his life.

Perhaps the most famous self-immolation occurred in 1963, when Buddhist monk Thich Quang Duc burned himself at a Saigon intersection in protest against the South Vietnamese regime. Another activist, Kathy Change, lit fire to herself in 1996 at the University of Pennsylvania to protest the government and the country's economic system.

Ritscher's death brought back memories for Anita King, a 48-year-old artist from West Philadelphia who was Change's best friend.

"I think both of them, they just felt like their death could be the last drop of blood shed," King said. "It was too hard for them. They had too much of a conscious connection to the struggle to go on in their lives."

In the end, only Ritscher knew the motivations for his suicide. There is little doubt, though, that he was satisfied with his choice.

"Without fear I go now to God," Ritscher wrote in the last sentence of his suicide note. "Your future is Uneasy retailers surprised by discount shopping 'hysteria'

Stores and malls that opened as early as midnight on Friday drew a bigger-than-expected turnout, and robust sales for the first day of the season offset slower business as the weekend wore on.

discounts may not be as steep.

"The hysteria has come down a bit, but it was a great start," said Bill Martin, co-founder of ShopperTrak RCT Corp., which tracks total sales at more than 45,000 mall-based retail outlets. But he said the true measure of the season is whether "retailers can sustain the loyalty and excitement" until the end.

Shoppers were clearly looking for as big a discount as possible.

"I started Friday morning at 5 a.m.," said Kim Neuhardt, shopping at the Jordan Creek Town Center in West Des Moines, Iowa. "At Kohl's and Target, we got good deals. I bought my stepdaughter a dress for the prom for like 50 bucks. It was originally something like $100 at Younkers. It was on sale and I had a coupon for 20 percent off."

Martin expects that total retail sales for the first weekend of the season will be higher than last year, boosted by Friday's better-than-expected business. Total sales rose 6 percent to $8.96 billion that day, compared to a year earlier, according to ShopperTrak. The company planned to report Saturday's results on Monday.

Retailers' strong performance was a direct result of their aggressive discounting and promotions, designed to get consumers to start shopping early. More stores and malls opened at midnight Friday, and Toys "R" Us Inc. and Sears Holdings Corp.'s Sears stores opened at 5 a.m., an hour earlier than in the past.

Jerry Storch, CEO and chairman of Toys 'R' Us, said he was pleased with results for the weekend, noting that sales were strong across the board. In addition to Mattel Inc.'s Fisher-Price's T.M.X. Elmo, hot toys include Fisher-Price's Kids Tough Digital Camera, and some of the toy retailer's exclusives like VTech Holdings Ltd.'s pink Nitro Notebook, a laptop computer.

Gail Lavielle, spokeswoman at Sears Holdings, which also owns Kmart stores, said Sunday the stores were busy through Friday and Saturday. At Sears, flat-screen TVs, digital cameras and Craftsman tools were the hot items. At Kmart, holiday decor including Christmas trees, jewelry and toys were the most popular.

Retailers were optimistic but also a little uneasy going into the season, concerned that economic factors like the slowing housing market might make shoppers more conservative. And many shoppers interviewed during the weekend said they were trying to be budget-conscious.

Marisue Sievert, at the Jordan Creek Town Center in West Des Moines, said she already spent $100 in one day, and will probably spend a total of $500 on gifts.

"We're cheap. We budget. We know what we have to get, so we save for it till the end of the year," she said.

Karen Garcia, who was shopping on Friday in the Buffalo, N.Y., suburb of Orchard Park, said she planned to spend less this year.

"We're just downsizing because it's getting a little out of hand. You just pick and choose what you want instead of going out and you have to have everything," Garcia said.

Still, the discounts accomplished what they were supposed to do for many retailers – get consumers spending early. Penney said in a statement Saturday that the holiday shopping season was "off to a good start."

Karen McDonald, spokeswoman at Taubman Centers Inc., which operates or owns 23 malls in 11 states, on Sunday reported "two solid days of 'post-Thanksgiving' business." According to a sampling of half of Taubman's malls, business was up in the low to mid-single digits so far this weekend, she said. The most popular items were consumer electronics, cosmetics and toys, the weakest category was home furnishings.

But Wal-Mart had a slow start despite come-ons that included special offers on flat-screen TVs. The discounter said it expects to report a same-store sales decline of 0.1 percent in November, slightly below its projections for flat sales for the month. The results puzzled analysts as Wal-Mart has stepped up its discounting throughout the month, including offering certain generic drugs for as low as $4 per prescription.

Man fatally shot on wedding day

By Deepti Hajela
Associated Press

NEW YORK — A crowd angrily called on police Sunday to explain why authorities fatally shot a 23-year-old man on the day of his wedding, and some called for the ouster of the city's police commissioner.

At a vigil and rally, family members and friends chanted and prayed. Community leaders said they wanted to know why officers fired as many as 50 rounds at an unarmed group Saturday as they left Sean Bell's bachelor party in a car.

"We cannot allow this to continue to happen," said the Rev. Al Sharpton, who has been speaking for Bell's family since the shooting. "We've got to understand that all of us were in that car."

The civil rights advocate led the crowd in chants of "No justice, no peace." At times some in the crowd yelled that Police Commissioner Raymond Kelly should be ousted. "Kelly must go!" people shouted.

The shootings occurred outside the Kalua Cabaret, a strip club where the bachelor party was held. The surviving victims were Joseph Guzman, 31, who was shot at least 11 times, and Trent Benefield, 23, who was hit three times. Both men are at Mary Immaculate Hospital, where Guzman was in critical condition and Benefield was stable.

Relatives of all three men – many of them stoic, and some crying – attended Sunday's vigil but none spoke publicly.

During a press conference Saturday, Kelly said the department was still piecing together what happened, and that it was too early to say whether the shooting was justified.

The officers' shots struck the men's car 21 times after the vehicle rammed into an undercover officer and hit an unmarked NYPD minivan. The wild gunfire hit nearby homes and shattered windows at a train station, though no residents were injured.

Police thought one of the men in the car might have had a gun. But investigators found no weapons. It was unclear what prompted police to open fire, Kelly said.

Kelly said the incident stemmed from an undercover operation inside the strip club in the Jamaica section of Queens. Seven officers in plain clothes were investigating the Kalua Cabaret; five of them were involved in the shooting.

According to Kelly, the groom was involved in a verbal dispute outside the club after 4 a.m. and one of his friends made a reference to a gun.

An undercover officer walked closely behind Bell and his friends as they headed for their car. As he walked toward the front of the vehicle, they drove forward – striking him and a nearby undercover police vehicle, Kelly said.

The officer who had followed the group on foot was apparently the first to open fire, Kelly said. That officer had served on the force for five years. One 12-year veteran fired his weapon 31 times, emptying two full magazines, Kelly said.

At some point, Bell, who was driving, backed his car up onto the sidewalk, hitting a building gate, authorities said. He then drove forward, striking the police vehicle a second time, Kelly said.

On Sunday, the group 100 Blacks in Law Enforcement Who Care said it is issuing a vote of no confidence in Kelly over the shooting.

A police spokeswoman on Sunday did not immediately comment on the group's demands.

Attacks continue in Baghdad markets after being confined to their homes for two full days.

"The situation is better today because we can finally get out and bduy food for the first time in two days," said Hussein Fadel, a Shiite civil servant, as he shopped in Sadr City, where memorial services were still being held for people killed in Thursday's attack. "I hope the city is less tense today."

A traffic ban remained in place, and the capital's streets were empty of cars and trucks, except those of Iraqi and U.S. security forces. On Saturday, the government lifted a 24-hour curfew that had closed the southern port city of Basra to all vehicular traffic and shipping.

But mortar attacks and shootings continued in Baghdad, killing a total of seven people and wounding seven, police said. A tortured body also was found in the Tigris River.

Two mortar rounds hit a U.S. military post in eastern Baghdad, setting it on fire and leaving a dark cloud of smoke above the Baladiyat neighborhood, police and witnesses said. Lt. Col. Scott Bleichwehl, a U.S. military spokesman, confirmed that "indirect fire rounds" hit the area, but declined to provide details. No casualties were reported.

One of the main challenges for U.S. and British forces in recruiting and training Iraqi military and police forces is infiltration by insurgents.

Adnan al-Dulaimi, Sunni lawmaker who heads a large Sunni bloc in Parliament, also escaped unharmed when gunmen attacked his home in Baghdad and were repelled by his armed guards, the legislator said.

A total of 43 people were killed or found dead in Iraq on Sunday, police said.

An Iraqi security detainee died at a U.S. prison in southern Iraq two days after being taken to a hospital after suffering chest pains, the military said. The detainee, whose name was not given, died Saturday "from what appears to be natural causes" at Camp Bucca near Basra, the military said.

PETA mistakenly targets church

ANCHORAGE, Alaska — The pastor at Anchorage First Free Methodist Church was mystified. Why was the activist group People for the Ethical Treatment of Animals chastising him? No animals are harmed in the church's holiday nativity display. In fact, animals aren't used at all.

People, however, do dress the parts – Mary, Joseph, the wise men, etc. The volunteers stand shivering at a manger on the church lawn in a silent tribute to Christmas.

The Rev. Jason Armstrong was confused by an e-mail this week from PETA, which admonished him for subjecting animals "to cruel treatment and danger," by forcing them into roles in the church's annual manger scene.

"We've never had live animals, so I just figured this was some spam thing," Armstrong said. "It's rough enough on us people standing out there in the cold. So we're definitely not using animals."

Jackie Vergerio, PETA's captive animals in entertainment specialist, said her organization tracks churches nationwide that use real animals in "living nativity scenes."

Seems the confusion started with the church's choice of phrase. PETA flagged Free Methodist's display as a "living nativity," and indeed, that's how the church describes it on its Web site.

To PETA, that means animals.

"Those animals are subject to all sorts of terrible fates in some cases," Vergerio said. "Animals have been stolen and slaughtered, they've been raped, they've escaped from the nativity scenes and have been struck by cars and killed. Just really unfathomable things have happened to them."

In the letter to Armstrong, Vergerio shared some sad fates of previous nativity animals – like Brighty the donkey, snatched from a nativity scene in Virginia and beaten by three young men. Ernie the camel fled a crèche in Maryland but was struck and killed by a car. Two sheep and a donkey had to be euthanized after a dog mauling at a manger scene in Virginia.

Free Methodist's display is peaceful, Armstrong said. The congregation erects the stable. Members spread straw and don costumes. Some even dress as manger animals.

'Current' issues with tasing

Chris Eckel

I have been at this University for a few years, but I can count on one hand the number of times I have gone to the library. However, even though I might be a novice library user, I do have a pretty basic understanding of what goes on there.

The bottom floor is used for all-nighters fueled by the Procrastination Station. The Art and Photography section is on the ninth floor, and all the frisky types who want to learn about Victoria's Secret instead of Victorian England head up to the 24th floor to play dirty games. But until the event of last week from UCLA, I never would have believed librarians could be the setting of such a controversial circumstance.

Since I'm such a newcomer, I don't know it all, so maybe you can help me out. On what floor are the free tasings available? We all know how trendy college students are, and it's the newest craze sweeping the nation. There are two great bonuses to this new trend. Tasings are free to you, since taxpayers buy the guns and pay for the officers, and you don't have to do anything at all to get them – you can receive one without even requesting it.

I know this offer sounds too good to be true, but there are many actual customers willing to verify this seemingly wacky opportunity. Mostafa Tabatabainejad is not a paid actor, despite his starring role in a viral video. He'd be happy to tell you that he failed to produce his university ID card in the UCLA library, and was then asked to leave.

Being a student who probably had, you know, homework to do, he felt he was justified in his insistence on remaining there. The police were then called, and he began to leave, at which point he was tasered several times, handcuffed and then tasered again.

The police justified his tasing by noting that he went limp, which could be construed as an act of resistance. Oh...so that explains Rodney King continuing to get knocked around by L.A. cops after he fell to the ground – he was resisting arrest. The officers continued to taser Tabatabainejad because he failed to rise to his feet as per their command.

If police departments were to do any research on the impact of tasers, they might realize that one of the potential side effects of being tasered is incapacitation from five to 15 minutes. So, it is altogether possible that Tabatabainejad was entirely incapable of obeying the officers' commands, yet he was continually subjected to immense physical pain.

It seems pretty clear that police officers in many parts of our country have become emboldened to use force at even the slightest annoyance.

Anyone with a computer, an understanding of Youtube, six minutes of free time and a strong stomach can draw their own conclusions about the Tabatabainejad incident.

If that video documented the only incident of questionable use of force by police in recent times, then it would be a relatively simple discussion.

However, this is hardly an isolated occurrence – next time you're on the Internet, the magic of Google can enable you to learn about a few gentlemen who have been tasered in the last few months. One was in the middle of an epileptic seizure, according to ABC News, one was tasered for physically refusing to remove his baseball cap, according to abc12.com, and one was an unruly 17-year-old carrying a Bible in Michigan and saying he wanted Jesus, according to STLtoday.com.

Man, that is a regular Murderers' Row. Just knowing the police have protected us from them makes me feel a lot better. Oh, by the way, the 17-year-old, Roger D. Holyfield, found Jesus, after all: the tasing killed him. So much for the concept of non-lethal weapons, huh?

It seems pretty clear that police officers in many parts of our country have become emboldened to use force at even the slightest annoyance. It would seem somewhat likely that this change in tactics is due to some combination of increased powers given to law enforcement officers since the events of 9/11 and the belief that some of these newer weapons are truly not dangerous.

Clearly, as the tragic death of the 17-year-old in Michigan has proven, that is a fallacy.

We must reexamine both the usage of non-lethal weapons by law enforcement officers, and each and every circumstance in which police utilize violence in any of its forms. It would seem that police officers should be authorized to use force only in situations where the lives of civilians or officers are in jeopardy. It would seem preposterous to suggest that such a standard was met in any of these incidents.

If the officers involved are found to have used force unnecessarily, they should be treated as any civilian who harmed another person would be. If a moral distinction can not be drawn between those who uphold our laws and those who break them, then the law enforcement system as we know it will be in need of a radical overhaul. What would truly be shocking (pun intended), is if further incidents of this type continue to pop up in our sights.

Rangeling in the draft

Ben Duffy

Rep. Charles Rangel (D-NY) wants to bring back military conscription. Just after this month's Democratic victories in the House and Senate, Rep. Rangel resurrected an old idea that he had previously proposed in January of 2003. According to CNN.com, "Under his [2003] bill, the draft would apply to men and women ages 18 to 26; exemptions would be granted to allow people to graduate from high school, but college students would have to serve."

The bill failed miserably, with two in favor and 402 against. Just this month, Rangel dragged his draft proposal out again, although he is getting almost no support from the incoming Democratic leadership. Rangel's newest proposal would offer civil service alternatives for those who do not want to take up arms.

"Young people (would) commit themselves to a couple of years in service to this great republic, whether it's our seaports, our airports, in schools, in hospitals," said Rangel to the Associated Press.

Rangel is not a hawk, and has been against the Iraq War since day one. His proposed draft is intended to make the American public think long and hard about who is bearing the brunt of military service in this country.

According to the Associated Press, "Rangel, a veteran of the Korean War who has unsuccessfully sponsored legislation on conscription in the past, has said the all-volunteer military disproportionately puts the burden of war on minorities and lower-income families."

Actually, I agree with Rangel on this point, even if I think that he's being partially disingenuous. One problem is that the Left said pretty much the same thing about the draft during the Vietnam War. Young men who went to college could defer their military service, and many used academia as a "draft shelter" in which they waited out the entire war.

Minorities and poor whites with fewer educational opportunities ended up doing the grunt work in Vietnam, while middle-class and wealthy men hung around campus. So, it's impossible to please the Left on this issue. When there was a draft, they were against it because it was "racist" and "classist," and now that we have an all-volunteer force, they're against it...because it's "racist" and "classist." It seems that the only system they would approve would be a draft without college deferments and without alternative service. Under such a system, no one would be exempt from military service, not even the Bush twins.

Does anyone really want that? I certainly don't. It would work worse than the Vietnam-era draft, which is why I don't understand the Rangel bill. He says that he wants all Americans to share the duties of military service, but then he creates a huge loophole in the form of alternative civil service. I surmise that all of those young people who are not enlisting now would not enlist under Rangel's plan either. They would simply take the civil service alternative, and Rangel's plan would fail to better distribute the duties of military service.

Rangel's plan would fail to reach its intended goal, but that does not mean the goal is without merit. Actually, what concerns me is the thought that some people in this country think they are too good for military service and would never even consider it.

When I was a young 18-year-old trainee at Fort Leonard Wood, I remember feeling an intense culture shock. I was thrown into a world that bore no resemblance to the white, middle-class New England environment that I left behind for a world in which half the population seemed to speak with a Southern drawl.

New York Rep. Charles Rangel, a Democrat, wants to reinstate the draft, but what are his motivations?

As a 23-year-old veteran just out of the Army, I had to experience some reverse culture shock as I readjusted myself to the UMass student body, a largely white, middle-class, New England conglomeration. I still think that those who subscribe to Rangel's philosophy often exaggerate and misunderstand the economic and racial disparities within the military, but Rep. Rangel does have a point.

So, why not adopt the Rangel plan? I suspect that if we did, most young Americans would select the civil service alternative rather than join the service. I have difficulty calling it a draft at all, since no one would be actually forced to serve.

Instead, let's say that all young Americans would be required to perform a period of national service. How you choose to fulfill that service is up to you. If you want to spend your two years as airborne infantry, then that's your decision. If you'd rather work in a civilian capacity, you could be placed in a hospital or school. The point is that everyone does his part, from the farmer's son to the senator's daughter.

Rep. Rangel is not usually someone I agree with, and I am suspicious of his motives in this situation. Nonetheless, I don't believe that the Rangel plan is entirely bad. For maximum shock value, he seems intent on calling it a "draft," which it really isn't. It's a call to national service, and that's something that I completely support.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

DRIVERS ARE PEOPLE TOO

This is in response to the article "This isn't elementary school" (Nov. 17) by Anthony David Ruell.

It can be trying to be a pedestrian on this campus and Mr. Ruell has my sympathies. However, I believe that he is wrong. I support, and am grateful for, UMPD's efforts to better regulate pedestrian traffic on campus.

As a commuting student, I am frustrated with pedestrians who show a complete lack of regard for not only the proper use of, but also sometimes the very existence of crosswalks; it's unsafe and rude.

In the state of Massachusetts, pedestrians have the right of way and rightly so. However, this does not excuse a pedestrian from the responsibility of first making sure it is safe before crossing the street. Nor does it mean pedestrians have the right to cross the street wherever they like, crosswalk or no.

When driving on Mass. Ave. I slam on my brakes for people who have decided that the rules do not apply to them and they can just waltz into traffic whenever and wherever they please. I am often stuck in traffic on Mass. Ave. while pedestrians cross at the intersection at Sunset Ave. single file, giving no polite recognition to drivers.

I once witnessed a driver who was so frustrated with this kind of behavior that he cried out from his car to those crossing the street to please, give him a break and let him pass.

Mr. Ruell bemoans the fact that UMPD has posted crossing guards at the aforementioned intersection. This makes him late for class and makes him feel as if he is being treated like he is in elementary school. I too know what it feels like to be late for class. Single file parades of inconsiderate pedestrians have taught me that I need to allow extra time to get to class. But now, thanks to the crossing guards, we can once again participate in that long forgotten common courtesy known as taking turns.

With cooperation, we can all get to where we need to be in a timely fashion. If Mr. Ruell does not like having to yield to the automobile traffic, I take this opportunity to point out to him that elusive piece of the UMass landscape known as the Southwest tunnel.

Underneath the intersection in question is a tunnel designed exclusively for pedestrian use. Using the tunnel requires no more effort or time than to cross the street. If Mr. Ruell still prefers to cross the street, there are a half dozen other crosswalks on Mass. Ave. at which no crossing guards are posted.

My greatest frustration is with what I believe lies at the heart of this issue; a disregard of basic manners in our University community. I believe that we would all experience a dramatic decrease in stress if we could all take a few seconds every day to not be so self-centered and to respect the needs of the people around us. As a driver, I am happy to yield to pedestrian traffic. All I ask is that pedestrians be considerate too.

If pedestrians do not want to be treated like they are in elementary school, I suggest that they do not act like they still are.

DISSIPATING THE SMOKE

I am writing in regard to the editorial "Butts should be banned" written by Debbie Friedman.

I think she makes a number of important points that smokers should take into consideration the next time they light up in a public place. I would like to add that according to the 2006 U.S. Surgeon General's report, "[s]econdhand smoke causes premature death and disease in children and in adults who do not smoke," and "[e]xposure of adults to secondhand smoke has immediate adverse effects on the cardiovascular system and causes coronary heart disease and lung cancer."

Why is it that asbestos and lead paint, both known carcinogens, are regulated and no longer allowed in buildings, but a mother can smoke a cigarette while holding her infant, exposing that child to more than 60 chemical compounds that are known or suspected to cause cancer?

Why is it that I should trouble myself just to breathe clean air when a person smoking a cigarette sits next to me on a bench, or have to pick up the pace to walk around a smoker whose smoke is blowing in my face on the way to class?

And more importantly, why would anyone put $5 of their hard earned money into the pocket of a corrupt corporation in exchange for a box of 20 little chances to destroy his/her own body?

That being said, I encourage students who feel the same way to take a proactive approach. Changes in regulations that affect smoking policies come as a result of people voicing their opinions and working against the norm.

There are organizations on campus such as Colleges Against Cancer and the Student Health Advisory Board that are aimed at providing students with information about smoking and resources for those who are interested in quitting.

If we can convince people that their lungs are worth saving, then the problem will solve itself. It's true that smokers have every right to smoke their cigarettes if they choose, but they should be considerate enough to do so in a bubble.

The latest in DVDs, TV and celebrity news

BY MONICA GLEBERMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

There are many movies coming out on DVD this week; first you have the movie "You, Me and Dupree." Some people might say this is the movie that helped to start the relationship between Kate Hudson and Owen Wilson.

However, this movie doesn't seem to have that much of a connection with audiences. It has received pretty dull reviews. The premise is basically about two newlyweds, Carl (Matt Dillon) and Molly (Kate Hudson), who find their blissful life rudely interrupted when Carl's slacker pal Dupree (Owen Wilson) moves in after losing his job. While the romantic comedy scores a few cheap laughs, the movie is more about the chemistry between Hudson and Wilson verses anything else.

Another movie coming out this week on DVD is, "An Inconvenient Truth." This movie has received a lot of buzz and mainly good reviews. Former Vice President Al Gore uses this documentary to discuss global warming and its effects on the Earth. In US Weekly this movie received four stars and has been seriously suggested to audiences.

Finally you have "Scoop" coming out on DVD. This comedy stars Woody Allen and Scarlett Johansson. "Scoop" deals with an American journalist (Johansson) living in London who falls for an aristocrat, played by Hugh Jackman. However, things are never simple in an Allen film. Johansson thinks that Jackman could be a serial killer. But most of the jokes fall flat and this film received no more than two stars throughout the media.

Now onto new movie releases this week; the animated penguin tale of "Happy Feet," released by Time Warner Inc's Warner Bros., earned $37.9 million over the three-day weekend. Between the United States and Canada, it has earned a two-week box office total of $100.1 million, making this film finish at the top spot.

The latest James Bond movie, "Casino Royale," featuring actor Daniel Craig as the newest Bond, pulled in $31 million, bringing its U.S. total for two weeks to $94.2 million. The film's distributor, Sony Corp's Columbia Pictures, said "Casino Royale's" worldwide sales of $224.4 million put it on track to become the biggest Bond flick ever.

"Déjà Vu," a time-traveling thriller starring Denzel Washington, took the third box office slot to become the top debuting film for the week. The film's $20.8 million in ticket sales propelled Washington to his seventh straight opening of $20 million or more, according to the Walt Disney Co., whose Touchstone Pictures division released "Déjà Vu." Stay tuned for a full review of "Déjà Vu" this week in the Arts and Living section.

All three of these movies have been released to mixed reviews. However, audiences have nothing but glowing things to say. I suggest going out this weekend and checking out one or all of these three films. They were truly amazing, funny and full of intrigue.

'Broken News' at UMass

BY MORGAN-ANN ROUSSEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Tomorrow at 5 p.m. there will be an opening reception at the Student Union Art Gallery at the University of Massachusetts to commence the opening of artist Mary Bernstein's exhibit, "Broken News: 9/11/01-9/11/02- Looking Back from 2006."

The exhibit, originally called "Breaking News," is a collection of paintings and collages that consist of 53 double-sided panels. Each panel represents one week of the year beginning on the tragic date of Sep. 11, 2001 until Sep. 11, 2002. One side of the panels have collages of news headlines and images arranged with the artist's personal material and reflections, while the other sides have Bernstein's original painting.

"Broken News" also uses news headlines from 2006. These more recent stories are color coded by subject and connected by strings that create a cumulative web of this year's events.

Bernstein is an alumnus of UMass Amherst's Bachelor of Fine Arts program in painting. Now an accomplished New England artist, Bernstein has exhibited at the UMass Central Gallery, Hampshire College, University of Southern Maine and The Christine Pace Gallery.

The opening reception tomorrow evening is free of charge, as is the exhibition, which runs until Dec. 8. The artist will give a talk at the opening ceremony.

FRIDAY DEC. 8

- "1 vs. 100" on NBC at 8 p.m.
- "America's Funniest Home Videos" on ABC at 8 p.m.
- "Las Vegas" on NBC at 9 p.m.
- "Frosty the Snow Man" on CBS at 9 p.m.
- "Trading Spouses" on FOX at 9 p.m.

SATURDAY DEC. 9

- "Cops" on FOX at 8 p.m.
- "Dateline NBC" on NBC at 8 p.m.
- "Deal or No Deal" on CNBC at 8 p.m.
- "40 Year-Old Virgin" on HBO at 8 p.m.
- "40 Greatest Metal Songs" on VH1 at 9 p.m.

AS FOR THE LATEST CELEBRITY NEWS:

O.J. Simpson was going to write a tell-all book about how he would have killed his wife. At the last minute, due to serious backlash from audiences, Fox pulled the idea.

Michael Richards, well-known as Kramer from the comedy hit "Seinfeld," was caught on tape saying some racial slurs to rude audience members during a comedy performance. He later went on David Letterman to make apologies. He has recently hired a high-profile public relations team to help with the backlash from fans.

"Bobby," a movie about Robert Kennedy's last hours debuted on Thanksgiving Day. Many celebrities appear throughout the film. This is Emilo Estevez's first picture that seems to be doing well in the box office.

Yoko Ono wants the day that her husband, John Lennon, died to become a national recognized day of world healing.

There was a recent rumor floating around on the Internet that Tom Hanks had died while shooting a scene for an upcoming film. Later news reports explain that it was a hoax, and Tom Hanks is alive and well.

Estevez ran into difficulty getting backers for RFK film

BY GLENN LOVELL
SAN JOSE MERCURY NEWS

Emilio Estevez knows exactly where he was the day Robert F. Kennedy was gunned down in the kitchen of the Ambassador Hotel in Los Angeles. It was just after midnight West Coast time on June 5, 1968. Estevez, the older brother of Charlie Sheen and son of future "West Wing" television show president Martin Sheen, had just turned 6.

"We were staying at my grandmother's house in Ohio, and I remember seeing the news on television and running upstairs to tell my father, 'Bobby's been shot!'" recalls Estevez, the writer, director and co-star of "Bobby," a sprawling drama about the hours leading up to the assassination.

Estevez recalls, "The following year, when we relocated to Los Angeles, the first stop we made was the Ambassador Hotel."

You might say Estevez was fated to make the film "Bobby." He does. One by one, he ticks off the times his and Kennedy's paths crossed. His actor-activist father worked on Robert Kennedy's Senate campaign in New York. Emilio, age 5, shook hands with candidate Kennedy at a victory rally.

"I only really remember it as fold," he clarifies. "That's how it lives in my mind."

The memory obviously became more vivid as the years passed because the former Brat Packer and star of "The Mighty Ducks" movie became obsessed with a different kind of biopic – one that would concentrate not on Robert Kennedy, but on the guests and workers at the Ambassador Hotel who rubbed shoulders with the candidate.

Anthony Hopkins, Freddy Rodriguez, Elijah Wood, Lindsay Lohan, Sharon Stone, Laurence Fishburne, Harry Belafonte, Martin Sheen and Demi Moore, Estevez's former co-star and fiancée, play the roles of people who are among those in gunshot range when assassinator Sirhan Sirhan appears at the door of the Ambassador.

Estevez plays the husband and manager of a broken-down nightclub singer (Moore).

But Bobby, who's glimpsed in newsreels and heard delivering impassioned civil rights speeches, remains a small player in the movie bearing his name.

And this caused no end of consternation when it came to securing financing in Hollywood. Ultimately, Estevez went abroad to Belgium for the $10 million necessary to make the film. It helped that Oscar-winner Hopkins, who plays a retired doorman, committed early.

He became "an actor magnet," says Estevez. "Word got around town fast, and it became a matter of who you said 'no' to, not who you said 'yes' to."

Still, Estevez got the royal runaround at the major studios. The movie about Bobby that wasn't really about Bobby was discussed, considered, passed on for six years.

He winces as he recalls the "merry-go-round" meetings.

"We'd sit down and the financiers would say, 'Well, there's no central character on which to hang your hat. Who's the star?' I'd answer, 'Well, Bobby's the star.' They'd come back with, 'If Bobby's the star, why isn't it a biopic?'"

Estevez's ready retort: Because it's a movie about the spirit of Robert Kennedy and how it needs to be revived in these hard times. "At its heart," he told potential backers, "it's a movie about all of us."

It didn't help that Estevez had been out of the spotlight, raising a family and developing other projects. In the eyes of some, he was still the teen star of such Brat Pack comedies as "The Breakfast Club."

"Hollywood is a cruel, unforgiving place," he says. "It's all about 'What have you done for me lately?' And I haven't done anything for anyone. I've been trying to figure out the next phase of my life and career and keep the wolf from the door."

As for Brat Pack stigma, that's your problem, not his. "I just wish everybody else could move past it, like I have."

Co-star Joshua Jackson, who plays a Kennedy campaign worker, still can't believe the hoops Estevez had to jump through. "It feels like such a no-brainer," he says. "But back then, the political situation wasn't correct and 'Crash' hadn't made a splash. Also, Emilio hadn't directed a film in a couple of years."

The surprise success of the multiple-narrative "Crash," which won the best picture Oscar in 2005, brought "Bobby" back into play. Belgium industrialist Michel Litvak finally anted up the $10 million budget. He was looking for a vehicle for his Russian wife, Svetlana Metkina, eventually cast as an eager Czech journalist.

"It took a European, a foreigner, to see the wisdom of this project," says Estevez, savoring the irony. "I was resistant to it at first because it's an American film about an American icon. But it worked, and opened us up to the European market."

William H. Macy and Joshua Jackson star among an eclectic allstar cast in recently released film, "Bobby."

Emilio Estevez, who wrote and directed "Bobby," considers the film 'a disaster movie of the heart.'

Meet the chef behind McDonald's menu, serving 25 million a day

BY NANCY LUNA
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

SANTA ANA, Calif. – Not too long ago McDonald's executive chef Dan Coudreaut created dishes ranging from roasted duck to glazed ahi tuna at fine dining restaurants in New York and Dallas.

But, this week, Coudreaut – a top graduate of the Culinary Institute of America – took on one of the oddest food challenges of his career. Creating hors d'oeuvres from core McDonald's ingredients.

Chef Dan Coudreaut, Director of Culinary Innovation at McDonald's USA, started out as a restaurant dish washer at age 14.

During a media event dubbed McGourmet, Coudreaut served a quarter-size toasted canapé made from Big Mac ingredients, a shooter glass filled with yogurt, granola and fresh fruit and a bruschetta parmesan cone made with diced hamburger tomatoes.

While these bite size pieces will never show up on any McDonald's menu, Coudreaut said he created them to "showcase the quality of the base of ingredients" used at the world's largest, and most scrutinized, hamburger chain.

But McDonald's observers say it's no coincidence that the demonstration comes on the heels of next week's debut of the film "Fast Food Nation," a fictionalized version of the 2001 best selling book that examined the health risks associated with America's zest for fast food. The movie centers on contaminated food found at "Mickey's Fast Food Restaurant" chain, home of "The Big One."

"I think they're going on the offensive before the movie is released," said Richard Adams, a former longtime McDonald's executive who now acts as a consultant to the chain's franchisees.

Still, Adams said McDonald's shouldn't worry too much. "The quality of their food is as good or better as what you buy at the grocery store."

Coudreaut – a former chef at the Four Seasons in Dallas, Texas – tried to emphasize that point during a recent meeting with Southern California reporters at the chain's City of Industry production plant. Here's what he had to say to reporter Nancy Luna:

Luna: So, you're promoting your quality ingredients today. Can you address when you will go zero trans fat?

Coudreaut: Good question. It's top of mind for a lot of people. As far as a timeline for when that will happen, I'm not the best person to talk about it.

Luna: But you are working in that direction?

Coudreaut: Yes – extremely hard and have been for a number of years. We've been successful in reducing trans fat in some of our chicken products. We're not there yet. We are definitely working towards that.

Luna: Why is this process so difficult?

Coudreaut: It's crucially important that our French fries, and our products, stay gold standard within the industry.

Luna: So the challenge is in the taste.

Coudreaut: There's a challenge in a lot of areas (such as) making sure we have enough of this oil. But I know from my perspective, as chef of McDonald's, I want to make sure the taste we built our brand on is not negatively impacted.

Luna: With the "Fast Food Nation" movie coming out, does that put a lot pressure on you because you represent the food of McDonald's?

Coudreaut: It doesn't challenge me in particular. I make sure we have great products on our menu. Since 'Fast Food Nation' (came out) and other movies (like that) our guests are voting with their feet. We're serving a million more guests this year than we did last year. I don't think it's relevant. It's a buzz. I focus on what I can control, and make sure our food is relevant to our guests. (McDonald's spokesman Bill Whitman said Wednesday that the film is "not reflective of the McDonald's brand.")

Luna: I imagine there's a vast difference between working at a five-star restaurant to fast food. Fill us in.

Coudreaut: At the Four Seasons, I had countless ingredients (to work with) here, I don't. (There), I was working with culinary professionals that went to school to be a chef. Here, at McDonald's, I don't have that skill set in the restaurants. So my job, in the front end, has to be buttoned up, and thought through. I have to make sure my recipes are something that (cooks) can execute.

Luna: I hear there are more changes on tap for the kids' meals. Can you talk about his?

Coudreaut: We're working on the kids' side of the menu, on the dessert side, and beverage side. I don't have anything I can share with you because our competition would like to know what's going on. It would be fair to say we are always looking (to make sure) the kids menu is relevant, and offers proper choices.

Luna: Childhood obesity is a big issue. You scrapped the "super size" option on the main menu, but why do you still offer the "Mighty" meal kids option?

Coudreaut: Again, choices. Kids might have a bigger appetite than my 5-year-old who is perfectly happy with the chicken McNuggets we have.

Luna: When you took this job, was your directive to come up with healthier menu options? (Coudreaut introduced the Asian, and fruit and walnut salads, the snack wrap and the premium chicken sandwich line.)

Coudreaut: It was never a directive to come up with something healthy. That would imply that our menu is not healthy. And that's not the case. My goal is to make sure we go in all directions (with food). If I develop a salad, I want to make sure it's wonderful. If I create a banana split, I want to make sure the banana split is wonderful.

Luna: How many products do you look at in a year?

Coudreaut: About 1,500 to 1,800.

Luna: Wow. That's a lot. Can you tell me about one that failed?

Coudreaut: When we looked how we could use the Chicken Select in another form, we put it in a quesadilla and wrapped it. I thought it would be cool, but when we put it front of guests, they said, 'Eh, not that great.' But when we simply (took) chicken and added ranch dressing, lettuce, cheese and wrapped it, people gravitated to it. (This item, the Snack Wrap, was introduced this year and has been credited by the chain for boosting sales at stores.)

Luna: Do you let your kids eat at McDonald's?

Coudreaut: Yes. My 2-year-old loves the French fries and the apple dippers, and my daughter loves the nuggets and Chicken Selects.

Luna: Do you limit how much they can eat there?

Coudreaut: Yes, once or twice a week.

Luna: And you?

Coudreaut: I'm a Big Mac guy.

Luna: People must ask you constantly, "Why did you scrap a career at the Four Seasons for McDonald's?"

Coudreaut: Yes. But when you talk (them) through it, and they see the impact you can have, they are envious at times.

Luna: What is that impact?

Coudreaut: I took the job at McDonald's because I grew up with McDonald's. As a chef, to have impact on 25 million people a day is extremely exciting.

The menu is great as it stands, and if I can make it a little better when I leave, then I'm a winner.

Rematch set for Saturday

pass to tight end Brad Listorti, but Johnson stepped in front and came down with the ball.

It was Coen's first interception since UMass' game against Towson on Oct. 14.

Lafayette got on the scoreboard three plays later. Two rushes by Jonathan Hurt netted the Leopards eight yards to the UMass 26-yard line. The next play, quarterback Brad Maurer threw to wide receiver Shaun Adair for the score. He lined up on the right side and streaked up the sideline. Maurer floated the ball into the widebout's hands with the clock reading 1:23 remaining in the first half.

The Leopards got the ball right back after Courtney Robinson fumbled on the ensuing kickoff. The sophomore fielded the ball inside his own 10 and charged up the field. Kickoff returns are a strength for the Minutemen this season, but not this time.

Poised to break a big return, Robinson brought the ball past the UMass 40-yard line where he tried splitting two defenders. Adrian Lawson punched the ball out of Robinson's grasp, and it fell to the turf. Shaun Adair fell on the loose ball, giving the Leopards great field position for the second consecutive drive.

This time it only took Lafayette two plays to push the ball across the goal line. After a two-yard pass from Maurer to Hurt, UMass linebacker Charles Walker was flagged for pass interference the next play, setting up 1st-and-10 for the Leopards from the UMass 31-yard line.

That's when Maurer connected for his second touchdown pass in just over one minute of play. Duaine Dorsey hauled in the 31-yard strike. The junior wide receiver caught the ball in the middle of the field then made a cut towards the right side and scampered into the end zone.

All of a sudden the Minutemen's 21-point lead evaporated into just a seven-point advantage. UMass tried one pass play on the ensuing drive, but it fell incomplete and Coen took a knee to close out the half.

Senior safety and captain James Ihedigbo said the Minutemen talked at halftime about the importance of coming out strong in the second half after the late first-half collapse.

The UMass defense got its first chance to do that when Christian Kiegel punted the ball after the Minutemen went three-and-out on their first drive. Lafayette recorded one first down, but the UMass defense held and forced a punt at the Leopards' own 36.

Jason Hatchell brought an early ending to Lafayette's next drive. The Leopards went back and forth on the drive because of false start and holding penalties. On 2nd-and-19 Maurer completed a pass to Dorsey at the Lafayette 25-yard line. Hatchell forced the ball out and defensive back Michael Meggett fell on it.

Six plays later, Coen tossed a touchdown pass to tight end Ian Jorgenson, and the UMass defense achieved one of its goals.

"On our goal board for defense, we want to have a third-quarter shut-out," Ihedigbo said. "Guys executed and every play the coach called we executed to the best of our abilities."

Ihedigbo forced a turnover of his own midway through the fourth that set up UMass' final scoring drive. After dropping a sure pick earlier in the game, Ihedigbo said he owed it to his teammates to come up with another one. He caught the ball at his own 21-yard line and brought it 59 yards to Lafayette's 20.

Two plays later, Coen hit senior wide receiver Brandon London in the end zone for an 18-yard score. It was a beautiful play on both ends, as Coen lobbed the ball up to the back of the end zone, and London snatched it while having the body control to keep his feet in bounds.

UMass held Lafayette one more time before getting the ball back and ending the game with kneel downs. The Minutemen scored their first-half touchdowns on two rushes by Steve Baylark and Mike Omar's first catch since Sept. 15 against Villanova.

Baylark comes up big when it counts finished the day with 152 yards on the ground for 6.3 yards per carry.

Baylark got the call on the first three UMass plays. He broke the second for a 15-yard gain and Coen hit London on a play-action fake down to the Lafayette 14 on the next pass play.

"That's the best thing for me this year," Coen said. "Whenever we start the game and [Baylark] is busting runs, it's a lot easier for me. That's what happens when you have a tailback like Stevie."

Inside the 20-yard line is Baylark's territory, and Coen handed off to him two more times to get the Minutemen down to the 8-yard line on UMass' first drive. On 3rd-and-2 it was Baylark again. He burrowed forward into a UMass offensive lineman in mid-block, spun off to the left, regained his footing, broke to the outside and jogged into the end-zone untouched.

The drive went for 60 yards on seven plays and put the Minutemen up by a touchdown in a hurry.

"As a former tailback I certainly appreciate a guy with that ability," Lafayette coach Frank Tavani said about Baylark. "He's a strong back and he breaks tackles. Like all the great ones are, he's determined, and you have to take their legs out because otherwise he's going to make a big play."

"I thought Steve played really well and did a great job leading us as always," UMass coach Don Brown said.

Brown rested easy knowing that he had an experienced and effective tailback to give the ball to at the beginning of the game. It was complete domination at the onset, as UMass ate the clock and trudged down the field, the defense tiring with every snap.

"I thought Steve played really well and did a great job leading us as always," Brown said.

Offensive linemen Alex Miller and David Thompson cleared the way for Baylark, who rushed six times in UMass' first possession, including a 15-yard breakout run and the touchdown finisher.

Baylark showcased his new-found break-out speed on his second touchdown run. On a 1st-and-10 play from the Lafayette 26-yard line, Coen handed off to Baylark who sped up the middle for five yards, cut to the outside when he got past the linebackers, then cut it back inside to avoid the cornerback.

It was open field from there, as Baylark separated himself from the pack and sprinted into the end zone for the Minutemen's second touchdown of the game and a 14-0 lead.

"All week coach has been telling me to run hard and just keep doing what you're doing," Baylark said. "Today was a good day to establish the run game so Liam could get some easy passes."

Coen was an efficient 9-for-15 for 151 yards, including several big plays on play-action passes that worked because of Baylark's early effectiveness.

"Usually [Baylark is] a little slower, but he gets better as the quarters get going," Coen said. "If we hit a big pass, then he'll hit a big run – it's kind of worked like that all year. But we were riding him for those first few series. At one point, I don't think we threw the ball for five, six, seven plays.

"We wanted to come into the game and make a statement on the ground, especially with the way that the defense is molded," he added. "There was definitely something about him. He was possessed."

Lafayette's 1,000-yard running back, Jonathan Hurt, was Baylark's high school opponent when he played in Division 6A in Florida. In that matchup, Baylark's team shut down Hurt and the Minutemen shut him down on Saturday. Hurt finished with just 41 yards on 16 carries against the Minutemen.

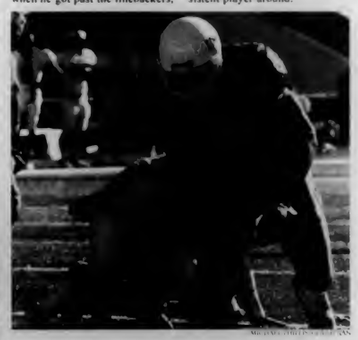
Baylark outdistanced his old running mate by 111 yards.

"[My teammates] were giving me a hard time about the guy I played against in high school, Jonathan Hurt, who I played against during my senior year in high school. It was the first round of the playoffs, and we shut him down. We had a nice defense that year. And after the game we were talking about déjà vu and all of that stuff. It was definitely fun to see a guy that I played against in high school."

It was Baylark's day. He was the key to the team's offensive success and partly responsible for the freshness of the defense.

It is only fitting that in the biggest game of the year, No. 5 took center stage.

Now it's New Hampshire – a bigger stage in a bigger game. All signs point to another solid performance from the most consistent player around.



The No. 3 Minutemen will need another strong performance from captain Steve Baylark when they host UNH this Saturday.

USF gives Minutewomen first loss of year

BY ELI ROSENSWAIKE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Failed attempts on uncontested shots from 15 feet quelled any hopes of staying undefeated for the Massachusetts women's basketball team (5-1) on Sunday afternoon against South Florida (6-0).

The 86-63 loss in the finals of the Best Western Roundball Classic denied the Minutewomen from claiming their second consecutive tournament title and improving its 6-0 for the first time since the 1978-79 season.

The Maroon and White made it difficult on itself by missing many close looks at the basket, en route to a 21-for-56 shooting performance. It only connected on a single three-pointer and missed 17 of its 35 free-throw attempts, good for only 51.4 percent.

"Today's game was a little disappointing," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said. "We got the ball where we wanted to, but we missed too many free throws and too many layups. Getting to the line 35 times is nice, but it doesn't help your cause when you shoot just over 50 percent."

Senior forward Tamara Tatham led the way for the Minutewomen, recording her second straight double-double with 19 points and 12 rebounds. Junior co-captains Kate Mills and Alisha Tatham also scored in double digits, but the trio of leading scorers combined to miss 10 shots from the charity stripe.

"We didn't finish our easy looks at the basket inside and we didn't hit our free throws," Mills said. "We probably cost ourselves 30 points from the missed free throws and layups alone. Making those would have kept us in the game."

UMass	71
SFA	63
UMass	61
USF	86

The USF Bulls took control of the paint, out-rebounding UMass 48-36. They came out hot from the perimeter, connecting on five of their six three-point attempts. The shots were falling from unexpected places as 6-foot-5 center Stephanie Sarosi was perfect on her three shots from the outside.

Sophomore guard Shantia Grace was perfect on her two attempts from deep and recorded a game-high 20 points and eight assists. The Minutewomen struggled to contain senior forward Jessica Dickinson, who scored 15 points despite sitting down early because of foul trouble. Dickinson finished third in the nation in scoring last season, averaging 22 points per contest.

"They [USF] are a very good team," Dacko said. "I'm happy with Tamara Tatham coming out of her shell this weekend and giving us consecutive double-doubles, but we're a team that needs everybody playing together all the time. It can't just be one here or one there."

The Bulls controlled the paint rather handily, blocking nine Minutewomen shots and grabbing 20 offensive rebounds. The perimeter was in their control as well, as they scored 21 more points than UMass from behind the three-point line.

The high turnover rate continues to be a problem for UMass, committing 17 turnovers in the loss – including eight from Alisha Tatham.

"South Florida just came in and had their way with us on the boards, and we got pushed around a little bit," Mills said. "We definitely had high hopes for today's game, but I guess we just didn't execute like we should have."

"We needed to execute better and give them less at the basket," Dacko said. "They were a very physical and athletic team, and have a great scorer in Dickinson. We need to take care of the basketball. We had a lot of unforced errors that we need to remedy fast to give us better scoring opportunities."

Preceding the loss to South Florida, the Minutewomen defeated Stephen F. Austin, 71-63, on Saturday to advance to the finals of the tournament. UMass trailed by as many as 14 points, and trailed 37-25 at the half. The Minutewomen dominated inside in the second half to pull away with their fifth straight victory.

The Ladyjacks (4-3) cooled off considerably in the second half and their three players in double figures weren't enough in the end. Tamara Tatham led UMass in both scoring (15 points) and rebounding, just like she did against USF. Mills and junior Pam Rosanio each added 12 points.

"We dug ourselves in a hole, but I was happy with the way we came back," Dacko said. "Our kids played with a lot of determination and guts; they stayed with it and believed that they could win."

The Minutewomen's familiar trends continued, as they turned the ball over repeatedly and headed to the free-throw line more than their opponent. With 16 successful second half free-throws, they were able to overcome their 21 turnovers in the game.

Both Tatham and Kate Mills were rewarded after the loss to USF with spots on the All-Tournament team. That marks the second such honor for Mills in as many tournaments.

Biggest game for UM in recent memory

Ball. The Minutemen lost both of their next three games and missed the playoffs for the second year in a row.

This season, UMass returned the favor with a 28-20 victory in Durham. Freeman John Hatchell deflected a screen pass on 4th-and-goal to end the game.

Devastating losses have been dealt back and forth over the last two years, but this one has bigger implications. UMass has a mighty task ahead. It was hard enough to defeat UNH one time this season, so twice is a tall order.

UMass dominated the Wildcats in the first half, establishing Steve Baylark on the ground and going downfield for big plays, including a touchdown throw from Liam Coen to Rancher. It was 21-3 at halftime and, despite Santos decent numbers, suffocated the Wildcats' offense for the majority of the half.

Then the tides turned. Brown knew that a potent offense couldn't be contained for 60 minutes, and he was right. The Minutemen threw everything they had at Santos in the first half and forced him into some bad reads and throws.

In the second half, Coen and Baylark couldn't get going and the offense managed just seven points against the hard-charging Wildcats. Santos found his groove and diced the defense for 17 unanswered points before Hatchell made the fateful deflection with less than 20 seconds left in the game.

Santos, using the spread-option package, had his way with UMass in the second half. UNH coach Sean McDonnell kept Coen off-balance and limited Baylark on the ground.

So what happens Saturday? Will it be the first half or the second half? Both coaches will go blind on game tapes this week. Brown will try to figure out how to prevent his defense from weakening in the shotgun formation and McDonnell will watch the second half of the regular season game and try to duplicate that performance.

So let the endless hype begin. This is the most important game in recent memory for both programs – and don't let anyone tell you different.

Senior running back Steve Baylark rushed for 152 yards and scored two touchdowns in Saturday's 35-14 win over Lafayette. The No. 3 Minutemen host New Hampshire in the Division I Quarterfinals on Saturday at 2:30 p.m. in a rematch from the regular season.

Just when the Massachusetts football team appeared on its way to another blowout victory, Lafayette woke up at the end of the first half and made a game of it on Saturday.

UMass (11-1) held a commanding three-score lead deep into the second quarter when the Leopards (6-6) took advantage of some Minutemen turnovers and miscues to pull within seven points. But the home team stormed back in the second half and won the opening-round game of the Division I Football Championship, 35-14, at McGuirk Alumni Stadium.

The Minutemen square off with New Hampshire this Saturday in Amherst, in what is the rematch of one of Division I-AA's biggest games this season. UMass defeated the Wildcats 28-20 on Nov. 4 in Durham, N.H.

UMass coach Don Brown credited Saturday's victory once again to his team's ability to deal with adversity.

"I think the character of this football team kind of showed through – every time things start to get a little bit tight, we just kind of hang together and come together," he said. "I thought we came out and just responded well [in the second half] and did what we had to do on both sides of the ball. We took care of business."

Holding a 21-point lead with three minutes left in the first half, quarterback Liam Coen threw an interception to Lafayette's Torian Johnson. The sophomore tried threading a

It's a familiar scene.

Liam Coen takes the snap, uses a drop step and stays low. He extends his right hand and plants the ball in the stomach of No. 5, who hits the hole fast and hard.

He breaks the first tackle, shifts his weight, changes direction, picks up a few more yards before punching his helmet into a defender's numbers, dragging him an extra few paces before finally falling to the ground.

It's Steve Baylark. But you already knew that. All year long, he's pummeled into piles of linemen and linebackers, and popped out with his feet pumping. It draws the inevitable, 'How did he do that?'

Baylark has been cutting up defenses for a long time. He is in the midst of his fourth 1,000-yard rushing season. He gained 1,177 yards as a freshman, 1,138 as a sophomore, 1,057 as a junior and has 1,460 after Saturday's contest.

The Atlantic 10 named him its Co-Offensive Player of the Year and put him on the All-Conference First Team. Baylark is second on UMass' all-time rushing list behind the Arizona Cardinals' Marcel Shipp.

On Saturday, in the Minutemen's first-round matchup against Lafayette, Baylark was better than his credentials.

He scored two touchdowns in the first quarter alone, had 100 yards after just 10 carries and

Saturday's game is the biggest in years

They all saw this coming. UMass and UNH are matched up in the second round of the Division I-AA playoffs.

This is the most important football game on the UMass campus in seven years. The late '90s are the glory days of UMass football. Don Brown was the defensive coordinator and Mark Whipple was the head coach. The Minutemen won the Atlantic 10 and defeated McNeese State, Lehigh, Northwestern State and Georgia Southern to win the Division I-AA National Championship.

In 2003, Colgate defeated UMass 19-7 in the first round of the postseason, and UMass hasn't appeared in the NCAA Tournament since.

Now, the Minutemen play the rival Wildcats in the quarterfinals – and the loser goes home.

UMass had to fight through its first-round matchup to get to the quarterfinals, and with UNH looming there was a significant opportunity to forget about Lafayette.

When UMass' game ended at around 3:30 on Saturday, the Minutemen made their way to the locker room for the postgame celebrations. At that point, UNH was in the midst of a battle with Hampton.

The Wildcats were down, 35-34, while Brown and select players answered questions in the postgame press conference. Someone in the conference room shouted out the score of the game, and a reporter asked Brown and his players the obvious question: "Does it matter to you who you play?"

The answer, of course, was no.

"We're here," Brown deadpanned.

But it did matter who the Minutemen played. Brown knew it and the players knew it. But the coach made sure that UMass did not supply any bulletin board material.

UNH slipped by Hampton with a slim 41-38 victory. I found that out at Rafters on University Drive while having a drink with the Boston Herald's Steve Buckley, who will be back next weekend to cover the anticipated game.

Rasheed Rancher and Tracy Belton were sitting to my left, and my guess was that they already knew. The Wildcats were coming to town for their first-ever meeting with UMass in the playoffs.

Belton, the senior cornerback, will matchup with David Ball again – the receiver who broke Jerry Rice's 50-touchdown mark earlier this season and caught two more scores against UMass earlier this year.

There will be a deafening amount of hype for Saturday's game, including a bulky amount on these pages.

But you won't get anything out of the UMass players. They haven't put too much emphasis on any game all year. It's been business for these guys since Sept. 2 when the Colgate Raiders became the first of many victims at the newly-turfed McGuirk.

But there is no denying the emotion and intensity in a UMass-UNH game. McGuirk Stadium, which doesn't fill up unless it's Band Day, should be packed for this one.

This rivalry, heated up last season, when the Minutemen lost, 34-28, at home to the revitalized Wildcat offense, led by walk-ons Ricky Santos and David

The holiday season imposes the "better to give than to receive" mentality every year, and the Massachusetts men's basketball team started this Thanksgiving no differently, defeating St. Francis, 63-49, on Wednesday and Jacksonville State, 100-69, on Saturday.

UMass (5-1) remains down south as it takes on Savannah State on Tuesday night at 7 p.m. The Minutemen then return home to host No. 23 Boston College on Saturday night at the Mullins Center.

It was a weekend of milestones for the Minutemen, as they continued their best start since the 1995-96 season with Saturday's blowout over Jacksonville State (1-3). UMass got off to a 26-0 start in 1995-96, and eventually reached the Final Four. Saturday night's win also marked the first time UMass scored 100 points in a game since Dec. 22, 1999.

Junior Gary Forbes continued his double-digit scoring touch, scoring a game-high 20 points in the win, and starting the season with six consecutive games in double figures. His 11 first half points gave the Maroon and White a 47-28 lead at half-time.

UMass came out of the gates strong and dominated Jacksonville State early, opening with an 18-2 run, and later gaining its largest lead of the half at 46-22 when sophomore Chris Lowe hit a three-pointer with 1:33 left in the first half.

The Minutemen finished the game with seven players in double figures. Seniors Rashaun Freeman (18 points, 10 rebounds) and Stephane Lasme (11 points, 11 rebounds) both had double-doubles. James Life (11), Brandon Thomas (10), Chris Lowe (10) and Dante Milligan (10) were the other four who tallied double-digit scoring.

UMass finished the game shooting 60 percent from the field.

Lasme led the way for the Minutemen just three days prior, posting the second triple-double in UMass history in Wednesday's win over St. Francis (N.Y.) at the Mullins Center. The first triple-double came from Al Skinner in 1973. Skinner had 28 points, 18 rebounds and 10 assists in that game.

The senior forward was named the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week thanks to his stellar performances. He averaged 12.3 points, 10.7 rebounds and 5.7 blocks in all three wins last week.

Lasme set a school-record 11 blocked shots on Wednesday, eight of which came in the second half. He finished with a game-high 19 points, 10 rebounds and 11 blocks.

UMass shot 54 percent in the second half to out-score St. Francis 34-27 in the final 20 minutes, and win its fourth game of the season. The Minutemen started the game with an 8-0 run, and held the lead for the remainder of the game, leading by as much as 16 points midway through the second half.

Along with Lasme, Freeman and Forbes finished the game with double figures in scoring. Freeman had 14 points on 6-for-8 shooting from the field and grabbed eight rebounds, while Forbes finished with 11 points of his own.

UMass dominated in the paint as well, holding a 40-28 advantage over St. Francis, and playing a big part in the win.

Penalties prove to be costly for Mass Attack

Union College put a damper on the Thanksgiving plans of the Massachusetts hockey team (6-3-1, 4-2 Hockey East), defeating the Minutemen 4-3 in Schenectady, N.Y., despite trailing the Maroon and White 2-0 after the first period.

UMass returns to action with another Tuesday night game tomorrow, as the Minutemen visit Boston University for a 7 p.m. start against the Terriers.

UMass	3
Union	4

The Mass Attack was uncharacteristic Saturday night in committing 11 penalties for 22 minutes in the loss. Entering the game, UMass was the least penalized team in the nation.

The game winner came 12:57 into the third period. The Dutchmen's Olivier Bouchard took advantage of a Jon Quick miscue to take the one-goal lead. Josh Coyle's pass from behind the net deflected off of Quick's left skate and sat just in front of the goal line. Bouchard then skated in and pushed the puck past Quick for the win.

Senior captain Matt Anderson netted his second goal of the season in the first period to start off the scoring. P.J. Fenton fed Anderson from behind the net, who beat Union goaltender Justin Mrazek through the five-hole for the 1-0 lead.

The Minutemen then doubled their lead at 15:50 on Kevin Jarman's third goal of the season. With the man advantage, a pair of freshmen assisted Jarman on the score. Martin Nolet passed to Justin Braun at the blue line. Braun shot the puck at Mrazek, and Jarman tipped it past the goalie for the early 2-0 lead.

The goal was the second this season in which Braun and Jarman have hooked up for a redirected shot for a goal. The first came in a 3-2 win at New Hampshire, a goal that was initially credited to Braun, but was ruled that Jarman got the blade of his stick on the puck and went into the net.

The second period was once again the undoing of the Minutemen, who were outshot 18-9 in the frame and gave up three goals while scoring just one of their own.

Jeff Christiansen and T.J. Fox dominated the period early, hooking up for a pair of power-play goals to tie the score at two goals apiece in the first five minutes of the second.

The Minutemen's David Leaderer was called for a roughing penalty for contact to the head of a Union player. The Dutchmen took advantage with Christiansen picking up a rebound in the crease and putting it past Quick. Fox earned the assist with the initial shot.

The pair earned points again just over three minutes later, this time with Christiansen tipping a shot from Fox, beating Quick on the right side.

Mark Matheson took the lead back for the Minutemen at the nine-minute mark, scoring on the power play. Standing at the point, Matheson sent a shot through traffic and beat Mrazek's glove for the 3-2 lead. Chris Capraro and Chris Davis assisted on the play.

Union fought back to tie the game, scoring with about six minutes remaining in the second. Jason Walter's shot was stopped by Quick, but Coyle scooped up the rebound and beat Quick on the glove side.

With 1:02 remaining, UMass coach Don Cahoon pulled Quick and added the extra man to try for overtime. Union won the shots battle, putting the puck on net 36 times, as opposed to 28 for UMass.

PlayStation 3, Wii prices plummeting in online market

BY MATT BELLIVEAU
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The recent launch of two game consoles – the PlayStation 3 and Nintendo Wii – has produced massive hordes of two types of shoppers: the shopper who is willing to spend hours in line in hopes of acquiring one of the Christmas season's hot new items, and the shopper who hopes to acquire a console to re-sell on an auction Web Site, possibly making thousands of dollars in profit.

Recent shortages in the number of available consoles were expected to drive the asking price of owners selling their system online sky-high, but reports have shown that prices are holding strong.

On the eBay auction site on Sunday, Wiis were selling for twice the store price, indicating that supplies are still tight. The PlayStation 3 (PS3), meanwhile, was selling for around $1,500, already down about $1,000 from Friday.

On Monday, PS3 consoles in their last five minutes of auction were listed on eBay at prices between $650 and $910. Some ambitious sellers had listed consoles at prices around $1,500 but they had fetched no bids.

"Prices are down now," said Mike Stuppia, media specialist at the Best Buy in Saugus, Mass. "People know more are coming out."

Online courses on the rise

BY ALYSSA MONTALBANO

Getting out of bed and showing up in time for class is no longer an issue for many students taking online courses. A recent study found that significantly more students are enrolling in online classes.

The study conducted by The Sloan Consortium determined that roughly one in six students enrolled in higher education took at least one online course last fall. The report showed that 850,000 more students took online courses in the fall of 2005 than in the year before, which is an increase of almost 40 percent. Last year's report showed a slow growth, but this fall has already shown significant signs of increased participation.

The University of Phoenix, the nation's largest university, has approximately 320,000 students, 60 percent of whom are online students.

Bill Pepicello, the university's president, said that his average student is 34 and employed full-time. He added that one of the best advantages of online learning is that a student is not tied down to a specific time and place.

At the University of Massachusetts, online courses have become more popular over the last year. According to Colleen Daly, director of marketing of UMass online, the 2006 calendar year saw 24,214 enrollments, compared to last year's 19,728, which is an increase of 22.7 percent.

She said that there are many advantages to taking online courses.

"Many online students are working professionals and are unable to attend undergraduate or graduate school full-time," said Daly.

"Online courses allow flexibility and convenience for students, while still being able to obtain a top-notch education from universities such as the five UMass campuses."

Another advantage to online learning is the capability for students to be able to complete their degree programs faster. Online courses give students a chance to complete additional courses during winter or summer break, if needed.

According to the National Survey of Student Engagement, to be an online student requires motivation and discipline, so that online students often find the whole experience much more rewarding than they anticipated. Not only can these students bring their education home with them, but they have access to almost any course imaginable.

A report conducted by The Sloan Consortium determined that roughly one in six college students took at least one online course last fall.

Along with online courses being offered at UMass, another online feature called Online Web-Based Learning (OWL) is a tool used by students as well as teachers.

OWL is a comprehensive, web-based homework system. It serves many purposes, such as the delivery and grading of electronic homework assignments, giving course homework, student rosters, course and student management tools, student progress tracking, grade reports and more. All of these tools are convenient and helpful to both students and teachers.

Many students seem to use this feature in at least one of their classes.

UMass freshman Leah Tassinari uses OWL in her art history class as well as in her astronomy class.

Amherst bar closes doors after 73 years

BY OWEN BOSS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Barsie's, which has been a fixture in the Amherst bar scene since 1933, was closed indefinitely yesterday.

For many students, Barsie's was a popular stop along "club sidewalk," and will be sorely missed.

The owner, Judie Terapulsky, who owns the property where Barsie's was previously located, shut down the bar and plans to combine her current next-door restaurant "Judie's" into a larger facility.

The once vibrant display of college life lays a dark shell of what it once was. The front and back doors are locked, the once-used stools lay on top of tables and the fluorescent pink sign above the bar has been torn down. Students walking the sidewalk last night cupped their hands over their eyes and peered into the dark.

Michael Cartier, a senior hospitality and tourism management major at the University of Massachusetts, was left standing outside, bewildered last night.

"I was planning on going there tonight," he said. "I've been going up on Monday nights pretty consistently for the past three years.

"I guess I'll just go to McMurphy's or Delano's – it's just too bad that we no longer have that third option."

Barsie's, which had played its role on "club sidewalk" as an option for students along the same strip of No. Pleasant Street as "Delano's," "The Monkey Bar" and "McMurphy's," will now change their choice of bars from four to three.

Although the Amherst police department has recently begun using undercover officers inside of bars uptown in an attempt to stop the use of fake IDs, the closing of the bar was not related to the cracking down on this area of uptown Amherst.

Jessica Pierce, a graduate psychology student at UMass, had been working at Barsie's for the past three months. She claims that for her, like so many students in the area, the closing of the bar came as a shock. According to Pierce, many of the employees found out about its closing yesterday.

"I still have not heard from my boss," she said. "I had heard that they were planning on combining the bar with Judies, but I wasn't given a specific date."

Pierce, who had punched out late Sunday night, claimed that she had planned to work the remaining nights she was scheduled for this week.

The owner, Judy Terapulsky, who owns the property where Barsie's was located, now plans to enlarge her next-door restaurant "Judie's."

According to Pierce, the bar was closed because the owner feels that she could make more money through renovating the property and expanding Judie's.

Terapulsky was given the award of Restaurateur of the Year for Western Massachusetts in 2004. Judie's has been serving the Pioneer Valley for 29 years, and the restaurant is most popular for being the self-proclaimed "Home of the Outrageous Popovers."

Barsie's leaves behind a legacy that includes over 70 years of service to the Amherst community.

Man arrested in gas station armed robbery

A Brockton man was arrested in Springfield, Vt. in connection with an armed robbery of a King Street gas station in Northampton, Mass. that took place last Wednesday night.

A Massachusetts State police trooper attempted to pull over the suspect, who was described by police as a 5-foot-7, 210-pound black male, after he fled in his car.

A motor vehicle pursuit ensued until the suspect's vehicle crashed near the corner of Elm Street and Main Street in Hatfield, Mass.

The suspect fled the scene of the accident on foot and hid from police.

He later stole another motor vehicle and fled to Springfield, Vt.

The gas station clerk reported that the suspect had a gun. He stole an unknown amount of cash, some adult books, a pack of Newport cigarettes and a plastic gas can filled with gasoline, according to police.

The suspect was arrested by Springfield, Vt. police on unknown charges.

Northampton police are currently awaiting a warrant for his arrest.

According to police, he will likely be brought back to Northampton and charged with armed robbery.

Court rules against New York Times in leak investigation

New York Times reporter, Judith Miller, who retired from the Times a year ago, spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to a federal grand jury.

BY PETE YOST

WASHINGTON — The Supreme Court ruled against The New York Times on Monday, refusing to block the government from reviewing telephone records of two Times reporters in a leak investigation concerning a terrorism-funding probe.

The one-sentence order came in a First Amendment battle that involves stories written in 2001 by Times reporters Judith Miller and Philip Shenon. The stories revealed the government's plans to freeze the assets of two Islamic charities, the Holy Land Foundation and the Global Relief Foundation.

U.S. Attorney Patrick Fitzgerald is trying to track down the reporters' confidential sources for the stories. Fitzgerald's spokesman, Randall Samborn, declined to comment on the Supreme Court's order.

The case marks the second refusal by the court in as many years to sort out a clash between the federal government and the Times over press freedom.

In June 2005, the Supreme Court refused to take up the Times' request to hear an appeal in the CIA leak investigation involving the outing of Valerie Plame. In that case, Miller,

Mass. to sue Big Dig companies for negligence

BY DENISE LAVOIE

BOSTON — In the days after 4,500-pound concrete ceiling panels collapsed in a Big Dig connector tunnel, killing a Boston woman, investigators saw discolored epoxy and slippage in the bolts that were supposed to hold the panels in place.

They later learned, the state attorney general says, that the project managers for the massive highway construction project knew about problems with the epoxy bolt system used to secure the ceiling over the heads of thousands of motorists who used the tunnel each day.

State Attorney General Tom Reilly said it was "just a matter of time" before something went tragically wrong. On July 10, it did. Four of the concrete panels fell on a car in which Milena Del Valle, 39, of Boston, was riding. Del Valle was killed.

Reilly planned to file a lawsuit Tuesday against firms involved in the design, construction and management of the tunnel project, accusing them of negligence in Del Valle's death.

"I saw firsthand the voids in epoxy that was missing from some of the bolts. I saw the discoloration in the epoxy as well," Reilly said at a news conference Monday.

"There's no question that there were failures, that there was slippage. They were identified very early in the installation."

Reilly said 15 firms involved in the project would be accused of negligence in the lawsuit. The joint venture that managed the Big Dig, Bechtel Parsons Brinckerhoff, will be accused of gross negligence.

Reilly said the company had evidence of bolts slipping or failing but still turned over the tunnel to the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority in 2003 without warning of the "potentially dangerous situation," Reilly

The state of Massachusetts is preparing a multimillion-dollar lawsuit against the companies that worked on the Big Dig highway tunnel project, alleging their negligence led to the ceiling collapse that killed a woman.

NYU study to investigate 'reduced-risk' cigarettes

BY NICOLE KELLER
WASHINGTON SQUARE NEWS (NYU)

NEW YORK — A team of New York University dental researchers received a grant to determine whether cigarettes marketed as "reduced-risk" are actually any healthier.

The National Institute of Dental and Craniofacial Research, part of the National Institute of Health, gave a research team at NYU's College of Dentistry a two-year $320,000 grant, said Dr. Joseph Guttenplan, the team research leader and a professor of basic science and craniofacial biology.

The team will use the money to determine whether low-tar cigarettes are actually healthier or have a lower rate of oral cancer, Guttenplan said. He added that the researchers will test newer low-tar cigarettes such as those that are heated instead of burned.

Tobacco companies such as Philip Morris claim these cigarettes are less toxic, but admit that these claims are only based on machine tests that measure chemicals released into the air. The research team hopes to discover whether they are actually less dangerous.

Guttenplan said current research indicates that these cigarettes are in fact harming smokers.

"The evidence so far is that the low-tar cigarettes in the market today are not safer because people tend to smoke more of them," he said. "They inhale deeper and longer."

The National Institute of Health issues announcements to encourage research teams, like the one at NYU, to apply for grants that the institute deems important. The announcements also specify the questions it would like answered, such as whether a product causes an increased risk of cancer.

The institute issued this particular announcement because it felt there was not enough scientific evidence to conclude anything about these new tobacco products.

Other research teams, such as those at the National Cancer Institute, Massachusetts Institute of Technology and the American Cancer Society, have done extensive research to prove that low-tar cigarettes do not decrease one's risk of developing lung cancer. NYU's research team plans to test out the newer cigarettes, such as "ultra low-tar," and see if they affect the risk of oral cancer.

The other members of the research team are Dr. Peter Sacks, a professor of basic science and craniofacial biology, and Dr. Fang-An Chen, adjunct professor of oral and maxillofacial surgery. In the two-part research process, Guttenplan and Sacks will develop cells that interact with the cigarette smoke and Chen will be in charge of evaluating any changes that occur.

Experiments will consist of a mixture of genetically-engineered rodent cells and human cells, Sacks said. The rodent cells will be used as "reporter genes" to illustrate changes the human cells would not be able to show.

The researchers will add tobacco smoke condensate, or liquefied tobacco smoke, from both regular cigarettes and the new low-tar cigarettes to separate solutions of the human-cell and reporter-gene mixture.

Sacks said the oral cells would react to the foreign material – the carcinogen in the tobacco smoke condensate – resulting in a metabolic process. This process sometimes creates a byproduct that can cause mutations in cells' DNA that lead to oral cancer, Guttenplan said.

"Many of the components in tobacco that cause cancer have to be metabolized in the body in order to exert their carcinogenic effects," he said.

The reporter genes are necessary because there is currently no way to detect genetic mutations in human oral cells or regular rodent cells, Guttenplan said. Reporter genes are genetically engineered so the researchers can observe the actual changes that occur in the DNA.

In the reporter genes, one can see if a mutation has occurred with any small piece of the DNA – but that isn't possible to do with human DNA, Sacks said. Once the human oral cells react or metabolize into a new stage, they should move to the adjacent reporter genes and cause the same mutations.

In other words, the reporter gene senses how many mutations have occurred in the environment around it, such as in the oral cells, Sacks said. If the reporter genes develop mutations, it is likely the human cells will contain similar mutations.

Guttenplan said it is important for the research team to find out, through the use of the reporter gene, how human cells are affected – not just how they affect those of rodents.

"Who cares if rodents smoke and get cancer?" he said.

In the second stage of the research, Chen will examine certain characteristics of the genes simultaneously and determine whether the changed DNA will indicate oral cancer.

Chen's work will evaluate differences between proteins in cells treated with the high-tar tobacco and low-risk tobacco products.

NYU was awarded a $320,000 grant to study low-tar cigarettes.

Online courses require discipline and time management skills online is easier than taking tests in class. The advantages are that you are able to go back and figure out what your mistakes are," Tassinari said.

Winson Wong, who also uses OWL in his classes at UMass, says there is less pressure involved with taking online tests.

"I am more comfortable in the presence of my own room. I also don't have to worry about other people looking at my paper," said Wong.

Although most of the students interviewed enjoy using OWL, some were not as thrilled about it.

"I have a Chemistry OWL," said junior Susan Ingalls. "I don't like it because I can't ask a question and get a response back. They don't give very good instructions and it is just difficult to figure out."

Although there are many advantages to taking online courses and using online features, there are also barriers, such as not being able to get access to a computer or to a reliable Internet connection. The user has to have basic computer skills to use these programs. Students who take online courses also need to be disciplined and have good time management skills.

"Sometimes students make an incorrect assumption that not having to show up for class will make the online course somehow easier, when indeed the opposite is true," said Daly.

Another disadvantage for some students may be the price of taking an online course. Generally, an online course is more expensive than taking a regular class.

Pepicello also agreed that there are downfalls to online learning.

"A student can feel isolated because they are not in a classroom with other students," he said. "The student may feel disconnected."

European launch of PS3 delayed

it was confident of shipping 6 million PS3s by the end of March 2007.

The PS3 console officially went on sale in Japan on Nov. 11, but Sony only made 100,000 machines available on launch day.

The drop in the PS3's asking price may also be attributed to the rave reviews and lower cost of PS3's newest competitor, the Nintendo Wii.

The Wii costs $250, including one game, half of what the cheaper PS3 model costs.

The PS3 is being sold in two configurations. The more expensive version has a 60GB hard drive and Wi-Fi on board and costs $599. The cheaper version has a 20GB hard drive, lacks the Wi-Fi and will cost $499.

Both versions include a wireless controller, a Blu-ray high-quality video disc and a port so they can work with a high-definition display. Buying a PS3 also gives owners free access to the online PlayStation Network, where they can meet and take on other gamers.

Like other next-generation consoles, the PS3 offers gamers much more detailed graphics than ever before. The IBM-developed Cell chip inside the console uses seven separate processing cores, which can be used to make the physics in game worlds more realistic and which allowed creators to enhance the artificial intelligence of computer characters.

The PS3 was originally supposed to go on sale in early 2006 but production problems and shortages of key components forced a delay. The European launch of the console has been pushed back to March 2007.

Stuppia says demand has been high for the PS3, but many prospective PS3 buyers are turning towards the cheaper and more available Xbox 360.

"Now that people can't buy the PS3, they're willing to just pay $400 for the Xbox 360 and move on," said Stuppia. "Plus, they're getting the chance to play the second-best game ever, next to 'Halo,' 'Gears of War.'"

Some plant explosion victims return to normal routines

Jim Anzeh, whose gas station was destroyed in Wednesday's chemical plant explosion, talks with a person from the Red Cross at a disaster information center at the Town Hall in Danvers, Mass., Nov. 25, 2006.

BY DAVID WEBER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BOSTON — School buses rolled through the streets of Danvers on Monday for the first time since an ink and paint plant explosion last week forced the evacuation of about 200 residents and caused countless others to give thanks that no one died or was seriously hurt.

Danvers School Superintendent Lisa Dana said the return to class went smoothly in this town about 17 miles north of Boston.

"It was a regular day at school. Kids want to be kids. They got the opportunity to get back to their routines through school, getting back to gym class or art class. The students did well," Dana said.

She said teachers at the town's five elementary schools used regularly scheduled discussion time Monday to talk to students about Wednesday's pre-dawn explosion at the plant housing CAI Inc. and Arnel Co., near the intersection of Route 35 and Bates Street.

Dana said middle and high school students proposed working on fund-raising projects to help people unable to recover valuable items and family heirlooms from the homes from the four or five homes most seriously damaged by the blast.

Town Manager Wayne Marquis said none of those houses would be razed before structural engineers inspected the houses and determined whether it would be safe for firefighters to go inside and retrieve important items such financial records, family photos or heirlooms.

"We won't go in for TVs or things like that, but we will look it on a case-by-case basis and do whatever we can," Marquis said.

He said five more families moved back into their houses Monday to join the six families who returned to their homes Sunday.

Contractors also are allowed into the blast area if they show proof they are working there, but the area continues to be closed to the general public.

Marquis said trash collection will resume Tuesday morning in a neighborhood directly across Route 35 from the explosion site. Residents there were not forced evacuate, but many had windows blown out of their houses.

Route 35 between Endicott Street and Liberty Street remain closed to traffic while the state fire marshal's office uses that stretch of a road as a staging area for its probe into the explosion's cause.

Marquis said State Fire Chief Steve Coan said his investigators "are making good progress and have found some areas of interest" in the rubble pile left by the blast. Marquis said the site still is being treated technically as a crime scene until arson can be ruled out as a cause, but he emphasized that no evidence indicating foul play has been found so far.

Gov. Mitt Romney's office continued to compile information to present to the federal government that would allow some of the hardest-hit victims to receive federal benefits.

Mass. seeks unspecified damages

Mass. attorney general will sue companies that worked on the state's troubled $15 billion 'Big Dig' roadway project, alleging their negligence caused a ceiling panel to break loose and crush a woman to death this summer.

said.

"The clock was ticking. The fuse was lit. It was just a matter of time until this tragedy occurred," Reilly said.

The lawsuit also names Modern Continental Construction Co. and Gannett Fleming, the firm in suburban Braintree that designed the I-90 connector tunnel, as well as companies that supplied the epoxy or ceiling bolts used to hold up ceiling panels, and three insurance companies.

Gannett Fleming also is being sued for breach of contract.

Andy Paven, a spokesman for Bechtel/Parsons Brinckerhoff, said the company would not comment on the lawsuit. "We have always said we will stand behind our work," Paven said.

A spokesman for Cambridge-based Modern Continental also said he could not comment because he had not seen the lawsuit but said the company stands by its work.

Representatives of Gannett Fleming also did not respond to a call seeking comment.

Del Valle's family filed a wrongful death lawsuit in August against many of the same companies as well as the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, the agency that oversees the $14.6 billion highway project, the most expensive in U.S. history.

Jeffrey Denner, a lawyer for the Del Valle family, said they are gratified that the state plans to sue.

"We're happy that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts is now standing up and essentially saying who's at fault here with their own investigation," Denner said.

Reilly, who did not seek re-election to mount a failed run for governor, said he chose to file the civil lawsuit to avoid a question of statute of limitations. Under state law, lawsuits over defective construction usually must be filed within six years of completion, and a ramp that is part of the project in question was completed Nov. 29, 2000.

Journalists' assets frozen in case

who retired from the Times a year ago, spent 85 days in jail before agreeing to testify to a federal grand jury. Fitzgerald, in a role as a special counsel, conducted that leak investigation as well.

Monday's rejection "is just further indication that we're getting absolutely nowhere with the court when it comes to protecting confidential sources," said Lucy Dalglish, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press.

The case points out a growing problem of reporters trying to protect their sources in the information age, press advocates say. Rather than threatening reporters with jail if they don't testify, the government can go through the back door to hunt down confidential sources by amassing phone records and credit card receipts.

"It's impossible to operate on cash only and face-to-face and do your job as journalists," said University of Minnesota media ethics and law professor Jane E. Kirtley.

Dalglish said that protection of phone record confidentiality is among the issues that should be addressed in federal shield law legislation she and other press advocates are urging Congress to consider.

The current dispute stems from Shenon and Miller calling the two charities for comment after learning of the planned freeze on their assets from confidential sources.

The Justice Department says the reporters' calls tipped off the charities of upcoming government raids. A federal judge who ruled in the Times' favor said there is no evidence in the case even suggesting that the reporters tipped off the charities about the raids or that the reporters even knew the government would raid either charity.

In August, the 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals ruled 2-1 that federal prosecutors could see the two reporters' phone records.

The government says the fact that the reporters relayed disclosures from a government source to "targets of an imminent law enforcement action substantially weakens any claim of freedom of the press."

At issue are 11 days of phone records the government plans to review from 2001 – for the dates Sept. 27-30, Dec. 1-3 and Dec. 10-13. In a declaration this month, Fitzgerald said the statute of limitations "on certain substantive offenses that the grand jury is investigating" will expire on Dec. 3 and Dec. 13 of this year.

The current leak probe is in Fitzgerald's capacity as U.S. attorney in Chicago. The Libby prosecution is in Fitzgerald's role as a special counsel who was selected by a Justice Department superior to conduct that investigation.

19 men detained in China for impersonating monks

BEIJING — Nineteen men have been detained by police in southwest China for impersonating monks and selling fake or shoddy goods, a local official and state media said Sunday.

Police in Wuhou, a district in the city of Chengdu, were tipped off by locals last week who said that 50 men with shaved heads and wearing monks robes were selling trinkets, a Web site for the Chengdu Business Daily said.

They claimed to be from the "Shaolin Temple Martial Arts Performing Troupe," the newspaper said.

"But they aren't monks, they are con artists," said a Wuhou police official who would give only his surname, Jing. He would not give any more details and said the newspaper's account was accurate.

When police officers arrived at one site, they saw 10 of the men attacking journalists from a local television station trying to film them, the paper said. Some 180 officers gave chase after the monks escaped in two vehicles and fired warning shots into the air after they intercepted the vehicles, it said.

An investigation shows that the gang was led by Wang Shengli and Zhang Guofeng, from Henan province, who hired boys from local martial arts training schools to cheat ordinary citizens by selling fake goods, the paper said. It did not give any details on what the goods were or whether Wang and Zhang were detained.

The other 31 members of the group were under investigation, it said.

30 days and counting

Tucker Merrick

The day after Thanksgiving marks the first day of the Christmas season. It's the biggest shopping day of the year, where sales abound and all roads within a five-block radius of a big mall might as well be part of the parking lot.

It's a day that radio can officially play Jingle Bells and television can get away with airing low-budget, clay-mation nostalgia. To many, myself included, what that day really marks is the beginning of an arduous toleration of the "holiday spirit." A name that, like the act it describes, gets old quickly.

The day after Thanksgiving was exactly one month before Christmas Eve. We now are several days into an entire month of Christmas carol endurance. By the time we've gotten enough of the bland orchestral renditions of classic winter tunes alongside the overly-exuberant Mitch Miller with his Gang, people everywhere will be more than happy to whistle "Frosty the Snowman" to ensure no reclusion.

While you're suffering a play-list repetition worse than what you hear on KISS 108, you'll probably be at the mall, desperately trying to pick out a present meaningful to its intended recipient. At its most basic, my list is comprised of 10 people. I have to get at least 10 different gifts that are each unique to my loved ones. This is no easy task, and I know that many lists are more advanced than mine. Buying an ornament for someone is an easy out, but you can't do that for more than two people without looking like an egotistic fool.

But what about the lights? And the tree? We can't forget those. On that day after Thanksgiving, I saw three cars hauling Christmas trees on their roofs. These people are obviously on top of their game. They probably have the lights too; after all, nobody wants to be the chumps on the street with only one set of those colorful blinking strands. You also need to have decorations outside the house, a Santa, some reindeer and an elf or two usually does the trick. Either that or just buy the nativity set on sale.

It's something that we're building toward for a long time, but in the end it falls short. All of the lights, the music, the television, the smiles: this force that is building for an entire month cannot last.

By the climax of it all, I am always more relieved than I am happy that it's Christmas Day. What was once 12 simple and harmonious days of Christmas has been more than doubled into a drawn-out month. By the end of it, you're not sure why you went through all the trouble in the first place.

Christmas is an important event. Celebrating the day of Santa's wedding is no light matter, but oftentimes its weight is lost. Christmas is supposed to be a time where we can show our selfless love and appreciation for others. Unfortunately, the opposite often occurs.

We become so concerned about filling gift quotas and getting everything for everyone that we are unable to feel satisfied for what we got in return. We never really get what we want, and always feel like our efforts were for nothing.

If you want an example of a good holiday, then look at Thanksgiving. It's the one day of the year where you get to sit around with your family, doing nothing but enjoying each other's company and some good cooking. There are no big expectations, just a big turkey. It's a time where you can really relax, and the only obligation is cooking and cleaning — things that can be done collectively.

On the contrary, Christmas is isolating. Buying presents is an independent venture, and you never want to say what you really think. I can't remember a time when I had a truly happy Christmas. It's a holiday that often brings mutterings and bitterness, not smiles and laughter.

Yet, I take solace in knowing that my experiences fall in with a majority of others. (Now if you just read that sentence and do not think it applies to you, then you probably live your life in ignorant bliss, and you are truly blessed.)

For the rest of us, nobody is ever satisfied with the climax of Christmas. It's something that we're building toward for a long time, but in the end it falls short. All of the lights, the music, the television, the smiles; this force that is building for an entire month cannot last.

Although the Christmas lights are still buzzing, the rest of the energy has been depleted. When Christmas Day finally rolls around, and those blinking lights are turned off, everyone just wants to cut loose and yell. Thank Santa that New Years is just around the bend.

Is TV the new ER?

Joshua H. Wilder

Since the holiday season began rapidly approaching, I started thinking about my wish list. This year I tried to be a bit more realistic and abandon my hopes for world peace or a Led Zeppelin reunion tour. I have but one wish this year — and I'd be the happiest Jew on Christmas if it were brought to fruition.

My hope is that the public and government will finally begin to hold the pharmaceutical industry responsible for their recent price gauging and questionable tactics. To some people, the thought of pharmaceutical companies acting in that way sounds strange. When you have the automobile, oil and tobacco industries all using their money and influence to persuade legislators to give them tax breaks and the power to run rampant, sometimes other offenders slip through the cracks.

The pharmaceutical industry has been flying relatively under the radar in that respect, although you wouldn't know it if you turned on the television. Over the last few years there has been a steady increase in the number of drugs being advertised, promising magic cures by taking little pills.

It used to be that if you felt ill, you went to the doctor and got evaluated. Now all you need to do is turn on the tube and watch enough commercials to see your symptoms being advertised and prescribed. In a way, it is a great milestone for both technology and medicine.

These pills are 100 percent safe and proven, just watch out for a few side effects. These include, but are not limited to, nausea, indigestion, headache, abnormal vision, nasal congestion, vomiting and dizziness just to name a few. And if an erection lasts for more than six hours, contact your physician immediately.

Certain medical conditions are legitimate, no arguing that. But nowadays you find advertisements for drugs that supposedly cure conditions whose existence seemed to come out of thin air. Attention Deficit Hyperactivity Disorder? Female Sexual Dysfunction? Restless Leg Syndrome?

It wasn't long before this columnist became suspicious of these disorders and the "medical professionals" pandering off pills for them. Some people said such suspicions were cynical and crazy. After all, the pharmaceutical industry would never abuse its power to seemingly control both the health and wallets of sick Americans, right?

I recently read a bumper sticker that really put the whole situation in perspective for me. It said "teach nutrition not pharmaceutical addiction."

I recently read an article on Times Online that confirmed my worst impressions. According to the article, the pharmaceutical companies have been "systematically creating diseases in order to sell more of their products, turning healthy people into patients and placing many at risk of harm." Pretty strong accusations. A company actually creating diseases to boost their own profit margins. That sort of greed and ruthlessness would even make degenerate moneygrubbers like Jeffrey Skilling blush.

The article continues to describe "disease-mongering," a practice in which non-existent ailments are created and promoted. The line between doctors designated to promote health for the greater good and drug companies using health as the ultimate sales gimmick is becoming severely blurred. Pfizer and Paxil want you to think you can purchase good health from them by taking a few magic pills. It won't be cheap, though.

According to the AARP, the cost of prescription drugs has been rising constantly at a steady rate. From 1990 to 1999, the average American increased his or her spending on prescription drugs by 9.4 percent. The AARP also estimates that by 2010, the costs will have increased by an additional 11.2 percent from 2000, and "an estimated 40 percent of the growth in U.S. prescription drug spending between 1995 and 1999 can be attributed to price increases for drugs that have been on the market since the mid-1990s." An estimated 20 percent is attributed to the higher cost of new drugs as well.

For those of you following along at home, all this number crunching boils down to this: the cost of prescription drugs has been rising and will continue to increase for years to come.

However, if the report mentioned above is valid, then it works to put the finishing touches on a seemingly genius con job. Inundate the American public with advertisements for medications they "can't live without," create the need for new medications to treat ailments that never existed before and jack up the prices on them while laughing all the way to the bank.

I recently read a bumper sticker that really put the whole situation in perspective for me. It said, "teach nutrition, not pharmaceutical addiction." College students have yet to feel the financial squeeze when it comes to pharmaceuticals, but middle-aged and elderly people are taking the brunt of it.

If we continue along this path, by the time we become senior-citizens, the cost of our medications will be astronomically higher than they are now. We will have less money, the pharmaceutical companies will have more, but will we be any healthier? That is debatable.

Congress needs to stop giving these companies breaks and start holding them accountable for their actions. Maybe this Christmas, Santa will toss out his Restless Leg Syndrome pills and end this pill popping.

Recognize and respect past incidents

Domenic Poli

Today is the anniversary of a horrific catastrophe. On this date exactly 64 years ago the infamous Cocoanut Grove fire rocked an unexpecting Boston town and reduced the lives of countless people to ashes.

For those of you who don't know what the Cocoanut Grove disaster was, here's a little history lesson.

On Saturday, Nov. 28, 1942, approximately 1,000 patrons, (more than 400 over the legal capacity), flooded the Cocoanut Grove nightclub in the Bay Village neighborhood of Boston intending to party the night away, according to the Boston Public Health Commission. At 10:11 p.m. a fire broke out in the basement lounge.

The blaze soon swallowed up the entire basement level and quickly wreaked havoc on the upper floors. In a desperate flee for safety, the occupants scurried for the exit. However, the two revolving doors were wedged shut by swarms of panicked partygoers trying to escape. (One other exit door was welded closed to prevent patrons from slipping out before paying, while yet another was buried behind drapes).

Boston's Finest and Bravest were forced to use squad cars, taxicabs and newspaper trucks as makeshift ambulances to cart victims to the nearest infirmary. The first group of injured was brought to Boston City Hospital where, for a good hour, a new victim arrived every 11 seconds.

Eventually, a hospital administrator told city officials to stop bringing casualties – there was no longer any place to put them all. Hospitals admitted 243 people for treatment.

129 to Boston City Hospital, 114 to Massachusetts General Hospital. By the time the horrific night was over, 492 people had lost their lives in the inferno.

The National Fire Protection Association lists the Cocoanut Grove disaster as the third-deadliest single building (or complex) fire in American history, behind only the 9/11 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center, taking the lives of almost 2,700 individuals and the Iroquois Theater Fire, which killed 602 people.

Now, let me ask you a question: Had you ever heard of it? For a great many, the answer was probably, "No" – and that's very unfortunate. That means almost 500 different families were torn apart by a single event, and it has gone unbeknownst to most.

Can you imagine residing in the Great Behind (whatever/wherever it may actually be) as a result of such a terrible disaster, while innumerable amounts of people had never even heard of the tragedy? It leads one to wonder how such a catastrophic event can ruin the lives of so many, and yet be unknown to so many more.

Something burned holes in the lives of innocent people faster than you can say, "Pahk the cah in Hahvid yahd," and it has a pretty good chance of being overlooked by most.

Is it because we are so wrapped up in our own lives that we fail to recognize the devastation and sufferings of incidents in years past? Is it because people eventually care less and less about something that may or may not have affected them decades ago?

When I learned that today was the 64th anniversary of the Cocoanut Grove disaster I couldn't help but wonder if somewhere out there a young man never got to know a relative because the fire claimed the relative's life, and if any of his friends growing up ever knew about the fiery monster that altered his family tree forever.

I also started to wonder: What other historically-significant anniversary might try to pass by under my radar screen?

I found out that tomorrow is the 19th anniversary of an explosion of a Korean Air Boeing 707 that killed 155 passengers over the Thai-Burmese border, and the 25th anniversary of the drowning of actress Natalie Wood during a yachting accident off the coast of Santa Catalina Island, California.

All three of these events were going to pass by tomorrow, without the knowledge of almost everyone holding this newspaper.

If I sound like I'm trying to put myself up on some sort of pedestal, I apologize. I am just as guilty of being clueless about the significance of such dates as the next person, and it is because of this guilt that I've decided to write this today.

Something terrible happened on this day, people. Something burned holes in the lives of innocent people faster than you can say, "Pahk the cah in Hahvid yahd," and it has a pretty good chance of being overlooked by most.

Because the average person is too busy worrying about if the Seattle Seahawks covered the spread last night or if that cute girl in physics class noticed us, we often don't appreciate history's important life lessons. We fail to realize that things happened before we even arrived on this planet that have shaped (for better or worse) the way the world works today.

I'm not saying that we need to know everything that happened on every date in every year since the beginning of time, but let's try not to forget that sometimes there may be a little Cocoanut Grove disaster that may have taken some innocent lives a while back, and maybe we should try to slow down and remember that from time to time.

LETTER TO THE EDITOR

DIDN'T GIVE ENOUGH CREDIT

I am writing in response to Domenic Poli's column, "Stop being unpatriotic," which was printed on Nov. 14. Poli wrote, among other things, that to not vote is to be unpatriotic. He used evidence that "only 24 percent of Americans under the age of 30 voted last Tuesday" to argue that he is "sickened" that Americans are taking the democratic process for granted.

I also agree that not voting shows poor citizenship, but I feel that Poli did not give enough credit to those who did come out to vote. I consulted the Center for Information and Research on Civic Learning and Engagement, where Poli cited his evidence, to gain more insight.

The Center states that two million more young people voted in this election than in the last 2002 midterm, which is the highest level of young voters America has seen in a decade of voting. It appears that the young citizens of America are making their mark.

I think it is unrealistic to say that everyone who is eligible should vote. I also think it's unfair of Poli to say that young voters are not exercising their freedoms. We, as students, are making our mark, albeit slowly.

Look at the success our own campus has had. The Collegian reported that 1,600 Massachusetts voters were registered on campus in a voter registration drive. The Civic Center did its own nationwide survey of college students specifically and found that about 77 percent of students voted.

Poli should give more credit to the surge in young voters. Especially since we, as a student body, had such a successful turnout. More young people are exercising their duty as citizens, and this is obviously reflected in the turnout at the polls.

Instead of criticizing our age group for not voting, he should congratulate the success our generation has had in exercising their democratic right.

'The Fountain' draws praise

BY PETER FRISMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Maverick surgeon Tommy, played by Hugh Jackman, scrounges for a cure for malignant brain tumors in a desperate attempt to save his stricken wife Izzi (Rachel Weisz), and finds a potential cure in a Guatemalan tree. Izzi assigns him the task of finishing her handwritten novel "The Fountain," about a turn-of-the-16th-century Spanish Conquistador named Tomas (Jackman) attempting to defend the Queen (Weisz) from the intrusions of the Inquisition. He is given the task of locating the immortality-granting Tree of Life of Mayan legend. In a thousand years' time, Tom travels the world in search of the Tree of Life in hopes of finally rescuing his wife.

"The Fountain," the latest film from Darren Aronofsky, can all too easily be attacked as a wonton, babbling stream of new-age mysticism with Mayan and Norse mythology added for the minimum amount of required texture. It could be attested that Aronofsky is cynically tossing up random bits of romance, pathos and bathetic existentialist poetry on the screen confident that the audience, eager to be enthralled by the wonder the film so inarguably possesses, will try themselves to make sense of it, doing all the work for him.

But can he be blamed, given the lessons presented to him by current science fiction culture? One of the most celebrated sci-fi movies of all time has a meaning so ambiguous it is still hotly debated nearly 40 years after its premiere. Perhaps Arthur C. Clarke will confess on his deathbed that he and Stanley Kubrick were just putting us on, creating the most pretentious rubbish they could conceive of and giggling at the masses marveling over the result.

But until then, filmmakers can be expected to reproduce films so grand, so ostensibly deep, they are guaranteed the same level of kudos. And while Aronofsky's attempt at the genre lacks anything meriting being taken seriously (or at least as seriously as it seems to want to be taken), its ambition and spectacle are praiseworthy.

"The Fountain," based on a graphic novel co-written by Aronofsky, is ostensibly meant to explore new territory in science fiction, to invent new methods of exploiting the genre's concept to better express the timeless anxieties of the human race. While George Lucas transplanted the classic stories of the human psyche into a fantastic setting, David Cronenberg used sci-fi to create allegories of the populace's fears of the vulnerability of their existence, and Paul Verhoeven created worlds that were realizations of society's fears of its own undoing, Aronofsky merges all the themes to create the all-encompassing Uber-theme.

It's the theme of the most famous monologue in the history of theater, the theme underpinning the motivations of many to find religion. The fear of death and its aftermath seems to be the fear that towers over all the others; Aronofsky can be imagined to argue, so how can anyone be expected to tackle such a topic through pedestrian means? Given the magnitude of the subject, isn't a narrative spanning at least one millennium necessary, not to mention filmmaking that exceeds traditional narrative beyond the point of comprehension?

And indeed, Aronofsky proves once again to be the undisputed master of unconventional filmmaking technique. He demonstrated uncommon expertise in harnessing avant-garde styles of mise en scène to create one of the most powerful films of the last decade, "Requiem for a Dream." Here, he utilizes his uncanny aesthetics to create a visually stunning flower garden of a movie.

However, the happenings within the set pieces are often overblown and mawkish. Jackman, what with his experience playing possibly immortal comic book characters, does admirable work bringing the spirit of the scenes to the surface when the letter fails, such as when an inconsolable Tommy gives himself a tattoo via a fountain pen. (Come to think of it, what was the last Aronofsky film that didn't feature a self-inflicted puncture wound as a critical plot point?)

Also present are notable Aronofsky alumni Ellen Burstyn and Mark Margolis; as well as composer Clint Mansell, whose score is oddly reserved, compared to his jaw-dropping work for "Requiem."

The feats of "The Fountain" in terms of delving into the Big Question are questionable at best, as well as its attempts to trailblaze on behalf of science fiction. But perhaps it can be admired for its demonstration that the line between cinematic film and light show is blurrier than purists would care to admit. The film is best approached as an experimental film than as one with a coherent plot, especially considering its focus on furthering the medium.

Watching "The Fountain," it's obvious that within the movie stirs something vast and epic, straining to be understood by the audience. Perhaps it is a testament to the incapability of mere mortals to comprehend the Big Question that not even the inventive techniques employed by "The Fountain" can make the subject any more lucid.

Hugh Jackman (above) stars in Aronofsky's latest movie 'The Fountain.' The story is based on a graphic novel with the same name. Jackman plays Tomas, a man who travels the world to save his wife.

Being green is not so hard with hybrids

BY AMY CALANDRELLA
COLLEGIAN COLUMNIST

In a desperate attempt to escape my family over the long weekend, I spent quite some time holed up at the local coffee shop. Along with the usual coffee shop banter, I could not help but eavesdrop on a group of girls who had recently returned home from college.

One of them had received a nasty note under the windshield of her parents' SUV. Apparently, someone had marched around the parking lot notifying all SUV drivers of their gluttonous behavior. In short, the girl felt bad, hated her dad's monster car, and was trying to save up for her own hybrid.

Although it was only passing conversation, this small anecdote got me thinking. Aside from the environment's parking lot foot soldiers, what is happening locally and nationally to curb our oil addiction? Furthermore, where does an environmentally sound lifestyle intersect with an image of cool?

To begin, I will attempt a short and hardly scientific explanation of what happens when we drive cars. When an engine does its thing to get you where you need (or want) to go, there are a few things left over, mostly the stuff we see pouring out of the tailpipe.

The first of these emissions is hydrocarbons, partially burned fuel that contributes to city smog and is also quite toxic. The second is nitrogen oxides generated when the nitrogen emission reacts with the oxygen in our atmosphere.

The final two and better known emissions of incomplete combustion are carbon monoxide and carbon dioxide. The first is an actual poison and the second is the famous culprit of global warming.

As difficult as it is sometimes to realize that our actions carry consequences, especially when we can't see them, there is an indisputable link between our feet on the gas pedals and the smoke billowing from the tailpipes.

Now where do SUVs and hybrids fit into this oversimplified picture? A SUV with an engine described above will have more emissions than a smaller car because of its size and weight. The large profile of an SUV will create wind resistance, requiring the burning of more fuel to keep it going.

On the other hand, the most common hybrid engine is smaller and has fewer emissions. It functions by using an internal combustion engine like the one described above in combination with an electric battery to power an electric motor. Because the internal combustion plays a smaller role in the powering of the car, the pollutants are reduced.

Changes like using money incentives to encourage green behavior are occurring nationwide. On a very local level, University of Massachusetts Parking Services offers a discount for "clean" vehicles, including hybrids. In many places across the country, parking fees are reduced, if not waived, for clean vehicles. Money also plays a direct role in terms of the amount of gas being bought for an SUV versus a hybrid. Gas prices have settled down for the moment, but when they rise again next summer, the financial impact of a hybrid will become more significant.

However, while many hybrid cars reduce emissions significantly, they are only a small part of the solution. UMass Parking Services also encourages a Rideshare program as an alternative to single occupancy vehicles. Through this program members are offered carpool matching services free of charge, discounts on permits and preferred parking spaces. By encouraging several people living on the same route to ride in one car instead of three, emissions are automatically cut by a third. This approach, although slightly inconvenient, addresses the problem directly by taking cars off of the road.

This idea of ridesharing has also been picked up by the nationwide company Zipcar. In short, the company provides cars in certain neighborhoods and residents can sign up to use the car when they need it. Often, the car provided is a hybrid. Insurance and gas is covered in the membership fee and the rest is pay as you go. Programs like this one further the fight against emissions by encouraging residents to drive only when necessary. In fact, two of these cars are right down the street at Amherst College and another two are over at Smith. A deal is in the works with UMass, but currently we do not have a Zipcar of our own just yet.

All this talk of what is green, both environmentally and financially, also intersects with a certain image. Although it is nothing new, an environmentally sound lifestyle tends to attract a certain crowd, becoming an elite trend for those who have the time and privilege.

While marketing new green energy as trendy will play a large part in our transformation as a culture, it also serves to alienate those who will benefit from improving the environment as well. Of course, it is a good thing that my well-to-do coffee shop friend is aware that a hybrid is a better choice than an SUV, but our commitment will never be complete as long as being conscious of the environment is merely trendy instead of natural.

Jazz panel coming to UMass

BY BRADLEY FARBERMAN

Concluding the University of Massachusetts Fine Arts Center's 2006 "Solos and Duos" series is a solo performance by Joe McPhee at Bezanson Recital Hall on Wednesday at 8 p.m. Tickets are $10 for the public and $5 for students.

McPhee began his adventures in music on trumpet, at age 8, according to his Web site. Following high school, a stint in the U.S. Army band led to an appearance on Clifford Thornton's "Freedom and Unity" in 1967, McPhee's first time on record. In 1968, McPhee began playing the saxophone has since explored other instruments, including pocket trumpet, valve trombone, clarinet and piano.

Soon, McPhee was recording as a leader, beginning with the Joe McPhee Quartet's "Underground Railroad" in 1969, on painter Craig Johnson's CJR label. "Nation Time" and "Trinity" followed in 1970 and 1971, respectively, also on CJR.

In 1974, Werner X. Uehlinger, a fan of McPhee's work, formed the Hat Hut label in order to release McPhee's records. "Black Magic Man," "The Willisau Concert" and "Tenor" record were all released on Hat Hut by 1976.

During the following decade, McPhee came into contact with composer/educator Pauline Oliveros, and the work of author Edward de Bono. These events led McPhee to develop what he calls "Po Music," which he describes on his Web site as a "process of provocation" that allows one to "move from one fixed set of ideas in an attempt to discover new ones." Examples of "Po Music" are found on McPhee recordings like "Topology," "Linear B" and "Oleo & a Future Retrospective."

In the '90s, McPhee gained a wider recognition, appearing on record and in concert with famed reedists like Peter Brötzmann and Ken Vandermark and John Coltrane drummer Rashied Ali. It was also during this time that McPhee introduced a longstanding trio with bassist Dominic Duval and drummer Jay Rosen. The group, known as Trio X, first appeared at the Vision Festival in New York City, and has since recorded for the CIMP and Cadence Jazz Records labels.

McPhee will follow up his performance at Bezanson with a panel appearance on Thursday evening in room 231 of Herter Hall at 7:30 p.m. "As Serious As Your Life: Creative Music in the Sixties," presented by the "Solos and Duos" series and the History Department, also features University of Louisville professor W.S. Tkweme, UMass professor Ron Welburn and legendary jazz saxophonist and former UMass professor Archie Shepp.

According to a press release, Shepp studied drama at Goddard College, but soon turned to music full time when he moved to New York. In 1960, he began collaborating with highly-influential pianist Cecil Taylor, pioneer of the avant-garde and performer in the "Solos and Duos" series in September. The pair appeared on Taylor albums like "Air," "The World of Cecil Taylor" and "Cell Walk for Celeste." In 1965, following a record with Don Cherry, Shepp appeared on Coltrane's "Ascension," and at the "A Love Supreme" sessions, but did not appear on the record. "New Thing at Newport," an LP that boasted a set by Shepp on one side and a set by Coltrane on the other, was also released in 1965.

And, at Coltrane's recommendation, Shepp was signed to Impulse! Records, where he recorded 12 albums between 1964 and 1972. Also an educator, Shepp left SUNY Buffalo for UMass Amherst in 1974, where he remained in the Afro-American Studies department until 2002.

Welburn, of the English department, is the author of six books of poetry, the most recent of which is "Coming Through Smoke and the Dreaming," out on Greenfield Review Press. He has contributed to Downbeat and JazzTimes, and directs the Native American Indian Studies Certificate Program. He previously coordinated the Jazz Oral History Project of the National Endowment for the Arts at the Institute of Jazz Studies at Rutgers University Newark.

Tkweme, a UMass alum and assistant professor of Pan African Studies at Louisville, will moderate the panel.

Tenacious D shows new look

BY MICHAEL TRABERT
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Serving as a soundtrack to their new movie "The Pick of Destiny," Jack Black and Kyle Gass have given Tenacious D fans something new, and while not as classic as their self-titled album, this album still serves its purpose as a great rock comedy album.

As a whole, the album attempts to portray the movie's plot through the music. If you listen before seeing the film, the story is a little confusing. It feels like some of the fluidity between tracks was lost through the need to construct a story in the album.

Another problem is that most of the tracks are short, on average between one and three minutes, leaving the album's development feeling scattered and thrown together.

Black's vocals, which are animated and lively, jump out through the music and create the album's mood. His choice of lyrics and the theatrical manner in which he sings makes for catchy and hilarious tracks.

The music behind Black is well polished and easy to listen to. With his sidekick Gass on guitar and David Grohl on the drums, it seems that the goal was to build the music around the lyrics only to support Black. Without his humor, the band would just sound like general rock, which is part of the joke.

"Kickapoo" opens the album with Black singing accompanied by guitar. It unfolds into a rock epic.

The song develops and gives a clear beginning to the story. Meatloaf guest stars on the track as Black's father who bans rock music from his house and pressures his son to subscribe to Jesus.

Black then travels to Hollywood to find his destiny. Ronnie James Dio is also in the song at the end, seeming to be Black's guardian angel or his conscience. This serves as a great opener for the album, offering changes of pace, and most importantly, it's funny.

"POD," short for Pick of Destiny, is the first single off the album. Lyrically, it is a collage of the events though the movie and possibly was written to familiarize people with the storyline. While mostly promotional, it isn't one of the funniest tracks on the album.

A highlight of the album is the song "The Government Totally Sucks." The song is satirical to other rock protest songs because it is obviously written in the most blatant and in-your-face way. The song is straight to the point with its catchy chorus and generalities in the lyrics, which complain about the government messing up the environment and say that we should all come together to bring back the United States of America. In this track, the joke really comes through.

Another great point in the album is the song "Papagenu (He's My Sassafrass)," The song is about a yeti that becomes Black's father. The song changes pace at the end and sounded a lot like the song "Kielbasa!" from their self-titled album.

Overall, this is only an album that a true Tenacious D fan can appreciate. While not a solid album in its entirety, it does offer enough substance to keep the listener involved.

HOCKEY from page 8

18 of which are league games," Cahoon said. "We just need to worry about BU [tonight] and get as many conference points as we can. Try to win as many games as we can between now and the Christmas break."

The last time these two teams met was in the first round of last year's Hockey East playoffs. BU swept the best-of-three series from the Minutemen. Both games were played at Agganis Arena.

Over the past two years the Minutemen haven't faired well when traveling to face BU. UMass is 0-6 in its last six games against the Terriers on their home ice.

After going on a five-game winless streak – beginning in the final days of October – the Terriers have picked up play game as of late. BU enters tonight's game with three-straight wins over Providence, Yale and Harvard.

One thing that remains consistent for BU coach Jack Parker is the play of goaltender John Curry. The senior has allowed more than two goals on just two occasions this season. Both of which came in 4-4 ties – one against Rensselaer on Oct. 14, and again against New Hampshire on Nov. 10.

Overall this season Curry has saved 244 of 264 shots he's faced. That amounts to a .924 save percentage, and a 1.94 goals-against average.

This season BU is struggling on the power play. Currently it's converting the man advantage at just a .149 rate. The Terriers have scored 10 power-play goals on 67 chances.

Pete MacArthur currently leads BU with two power-play goals. Eight other players on the Terriers' roster have recorded just a single man-advantage goal.

But that number may go up tonight.

The referee whistled UMass for 11 penalties against Union on Saturday night. A number much higher than Cahoon is used to seeing from his team. The Minutemen are currently the least-penalized team in the nation.

Cahoon said the abnormal amount of penalties stem from the strict nature of the Eastern Collegiate Athletic Conference.

"The league, from my understanding, calls penalties totally different than any other college league and there's been a lot of criticism about it and a lot of concern," he said. "It impacted the game in the way it was played, but it didn't have a whole lot to do with the result."

Matt Burto returned to the ice against Vermont a week ago after suffering an injury when he crashed into the boards against PC on Nov. 3.

touchdown pass.

The pair hooked up for the second time less than five minutes later. Ball got free of the Pirate defense for a seven-yard touchdown grab.

UNH scored again with two seconds remaining to take a 34-21 lead into the locker room.

The Pirates came out firing in the third quarter. Sheppard eluded Wildcat defenders for a six-yard touchdown run to cut the lead to six. And with time winding down in the quarter, Sheppard found McDaniel for a six-yard touchdown pass to take the lead.

The final quarter began with the Pirates leading the Wildcats by one point, 35-34. The first three quarters were full of offense and lead changes. The final quarter didn't produce nearly as many points, but it certainly wasn't lacking in excitement.

The Wildcats started a drive at their own 13-yard line. They promptly fumbled and set up the Pirates for an insurance score. The Wildcats held Hampton to just three points on a 43-yard Andrew Paterini field goal.

UNH began its drive at its own 28-yard line with 8:46 left on the game clock. The Wildcats were down by four points with their season on the line and one of the best defenses in the nation standing in front of them.

However, the Pirates were no match for A-10 Co-Offensive Player of the Year Santos, and some crafty play calling by UNH coach Sean McDonnell.

The Wildcats struggled to move the ball on the drive and lined up for a punt on 4th-and-5 from their own 33-yard line.

However, the snap went directly to the up-man, Evan Loring, who pitched it to Maurice Duper. Duper scurried for 19 yards and a Wildcat first down, shocking Hampton and prolonging the UNH drive.

Santos threw an incompletion on the next play. However a pass interference call on Hampton linebacker Justin Durant gave UNH another first down.

The next play resulted in a nine-yard completion from Santos to Loring to move UNH to the Hampton 37.

UNH sputtered after that, Santos threw three incomplete passes and a holding penalty found the Wildcats in a fourth-and-16 at the Hampton 25.

It was going to take something of a miracle to convert for a first down, let alone score the necessary touchdown to overcome the four-point deficit.

Santos knew this when he dropped back, the pressure was nothing for the junior. He found Chad Kackert hoping to convert the first down, he did more than that. Kackert broke free and ran into the end zone for a 25-yard touchdown reception staking the Wildcats to a 41-38 lead which they would not relinquish.

James Madison vs. Youngstown State

The Youngstown State Penguins boasted the nation's fourth-ranked rushing attack when they welcomed the James Madison Dukes to Stambaugh Stadium for their first-round matchup on Saturday.

JMU coach Mickey Matthews made stopping the Penguins zone-option attack the main focus of his team's preparation.

A talented James Madison defensive unit certainly did everything Matthews asked of them against the run – holding YSU to 94 yards on the ground.

Walter Payton Award finalist Marcus Mason ran for just 78 yards on 26 carries. The rest of the YSU backfield was practically shutout by the JMU run defense.

However, the Dukes didn't count on one thing, the Penguins passed for 318 yards en route to a 35-31 victory – the Penguins will play Illinois State on Saturday.

YSU quarterback Tom Zetts threw for 314 yards and a touchdown while running back Monquantae Mason added a touchdown toss of his own.

The Penguins were down 31-28 when they began their final drive with 4:41 left on the game clock.

After two incompletions and a delay-of-game penalty, Zetts found himself facing a 3rd-and-15 from his own 7-yard line.

Zetts dropped back on the third-down play and amidst a heavy rush from the Dukes completed a 30-yard pass to T.J. Peterson to give the Penguins a new life.

Another third-down conversion was necessary when the Penguins faced a 3rd-and-6. Zetts' pass fell incomplete but a pass interference call on JMU cornerback Evan McCollough saved the Dukes.

YSU suffered another scare on the drive when Peterson fumbled after a three-yard catch-and-run – he recovered his own fumble however.

The YSU run game woke up at just the right time. Mason ran for seven and 10 yards on consecutive plays. The Penguins called a timeout after a five-yard run by Mason to the James Madison 1-yard line with 1:15 left on the clock

On first and goal, Mason plowed through the line for the score – giving YSU a 35-31 advantage.

JMU's comeback hopes fell short and YSU escaped with a victory.

Playoff Scenarios

Defending national champion Appalachian State squares off against an unseeded Montana State team on Saturday. Not only is ASU the tournament's top seed, but it occupies the No.1 spot in all national polls.

The Mountaineers defeated Coastal Carolina 45-28 in the first round. They held a 31-0 lead at half-time before yielding 28 points to the Chanticleers but were able to hold them off, preserving their win.

ASU is the favorite to win the tournament and its second-consecutive national championship. The Mountaineers could face the fourth-seeded YSU Penguins if they advance past Montana State in the national quarterfinals.

Last year, ASU defeated Southern Illinois in the quarterfinals on its run to a national title.

Southern Illinois heads to Montana to take on the Grizzlies this weekend. The Salukis defeated Tennessee-Martin in the first round by a score of 36-30.

SIU would like nothing more than to take on ASU in the national championship game this season to avenge its loss last season's quarterfinals. This will be very tough as they need to defeat Montana on the road this Saturday and even if they get past Montana, the winner of UMass-UNH would await them in the semifinals.

Montana is undefeated at home this season. The Grizzlies are 10-1 overall with their only loss coming to the Big Ten's Iowa Hawkeyes in the season opener.

Montana is ranked second nationally as well as being the tournament's No. 2 seed.

The Grizzlies defeated McNeese State last week, 31-6. Montana boasts the nation's 17th-best passing attack as well as the 16th best scoring defense in the country.

A victory over the Salukis would give Montana a home game in the semifinals against either UMass or UNH.

The Grizzlies fell in the opening round of last year's tournament to a tough team from Cal-Poly.

A matchup between Montana and Montana State could decide the national championship – MSU would need to win consecutive games against some of the nation's top teams however. Montana won the contest with its in-state rival in the regular season finale by a score of 13-7.

The Bobcats defeated last year's national semifinalist Furman 31-7 in the opening round.

If UMass prevails over UNH this weekend, the Minutemen would need to travel to Missoula, Mont., providing the Grizzlies win on Saturday.

However, if SIU defeats Montana, UMass gets a third home game in its quest for the program's first national championship since 1998.

Of course, SIU could have a home game if they defeat Montana and UNH defeats UMass – although UMass defeated the Wildcats this season, last season UNH beat the Minutemen in Amherst sending UMass into a downward spiral that they never recovered from. This cost UMass its season – the Minutemen lost two of their last three games and missed the playoffs.

Although ASU is widely considered the favorite to win the tournament, the talent level amongst all of the teams remaining makes it impossible to rule anyone out. The next few weeks will be interesting and the results should certainly raise an eyebrow or two.

Wildcats getting attention in Hockey East

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

Entering this season, the high-powered offenses and strong goaltending of Maine and Boston College received most of the attention in Hockey East. However, No. 2 New Hampshire (9-2-1, 7-1-1, HEA), currently on an eight-game unbeaten streak, is showing why it deserves some of the recognition.

Hockey East

The Wildcats defeated No. 7 Boston College (7-4-1, 4-2-1 HEA), 6-3, on the eve of Thanksgiving, netting three third-period goals. Playing before a hostile sell-out crowd of nearly 8,000 on the road is no easy task, but apparently UNH thrives in this type of environment. The team is 7-0-0 in away games, while only 2-2-1 in the confines of the Whittemore Center.

UNH coach Dick Umile prefers to put his three best players on the first line. Senior wingers Brett Hemingway and Jacob Micflikier, along with junior center Mike Radja, have scored 16 goals and 42 points thus far.

Although the Wildcats' top line enjoys significant offensive success, the team's second line has scored the second most goals of any line in college hockey. Center Trevor Smith, right wing Matt Fornataro and left wing Jerry Pollastrone have combined for 22 goals and a total of 55 points.

On Wednesday night, the second line accounted for half of the team's offensive output with each member scoring one goal. Kevin Regan played well in net, stopping 21 of 24 shots. The junior shut out the Eagles in the third period, but he only faced two shots. Regan earned a share of Defensive Player of the Week.

Climbing Catamounts

Vermont (7-4-1, 5-1-1 HEA) took over second place in the conference with two hard fought victories. The Catamounts defeated No. 19 Massachusetts (6-3-1, 4-2-0 HEA) on Tuesday night, and then upended No. 3 Maine (8-3-1, 3-3-1 HEA) at home on Saturday.

The No. 18 Catamounts played their trademark great defense against the Black Bears. Junior Joe Fallon stopped 27 shots in goal, but allowed Maine to get back into the game late in the third period. The Black Bears scored with the extra man with 31 seconds left. Vermont scored an empty-net goal six seconds later, but Fallon allowed another score with four seconds to go. Regardless, the conference named him Co-Defensive Player of the Week for his total of 42 shots saved in the two games.

With two goals and two assists in both games, junior forward Torrey Mitchell earned Player of the Week honors. Mitchell tallied twice against Massachusetts and assisted on empty-net goals in each game.

Vermont started the season strong with neutral site victories over Colgate (5-8-2) and No. 4 Miami of Ohio (10-4-0) to win the Ice Breaker Invitational. But the team dropped back-to-back games to Michigan Tech (6-4-2) and lost on the road to Boston College to begin the month of November.

The Catamounts will put their five-game winning streak on the line with a three game road trip this week. They face Harvard (3-8-0) tonight, UMass Lowell (3-6-3, 2-4-2 HEA) on Friday and New Hampshire on Sunday afternoon.

Mayor's Cup

Every year, the two colleges from the city of Providence play each other for the Mayor's Cup. The squads of Brown and Providence College compete for bragging rights, and the ability to lay claim to the trophy for another year.

In the 21st edition of the event, Brown (3-3-2) took a two-goal first-period lead on the Friars (4-9-1, 3-5-1 HEA) and never looked back. Providence's top goal scorer, senior Colin McDonald, tallied on a power play early in the second period. Although goalie Tyler Sims was strong in net with 33 saves, Providence scored only one goal for less for the fifth time this season.

Yet, judging from the game's sparse attendance (1,200 fans) it is evident that the people of Providence do not embrace the rivalry as much as the schools do.

Senior goalkeeper John Curry had his shutout streak of 148 minutes snapped by Harvard last Tuesday, but the No. 9 Terriers (5-2-4, 3-2-3 HEA) held on for a 2-1 win. BU and BC renew their rivalry on Saturday at Agganis Arena. ... Senior forward Jason Tejchma of UMass Lowell converted his fifth multi-point game of the season on Friday against Providence. Tejchma is the River Hawks' leading scorer with six goals and seven assists in 12 games.

Merrimack (1-9-1, 1-5-0 HEA) is in the midst of a 10-day break between matches. The Warriors suit up for three games this week, one against UNH and two with Northeastern. ... The future looks bright for Northeastern (2-8-2, 0-7-2 HEA) in net. Freshman keeper Brad Thiessen has made at least 35 saves in four games this year. ... Vermont had a sellout crowd at Gutterson Fieldhouse for the 44th straight game. However, this figure is misleading since the arena only seats 4,035, compared with the school that has the largest capacity, Massachusetts, with 8,370. The fan capacities of the other rinks in the league: Boston College, 7,880; UMass Lowell, 6,500; New Hampshire, 6,500; Boston University, 6,300; Northeastern, 5,900; Maine, 5,640; Providence, 3,030; Merrimack, 3,000. Most coaches prefer to have an arena somewhere between the size of Gutterson and the Mullins Center. They want the capacity to be big enough to allow for large crowds, but they don't want to be playing in huge, empty arenas all season, either.

New Hampshire goaltender Kevin Regan was named Hockey East Co-Defensive Player of the Week for his efforts against Boston College. He stopped 21-of-24 shots in UNH's 6-3 win over the Eagles last week.

Minutemen remain down south for matchup with Tigers

BY DANNY PICARD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

One of the more anticipated games of the season takes place on Saturday night against No. 23 Boston College at the Mullins Center, but the Massachusetts men's basketball team has one more game before it returns home to host the Eagles.

UMass (5-1) takes on Savannah State tonight at 7 p.m. in Georgia after coming off a successful Thanksgiving weekend. The Minutemen defeated St. Francis, 83-49, on Wednesday and rolled over Jacksonville State, 100-69, on Saturday.

Savannah State (5-3) comes into tonight's game on a three-game losing skid. The Tigers won their first five games of the season, but ran into a wall on Nov. 21, losing to Illinois, 81-34. Since that game, the Tigers lost to Jackson State and Florida A&M.

Savannah State is led by seniors Javon Randolph and Joshua Obiajunwa. Randolph is the team's leading scorer, averaging 19.6 points per game and shooting 51 percent from the field (48-for-95). Randolph led the Tigers in scoring in every game but one this season, and has finished in double figures in six of those seven games.

The only game Randolph did not lead his team in scoring, Obiajunwa picked up the slack, scoring a team-high 17 points in the Tigers' win over Southeastern University on Nov. 19.

Obiajunwa is Savannah State's top rebounder. He averages 9.3 boards per game and has a total of 74 on the year. He led the Tigers in rebounds in seven of their eight games, and has had four games with 10 or more.

NO MORE ROAD WOES

The Minutemen have already matched last year's win total away from home. Its three wins away from the Mullins Center in this young season is the same amount that UMass had throughout all of last year. The 2005-06 team posted a 3-13 record on the road, and just six games into 2006-07, that number has been matched.

UMass' wins against Oakland, Northeastern and Jacksonville State were enough to match last year's total, and give the team a much-needed presence on the road. And they'll need it. Savannah State is a perfect 5-0 at Tiger Arena in Georgia, and host the Minutemen tonight.

BLOCK PARTY

Senior forward Stephane Lasme was named the Atlantic 10 Player of the Week on Sunday, and for good reason. Lasme set a school-record for blocked shots in a single game last Wednesday with 11 against St. Francis. He also posted the second triple-double in UMass history in the same game, adding 19 points and 10 rebounds to his final statistics.

The only previous triple-double was put together by current Boston College coach Al Skinner. Skinner had 28 points, 18 rebounds and 10 assists against St. Peter's on Dec. 28, 1973. Lasme finished the three-game week averaging 12.3 points, 10.7 rebounds and 5.7 blocks.

Lasme led UMass in rebounding in all but the first game of the season. He grabbed 10 or more boards in four of those games. He averages 10.2 rebounds per game, and has 61 total.

FORBES AND FREE-MEN AMONG BOYS

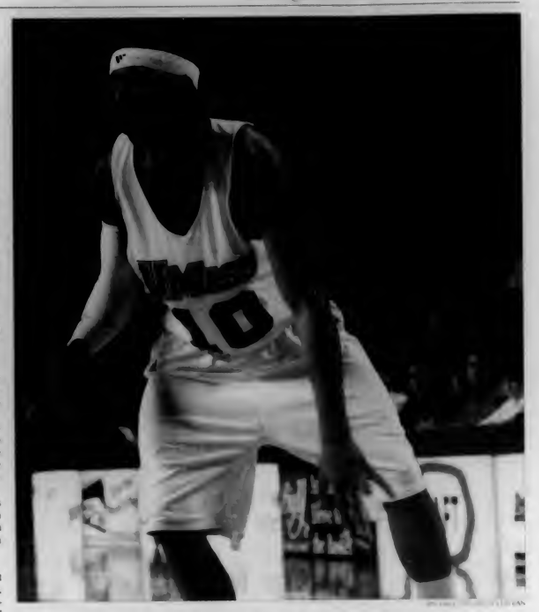
Junior Gary Forbes and senior Rashaun Freeman are the other two components to UMass' three-headed monster. Both Forbes and Freeman have scored in double figures in all six games this season.

Forbes has played a huge role this year, after sitting out last season due to NCAA transfer rules. The former Virgina guard scored 20 points for the first time with UMass and the fifth time in his career in Saturday night's 100-69 win over Jacksonville State. He has now scored in double figures 30 times in his career.

Freeman finished Saturday's game with 18 points and 10 rebounds. It marked his 70th career game with 10 or more points. He leads the team in scoring with 17.7 points per game, and is shooting 68 percent from the field (43-for-63).

BACK TO THE GLORY DAYS?

With Saturday's win, UMass is off to its best start at 5-1 since the 1995-96 season. In that year, the Minutemen got off to a 26-0 start, and eventually advanced to the Final Four. UMass also scored 100 points for the first time since Dec. 22, 1999 in Saturday's game.



Tiki Mayben attempted just one field goal in UMass' 100-69 win over Jacksonville State on Saturday. He finished the game with no points, three assists and one rebound in 27 minutes of play.

UM hurts opposing run game

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Enter the weekend, the game between the Massachusetts football team and Lafayette was billed as a game that featured two prolific runners – Steve Baylark for UMass and Jonathan Hurt for Lafayette.

UMass Football

Baylark held up his end of the bargain, rushing for 152 yards and two touchdowns, but the UMass defense took care of Hurt. The Minutemen held the Patriot League rushing champion to just 41 yards on the ground. He recorded 1,165 yards during the regular season.

"Obviously, we take great pride in stopping the run against all opponents," said defensive end John Hatchell. "The fact that he was the Patriot League rushing champion [made us] real excited to get after him and stop the run game. It looks like we did a pretty good job today."

Hurt rushed 16 times, giving him an average of 2.6 yards per rush on the day. His longest run of the game came on the senior's first carry of the game. It went for nine yards.

As a team, the Leopards only gained 61 yards on the ground. The past two games the Minutemen allowed a combined 60 rushing yards – they held Hofstra to -1 rushing yards in the regular season finale.

PLAYING THROUGH PAIN

Despite a knee injury that kept him out of the game against the Pride on Nov. 18, Hatchell played against the Leopards on Saturday. During the week the senior said nothing was going to keep him from the McGuirk field in the opening round of the playoffs.

Hatchell said during warm ups he still wasn't sure if he'd be able to play, but his knee felt better throughout the game.

"When I warmed up during pregame I started feeling better," he said. "As the game went on, honestly, I continued to feel better and better. I felt I was as close to 100 percent since the injury happened; I was pretty happy with that."

Hatchell made one of the oddest plays of the day against Lafayette. On 3rd-and-4 with 10 minutes remaining in the third, he put heavy pressure quarterback Brad Maurer. He tried getting the ball to Hurt on a swing pass, but Hatchell got his hand on the ball.

The deflection went right back its source, landing in Maurer's hands. Hatchell then wrestled the quarterback down. The play was officially scored as a completed pass for a loss of 11 yards.

"I don't know how he caught the ball, it was kind of a strange turn of events. But after that I got a grasp on him and was able to drag him down," Hatchell said.

It was one of two stops for Hatchell on the afternoon, and his only solo tackle in the game. UMass coach Don Brown said putting pressure on the Lafayette linemen and Maurer was a focus for his defense entering the weekend.

"Defensively we came from everywhere today, tried to really get after Maurer a little bit," he said.

STALWARTS ON THE LINE

Two men making Baylark and Liam Coen's jobs easy this season are David Thompson and Alex Miller. The seniors made their 47th consecutive start for UMass on Saturday. That ties them for the most consecutive starts in school history.

The guard and center are now tied atop the list with Shannon James, Maikel Maret and Jerard White.

Thompson and Miller's streak spans the entirety of their UMass careers. Over that time, they've lead the way for four Baylark 1,000-yard seasons and Jeff Krohn's 2,961-yard, 28-touchdown campaign in 2003.

The pair constitutes a big piece the Minutemen need to fill next season.

HISTORIC YOUNG CAREER

Junior kicker Chris Koepplin continued his stellar season Saturday. His five extra points against Lafayette gives him 44 on the season and the same number in his short career at UMass.

His PAT following Baylark's 26-yard touchdown run in the first quarter broke the UMass record for extra points in a season. His first extra point tied him with Michael Torres, who set the mark in 2003 ... The win was the Minutemen's first postseason victory since 1999. That year they defeated Furman in the first round of the playoffs. UMass lost to Colgate in its previous playoff appearance in 2003.

Brandon Freeman and the UMass defense shut down Lafayette's running game on Saturday. UMass allowed just 61 yards on the ground.

Mass Attack returns to conference play

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The seesaw schedule continues for the Massachusetts hockey team tonight. UMass goes back to conference play against Boston University at Agganis Arena.

For the past two weeks the Minutemen have alternated between conference and non-conference games, and will continue to do so after tonight when Niagara comes to Amherst on Friday.

It started with a non-conference 8-1 win over Connecticut on Nov. 18, then came a 4-0 defeat at the hands of league foe Vermont, on Saturday the Minutemen lost to Union and now square off against BU and Niagara.

"It's early in the season. We'll go 100 percent conference once Christmas passes," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We have four more conference games this semester, so that would make for 10 conference games with eighteen to play after Christmas."

Conference play has been kind to the Minutemen this season. Their record is good for eight points and currently places them fifth in the league. With nine points, the Terriers are right above UMass in fourth.

The Mass Attack plays its final non-conference matchup late in December in the Dodge Holiday Classic, taking place in Minnesota. After that it's league games each night.

"We still have 20 games to play,

UNH advances in postseason

BY JOE MELONI
COLLEGIAN STAFF

When the NCAA Division I Football Championship selection committee announced its bracket on Nov. 19, everyone saw it coming.

If the Massachusetts football team defeated Lafayette and the New Hampshire Wildcats could outlast a feisty Hampton team, a rematch of 2006's most anticipated Atlantic 10 conference showdown would be the main event of the tournament's second round.

NCAA Football

The Wildcats defeated Hampton, 41-38, on Saturday and the Minutemen overcame some early mistakes to roll over the Lafayette Leopards, 35-14.

The Wildcats got on the board first on Saturday. UNH embarked upon a seven-play 75-yard drive, capped off by a one-yard touchdown strike from Ricky Santos to Aaron Brown.

The key play of the drive was a 22-yard completion from Santos to David Ball on a 3rd-and-5 that found UNH on the Pirates 1-yard line.

Hampton wasted little time in response – scoring a touchdown of its own on the ensuing drive.

Kevin Teel received the kickoff at his own 10-yard line and returned it 69 yards to the UNH 21.

It took Hampton five plays to move the ball 21 yards for the score – quarterback Princeton Sheppard was four-of-four on the drive, including a four-yard touchdown pass to Marquay McDaniel.

The Pirates scored twice more to take a 21-13 lead at the end of the game's first period.

Both of the scores came on the ground. Alonzo Coleman scampered 55 yards for the touchdown to take the Pirates first lead of the game 14-13.

Then Kevin Beverly put the finishing touches on a 10-play, 80-yard drive with a four-yard touchdown jaunt.

The lead was short lived, however. The Wildcats scored 21 points in the second quarter while shutting out the Pirates.

The first two UNH touchdowns of the quarter came on passes from Santos to Ball.

The pair hooked up 11 times in 11 regular season games to lead the A-10.

UNH began the second quarter with the ball at its own 47-yard line. An eight-play, 57-yard drive resulted in seven points for the Wildcats when Santos located Ball for a 15-yard

Two UMass researchers aid in new fault detection model

Dr. Michele Cooke and Scott T. Marshall have developed the Boundary Element Method, which predicts seismic movement smaller than 1 mm in the southern California fault system.

BY CARA GRANNEMANN & EDEN UNIVER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Two members of the Geology department at the University of Massachusetts have compiled new data about seismic movements in the southern California fault system. They have achieved this by developing their own model of the system.

Doctor Michele Cooke and doctoral student Scott T. Marshall created the Boundary Element Method, or BEM to predict seismic movement smaller than 1mm per year. The BEM extends the pre-existing California Fault Model 17 miles further into the Earth, where the lower crust meets the mantel. This area is known as the Mohorovicic discontinuity, or Moho region.

Cooke and Marshall's experiments focus on the smaller slip rates in the area, which they say deserve more attention, according to a UMass press release.

"Models that do not include deep fault motions may produce inaccurate results," said Marshall. "Millions of people live directly under the faults in L.A., making it extremely important to properly understand [fault] behavior.

"Although many faults in Los Angeles may be moving slowly, this doesn't mean that they are not dangerous," said Marshall.

The more inaccurate models of the southern California region were planar and simplified. The new model not only contains data from the deeper regions of the fault, but it is also three-dimensional.

Once the data was compiled, it was given to the Southern California Earthquake Center where scientists argued the impact and importance of the data collected by Cooke and Marshall.

"This was all handed to researchers at Harvard University who were able to construct a 3-D representation of what the fault in southern California actually looked like based on this data," said Marshall.

Cooke and Marshall's data have upgraded the California Fault Model to a version 4.0, from its previous 2.5 version.

"As for the model as it is today, I would say that it has taken us at least 3 years to get the model to the point where we are confident that we understand what its behavior is and that the results are accurate," Marshall said.

The model has proven to be extremely accurate, even in differing types of faults.

Cooke and Marshall's method contributed to the model of the southern California area that has become the new standard of fault models and has furthered the accuracy of tectonic movement.

Marshall says they plan on submitting a paper on works similar to those of the Los Angeles model for the nearby Ventura Basin soon.

Dr. Michele Cooke of the UMass Geology department.

Dr. Michele Cooke received her B.S.E. from Princeton University and her M.S. and P.H.d. from Stanford University. Her collaborator Scott T. Marshall has a B.S. from Wright State University and a M.S. from the University of Idaho and is currently working on his P.H.d from UMass while further developing his tectonic research.

U.S. increases push towards legalizing gambling Web sites

BY DERRICK PERKINS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Despite a 56 percent decline in traffic on online gambling sites last month, according to Nielsen NetRatings, there has been a push within the United States and internationally towards the legalization and regulation of online gambling.

MGM Mirage chief executive officer Terry Lanni told Reuters, at a conference in Las Vegas earlier this month, that there could be a chance to explore the legalization of online gambling in light of the change in control of the United States Congress to the Democratic Party.

MGM is looking for a commissioned study to analyze the possible success of legalization and regulation of online gambling in the U.S., according to Lanni. The decision on whether or not to push for legislation calling for such a study, will be made by the American Gambling Association, also currently chaired by Lanni, in December.

Since the U.S. Congress passed the legislation effectively banning online gambling on September 30, an estimated $7.6 billion has been lost on stocks of publicly traded online gambling businesses. Some of the larger online gambling companies have said they are no longer accepting bets from customers based in the U.S. since President George W. Bush signed the legislation on October 13, according to the International Herald Tribune.

Peter Dean, chairman of Britain's Gaming Commission, also in attendance at the Las Vegas conference, told Reuters that "[Britain] firmly believes that the way forward is to regulate, not prohibit."

Officials within the British government have begun to move towards creating international regulation of online gambling, holding a conference last month in Ascot, England with delegates from more than 30 other countries to discuss the future of the online gambling market.

Richard Caborn, the British sports minister, told the International Herald Tribune that the British government was attempting to "engage" with international organizations, such as the World Trade Organization, as it pushed for legalization and regulation of the industry internationally.

Superior Court argues definition of 'sandwich'

Students ordering burritos at the Blue Wall Café say that there is a difference between a sandwich and a burrito, an argument that lies before the Superior Court. A Panera franchise in Shrewbury wants to prevent a Qdoba Mexican Grill from opening, saying that both places serve "sandwiches."

BY PEDRO VELAZ
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This just in: a burrito is not a sandwich.

At least according to a judge it isn't.

In 2001, the Panera Bread Co., a bakery-and-café chain based out of St. Louis, Missouri, tried to invoke a clause in its 2001 lease agreement to prevent the White City Shopping Center in Shrewsbury from renting to another sandwich shop. In doing so, they were hoping to prevent the opening of a Qdoba Mexican Grill. As a result, the heavy decision of what defines a sandwich was set before Superior Court Judge Jeffery Locke.

Citing Webster's Dictionary and testimony from a chef, as well as from a former high-ranking federal agriculture official, Locke ruled against Panera, deciding that burritos, as well as Qdoba's other offerings, such as tacos and quesadillas, are not sandwiches.

"A sandwich is not commonly understood to include burritos, tacos and quesadillas, which are typically made with a single tortilla and stuffed with a choice filling of meat, rice, and beans," Judge Locke wrote in his decision.

The Panera Bread Co., which has over 900 cafes across the country, argued for a much broader definition of the term "sandwich," claiming that a sandwich consists of a food product with bread and a filling, and arguing

Report shows CO2 emissions have doubled

BY MERADAH FOLEY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

SYDNEY, Australia – The rate at which humans are pumping carbon dioxide into the atmosphere has more than doubled since the 1990s, according to Australian research, the latest report warning about the high rate of emissions accumulating in the atmosphere.

Findings published by Australia's Commonwealth Scientific and Industrial Research Organization also showed that 2005 marked the fourth-consecutive year of increased carbon dioxide emissions.

The study analyzed a 30-year record of air samples collected at an Australian Bureau of Meteorology observation station on the southern island state of Tasmania.

Mike Raupach, a scientist with the organization, said from 2000 to 2005 the growth rate of carbon dioxide emissions was more than 2.5 percent per year, whereas in the 1990s it was less than 1 percent per year.

Raupach, who is also co-chairman of the Global Carbon Project, said 7.85 billion tons of carbon passed into the atmosphere last year, compared to 6.67 billion tons in 2000.

About half of all carbon dioxide emissions remain trapped in the atmosphere, and the rest are absorbed by the land and oceans, Raupach said. As emissions rise, so does the amount of carbon in the air.

Earlier this month, the World Meteorological Organization reported the level of carbon dioxide in the atmosphere reached 379.1 parts per million in 2005, more than 35 percent higher than in the late 18th century.

Tourists and protestors stand in the rain outside the Supreme Court in Washington on Nov. 8, 2006, to argue that the U.S. government should regulate emissions of greenhouse gases.

Schools appeal on 'No Child' lawsuit

BY TERRY KINNEY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CINCINNATI —School districts in three states and the nation's largest teachers union asked a federal appeals court Tuesday to revive a lawsuit challenging the way government-mandated programs are funded.

The National Education Association and districts in Michigan, Vermont and Texas had sued to block the No Child Left Behind law, President Bush's signature education policy. They argued that schools should not have to comply with requirements that aren't paid for by the federal government.

Chief U.S. District Judge Bernard A. Friedman in Detroit dismissed the lawsuit in November 2005.

Attorney Robert Chanin, representing the Pontiac, Mich., school district and the other plaintiffs, told the 6th U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Tuesday that states submitted compliance plans based on their understanding of the level of government support that would be provided. But Congress appropriated far less than needed, leaving local school districts to make up the difference, he said.

The law requires states to revise academic standards and develop tests to measure students' progress annually. If students fail to make progress, the law requires states to take action against school districts.

The three-judge appeals court panel took the case under advisement and did not say when it will rule. The outcome would apply directly to the districts in the case, but could affect how the law is enforced in schools across the country.

DAYTON, Ohio—A mother was arrested on suspicion of murdering her newborn daughter by microwaving the baby in an oven. China Arnold, 26, was jailed Monday on a charge of aggravated murder, more than a year after she brought her dead month-old baby to a hospital. Bail was set Tuesday at $1 million.

"We have reason to believe, and we have some forensic evidence that is consistent with our belief, that a microwave oven was used in this death," said Ken Betz, director of the Montgomery County coroner's office.

He said the evidence included high-heat internal injuries and the absence of external burn marks on the baby, Paris Talley.

Arnold was arrested soon after the baby's death in August 2005, then was released while authorities investigated further. Betz said the case was difficult because "there is not a lot of scientific research and data on the effect of microwaves on human beings."

The death was ruled homicide by hyperthermia, or high body temperature. The absence of external burns ruled out an open flame, scalding water or a heating pad as the cause, Betz said.

Arnold's lawyer, Jon Paul Rion, said his client had nothing to do with her child's death and was stunned when investigators told her that a microwave might have been involved.

"China — as a mother and a person — was horrified that such an act could occur," Rion said.

The night before the baby was taken to the hospital, Arnold and the child's father went out for a short time and left Paris with a baby sitter, Rion said. The mother didn't sense anything out of the ordinary until the next morning, when the child was found unconscious, Rion said.

Arnold has three other children.

In 2000, a Virginia woman was sentenced to five years in prison for killing her month-old son in a microwave oven. Elizabeth Renee Otte claimed she had no memory of cramming her son in the microwave and turning on the appliance in 1999. Experts said that Otte suffered from epilepsy and that her seizures were followed by blackouts.

China Arnold, 26, was arrested and charged on Monday with aggravated murder in the death of her three-week-old daughter.

Court won't take school vouchers case

BY PETE YOST
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—The Supreme Court decided Monday not to plunge into the issue of school choice, passing up a dispute over a Maine law that bars the use of public funds to send students to private religious schools.

A conservative group, the Institute for Justice, had asked the justices to take the case. The group is representing eight Maine families who would receive public tuition funds but for the fact that their children attend religious schools.

Florida Gov. Jeb Bush and President Bush's homestate of Texas had weighed in, saying in filings to the Supreme Court that Maine is unconstitutionally discriminating against religion.

Vouchers are championed by the president and many conservatives who call them a ticket out of dismal and dangerous public schools. However, those who champion public education say that vouchers divert already-scarce resources from a system badly in need of repair.

School districts in 145 small towns in Maine that have no high schools currently offer tuition for 17,000 students to attend high schools of their choice, public or private, in-state or out-of-state. But religious schools are no longer on the list. Maine's school system dates back to 1879.

In 1980, the state attorney general said the program violated the U.S. Constitution's Establishment Clause. The Maine Legislature made it law in 1983.

Last April, the Maine Supreme Judicial Court ruled that restrictions on tuition vouchers are a valid, constitutional enactment. The court said the state attorney general and the legislature were motivated by a desire to respect and comply with the Constitution rather than any religious hostility.

Dick Komer, the senior litigation attorney for the Institute for Justice, said Maine is engaging in blatant government discrimination against parents who choose religious schools and that it is "appalling that the nation's highest court" lets it continue.

In upholding the exclusion of religious schools from the system, the Maine court relied on a 2004 U.S. Supreme Court ruling upholding a Washington state college scholarship program prohibiting the use of scholarship funds for pursuit of a devotional theology degree.

The Institute for Justice said the Maine case gives the justices an opportunity to make clear that its 2004 decision only carved out a narrow exception to the general rule requiring equal treatment of religious and nonreligious options.

In asking the Supreme Court to take the case, the Maine families cited the court's 2002 decision allowing the use of public funds in inner-city Cleveland to underwrite tuition at private or parochial schools if parents retain a wide choice of where to send their children.

The Maine case is Kevin and Julia Anderson v. Durham School Department, 06-132.

Doctors test implant device used to block strokes

Grace Holland received an experimental stroke-blocking device called the Watchman, which protects against atrial fibrillation.

BY LAURAN NEERGAARD
ASSOCIATED PRESS

WASHINGTON—At least 120,000 Americans a year suffer strokes because of a common irregular heartbeat — one that's on the rise, hard to treat and can shoot deadly blood clots straight to the brain. Now doctors are experimenting with a new way to prevent those brain attacks: a tiny device that seals off a little section of the jiggling heart where the clots form.

If it works — and a major study is under way — the Watchman device might provide long-needed protection for thousands of people with atrial fibrillation, whose main hope now is a problematic blood-thinning drug that too many can't tolerate.

"I don't think I'm biased, but it could potentially revolutionize a-fib, which is a ton of people," says Dr. Steven Almany, vice chief of cardiology at William Beaumont Hospital in Royal Oak, Mich. He has implanted the Watchman into more than a dozen patients so far.

About 2.8 million Americans have atrial fibrillation, the most common type of irregular heartbeat. It is most common among the elderly, and cases are increasing as the population grays.

A-fib occurs when the heart's top chambers, called the atria, get out of sync with the bottom chambers' pumping. The atria speed up, sometimes so fast that they quiver like a bag of worms. Blood pools inside a pocket of the heart, allowing clots to form.

About 20 percent of the nation's strokes are blamed on the condition, and they tend to be particularly severe. About a third of the victims die, and another third are significantly disabled, Almany says.

The blood thinner warfarin, also called Coumadin, lowers the stroke risk dramatically. But it is very difficult to use — it can't be taken together with dozens of other medicines, and requires dietary restrictions and regular blood testing. In addition, side effects include serious, even life-threatening, bleeding.

By some estimates, almost half the people who should take the drug can't or won't, and "there are lots of people out there on Coumadin who want off," says Dr. William Gray, a cardiologist studying the Watchman at New York's Columbia University Medical Center. "This provides the opportunity, hopefully, to get them off the drug."

In atrial fibrillation, 90 percent of stroke-causing blood clots collect inside a jalapeno pepper-shaped flap of tissue that hangs off the edge of the left atrium. Some call it the heart's belly button, a leftover from fetal development that the body no longer needs.

The Watchman physically seals off that flap, depriving clots of their staging area. The question is whether that really will stop strokes. To find out, doctors are recruiting hundreds of patients around the country to get either the experimental device or the usual Coumadin.

How does the Watchman work?

Doctors thread the mesh-covered metal brace through a leg vein up to the heart, and wedge it into the opening of the troublesome flap. Tiny hooks hold it in place until heart tissue grows over it to form a permanent seal. Forty-five days after implantation, Watchman recipients have a tube put down their throats for a special heart scan to tell if the flap really is closed off. If so, they quit Coumadin.

Of the roughly 250 patients enrolled so far, 97 percent of Watchman recipients have quit the drug, Almany says. They still must be tracked for at least two years, to see how many have a stroke.

"I was a little apprehensive at first," Grace Holland of Shelby Township, Mich., says of the experiment.

Holland, 76, didn't mention her heartbeat's "flutter" to doctors for years; she had no idea it could cause a stroke. Finally diagnosed, she took Coumadin for about two years before suddenly suffering internal bleeding that almost killed her, her arms and legs streaked with black as an ambulance sped her to the hospital.

The close call persuaded Holland to try the Watchman, and a year later she's off Coumadin and feeling good. "It's such a relief."

An American Stroke Association spokesman cautioned that it's far too early to know if an implant will prove a better gamble than Coumadin, a proven stroke fighter. "I wouldn't want to raise hopes before the data is in," said Dr. Larry Goldstein, director of Duke University's stroke center.

Nor is the Watchman risk-free. The flap it blocks is very thin, posing a puncture risk as doctors hook the device in place.

"You put a hole in there, you've got a problem," says Almany, who had that happen to one patient — and had to do emergency surgery to stop massive bleeding and save the man.

Columbia's Gray notes that a similar experimental device, called the PLAATO, did seem to cut stroke risk by two-thirds in a small study several years ago; it hasn't yet moved into large-scale testing.

If the Watchman ultimately works, Almany predicts the procedure could cost $12,000 or so, less than treating a stroke or a bad Coumadin side effect.

Want to change your undergraduate major to nursing?

We announce the opening of Transfer Application period for current UMASS Amherst undergraduate non nursing majors to apply to change their undergraduate major to the Nursing major.
Due date for transfer application is December 13, 2006.

We are pleased to invite the transfer applications of current undergraduate non nursing majors who wish to apply to the Nursing major in the school of nursing. Transfer applications for the School of Nursing will now be reviewed. All information on eligibility for transfer is contained at the website www.umass.edu/nursing (see transfer notice banner on the home page!)

Doctors: world's first facial transplant was successful

The woman who received the world's first facial transplant is shown in the photograph above, taken nearly one year after the surgery.

BY ANGELA CHARLTON
ASSOCIATED PRESS

PARIS—A year after a Frenchwoman received the world's first partial face transplant, doctors say the operation was a success and she is gaining more and more sensitivity and facial mobility.

As British and American doctors work on plans for a first full-face transplant, the medical team at the hospital in Amiens in northern France issued a new photo and a statement Monday, exactly a year after they transplanted the lips, nose and chin of a brain-dead woman onto Isabelle Dinoire.

In the new photo, Dinoire is almost smiling, and appears to have better control over her face than she did at a news conference in February, her only formal public appearance since the operation.

Dinoire's immune system nearly rejected the transplant twice, the doctors' statement said, but she was given immuno-depressants that helped overcome the threat.

"The tolerance of the transplant is excellent," they said. The team has "confirmed the anatomical and functional success of this first partial face transplant."

"Progress, in terms of sensitivity as much as mobility, is being noted month after month," the doctors said.

Dinoire, 39, was severely disfigured in May 2005 by her pet Labrador. She continues to have weekly medical consultations, but otherwise "leads a normal life," and expects to resume work soon, the doctors' statement said. She lives in Valenciennes in northern France.

Dinoire said she initially had trouble speaking, but now "I am understood wherever I go," according to an interview published Monday in the British daily The Sun.

"It's been a very strange year, but I don't regret anything," she said. "I can feel just about everything as I did before. It may be someone else's face, but when I look in the mirror I see me."

The Sun also reported that Dinoire has a new dog, Max, to replace the one that attacked her and was later put to death.

Last month, an ethics panel approved a London hospital's plan to carry out what could be the world's first full-face transplant, though no candidates for the surgery have yet been selected. The Cleveland Clinic in the United States is also working on plans for full-face transplants.

Isabelle Dinoire is the first person in the world to receive a facial transplant. The French doctor who pioneered the transplant a year ago says his patient is making progress with sensitivity and facial mobility.

Panera tries to define 'sandwich'

that a flour tortilla is, indeed, bread.

Cambridge chef Chris Schlesinger, who testified on Qdoba's behalf, disagrees, saying in his affidavit: "I know of no chef or culinary historian who would call a burrito a sandwich. Indeed, the notion would be absurd to any credible chef or culinary historian."

Schlesinger claimed that a sandwich is of "European roots," generally having "two pieces of leavened bread," while burritos are "specific to Mexico" and are recognized as having hot ingredients rolled into a flat unleavened tortilla.

According to the United States Department of Agriculture Food Standards and Labeling Policy Book, "[A sandwich] must contain at least 35 percent cooked meat and no more than 50 percent bread, typical 'closed-faced' sandwiches consisting of two slices of bread or the top and bottom sections of a sliced bun that enclose meat or poultry."

A burrito, however, is defined as "A Mexican style sandwich-like product consisting of a flour tortilla, various fillings, and at least 15 percent meat or 10 percent cooked poultry meat. The flour tortilla is rolled and may or may not have tucked ends. Fillings may contain, in addition to meat or poultry meat, such major ingredients as beans, potatoes, cheese, rice, tomatoes, and chilies." Judith Quick, former deputy director of the Standards and Labeling Division of the USDA, used this definition in her testimony against Panera.

The USDA defines a burrito as "A Mexican style sandwich-like product consisting of a flour tortilla, various fillings, and cooked meat."

Diners at the UMass Bluewall Café agree.

"Panera shouldn't have sued," says Rachel, 20. "It's a completely different type of restaurant."

When asked if a burrito is a sandwich, the diners came to the same conclusion as the judge.

"It's just a whole different type of food," said Sarah, 20.

"No, I traditionally think of sandwiches as using pieces of bread. Burrito's don't," claims Caitlin, 22.

Ventura, 17, a worker at the Bluewall, agrees.

"A burrito is not a sandwich because a sandwich has two pieces of bread, and a burrito has none."

Some people had other reasons than simply the presence of bread.

"I've had cravings for burritos, and I've had cravings for sandwiches, but never combined. I've never said to myself, 'I could go for a burrito-sandwich right now,'" said Chris, 20.

Panera's spokesman, Mark Crowley declined to comment. He also declined to say whether or not Panera would file an appeal, which they must decide by December 10th.

Panera Bread Co., tries to broaden the definition of a sandwich, saying that the tortilla in a burrito is considered bread, which makes it a sandwich.

U.S. pushes for online gambling

The WTO recently ruled against the U.S. ban on online gambling in a case filed by Antigua, citing the inconsistency of the ban with international trade rules as the ban protected state lotteries and horse racing operators, according to the International Herald Tribune.

A follow up ruling on the case is expected in January.

While the British government may be sympathetic towards Antigua, Cabom declined to predict whether Britain would also challenge the U.S. ban at the WTO by supporting Antigua's complaint.

"Britain wants to be second to none in regulation of online gambling," Dean told Reuters. "Prohibition doesn't have a conspicuous record of success in [the U.S.]...the obvious result is that the activity is going to be driven underground."

The World Trade Organization opposes the recent gambling ban, stating that the new ruling still protects state lotteries and horse racing operators.

Video game effects linger in brain

BY SUSAN KELLY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO—Teens who play violent video games shows increased activity in areas of the brain linked to emotional arousal and decreased responses in regions that govern self-control, a study released on Tuesday found.

The study used functional magnetic resonance imaging to record tiny metabolic changes in brain activity in 44 adolescents who were asked to perform a series of tasks after playing either a violent or nonviolent video game for 30 minutes.

The children, with no history of behavior problems, ranged in age from 13 to 17. Half played a T-rated first-person shooter game called "Medal of Honor: Frontline," involving military combat, while the other group played a nonviolent game called "Need for Speed: Underground."

Those who played the violent video game showed more activation in the amygdala, which is involved in emotional arousal, and less activation in the prefrontal portions of the brain associated with control, focus and concentration than the teens who played the nonviolent game.

After playing the games, the children completed tasks requiring concentration and processing of emotional stimuli while their brain activity was scanned. Alterations in brain function reflecting changes in blood flow appeared as brightly colored areas on the magnetic resonance images.

"What we showed is there is an increase in emotional arousal. The fight or flight response is activated after playing a violent video game," Mathews said.

Numerous behavioral and cognitive studies have linked exposure to violent media and aggressive behavior. Now, researchers are using advanced imaging technology to scan the brain for clues to whether violent video games cause increases in aggression.

A study shows that children who play violent games such as "Medal of Honor" have less brain activation with control, focus and concentration.

Travesty to literary world

Gregory Kleciak

The First Amendment used to mean something to the American people. It meant a tremendous amount to our forefathers, who fought to end oppression. It meant the right to say what we feel no matter how much the current tyrannical governing system may disagree with it.

Everyday atop the Ed/Op page of the Daily Collegian it reads "I may not agree with what you say but I will defend to the death your right to say it." Very wise words from Voltaire, but at what point in the history of this country did free-speech take a back seat?

Now I could only be bothered to dig up archaic beliefs like free-speech after a great travesty has occurred in our literary world. O.J. Simpson's book "If I Did It. Here's How It Would Have Happened" (or "If I Did It" for short) has been cancelled, and it comes as little surprise to this civic minded individual.

All he needs is the chance to walk a mile in the killer's shoes, and the pieces of the puzzle should fit together like a glove.

But the question remains as to why the book was cancelled. It can't be because people think Simpson did it, he was found not guilty in a court of law. And it can't be because of a lack of interest, who wouldn't be interested in knowing how Simpson might have hypothetically done the deed if he were as clever as the actual guilty party (or parties)?

The answer is simple: the agenda of the Liberal media. The Liberal media's pressure on Fox and ReganBook's parent company News Corporation, who owns the rights to Simpson's book and interview, has been tremendous.

The Left-wing anarchists have been after Simpson for years after his trial, trying to unconstitutionally pin guilt on him even though he's already been to trial, and this is their way of finally getting back at him. By stomping out the one thing Simson valued more than his Heisman trophy: his creative outlets.

Writing this book is a good way for Simpson to vent his feelings towards a nation that still to this day shuns him and believes him guilty of a crime that he has already been tried for. In addition to venting, writing this book could be a tremendous step for Simpson in his vow to catch the real killer.

By going through each step of the murder plot in gruesome and excruciating detail he might be able to get into the same frame of mind as the killer. Once he understands the killer well enough that they are basically the same person finding out who he is and what his motivation was should be the simplest thing in the world. All he needs is the chance to walk a mile in the killer's shoes, and the pieces of the puzzle should fit together like a glove.

If there's any reason Simpson's book should be canned it's simply because he committed the author's sin of being unwilling to commit completely. When he titles the book "If I Did It" the story he's telling becomes weakened. The "if" in the title makes sure that in the back of our minds we always remember he was acquitted.

If he really wanted to capture the audience, he would have titled the book "I Did it." Then he'd have achieved one of the most difficult aspirations for authors young and old. He would have made his audience believe in the fictional world he created where he did commit a very heinous crime.

Sadly, this book may never see the light of day. When you boil the issue down to its core it comes to this simple fact: all Liberals are the same. They preach free-speech and no censorship until something comes along to offend their delicate palettes. Then all of a sudden it's call the thought Gestapo. If Left-wing radicals want to teach evolution, then it's only fair that they have to ingest some of our fiction too.

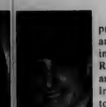
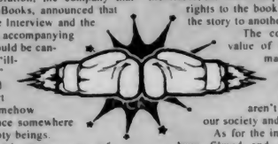
Correct to cancel



Adam McGillen

I can't say I was totally surprised when News Corporation announced it would be showing an interview between Judith Regan, president of ReganBooks, and the infamous O.J. Simpson, in which Simpson is supposed to describe how he would have killed Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman, had he done it. Can we expect much less from the network that brought us "When Animals Attack" and other various shows of distaste that lack humane characterIstics?

In actuality, I was more stunned to find out that the News Corporation, the company that owns Fox and ReganBooks, announced that both the airing of the Interview and the selling of Simpson's accompanying book, "If I Did It" would be cancelled, calling it an "ill-considered project." Suddenly Fox, and specifically Rupert Murdoch, had somehow developed a conscience somewhere deep within their empty beings.



Murdoch has made a career of putting garbage on the Fox network. He strives to find projects that appeal only to the basest human instincts, productions meant only to tickle the brain stem and leave the rest of the viewers' intellects to slowly turn to mush.

Undoubtedly, he must have felt like he hit the jackpot when he landed Simpson's book and an interview that could only amount to a chilling confession of exactly what happened on the day that Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman were brutally murdered.

I can only imagine the tremendous challenge Simpson had trying to write this book. Not because he had to delve into his brain and come up with how he hypothetically would have killed his ex-wife and her friend, but rather to choose his words extremely carefully so as not to reveal a certain self-incriminating detail that only the killer would know.

Simpson couldn't have said it better, claiming that he wrote the book and did the interview for "blood money" because he is feeling the pressure of debt and needs to support his children, as was reported in USA Today on Nov. 24. He even argued that his work was no worse than anyone else's who had ever published on the topic of his trial and the deaths of Nicole Brown Simpson and Ronald Goldman.

Will he stop at nothing? It's bad enough that Simpson was able to use his celebrity value to escape criminal conviction and literally get away with murder. But for him to bring everything back into the limelight and literally thrust the murders back into the face of the Brown and Goldman families is disgusting, and leave it to Murdoch to beam his spotlight upon Simpson.

Sure, the News Corporation has pulled the interview and ReganBooks has recalled the books that were already sent to stores, claiming that all copies will be destroyed. Regardless, if ReganBooks even manages to destroy all the books without a single copy leaking, which seems inevitable, the News Corporation still retains the rights to the book, and could easily sell the story to another publisher.

The controversy and shock value of the book alone could make it a best seller, which makes it appealing to publishers lacking morals, which aren't very hard to find in our society and economy.

As for the interview, it has already been filmed and even Fox and News Corporation executives admitted to the New York Times that it will probably turn up somewhere, more than likely on the Internet.

It seems unlikely that News Corporation will truly be able to rescind everything it has started. ReganBooks apparently signed the contract for the book with a third-party, which means that Simpson has probably already received money for the project, all of which is probably now legally untouchable, meaning It can't be taken away and given to the Brown and Goldman families.

Suddenly Fox, and specifically Rupert Murdoch, had somehow developed a conscience somewhere deep within their empty beings.

Simpson has made a living out of avoiding any sort of payment towards the $33.5 million he legally owes the Brown and Goldman families, and here he seems to have achieved another victory.

Perhaps there is some hope though, and maybe Murdoch can reach into the empty cavity of his chest, find what little bit of a heart he might have and do the right thing: give the rights to the interview and the book to the families of Nicole and Ron. If anyone deserves to control what happens to this despicable project, it should be the families of the victims who shed so much blood at the hands of O.J. Simpson.

Ignoring global warming

Kevin Dooley

It was reported a couple weeks ago in The Guardian (a British newspaper) that NASA is seriously considering sending a human into space in the future to the nearest asteroid to see if humans would have the technological capability to deflect a potential asteroid heading towards Earth.

But as we prepare to see if we could save the world from destruction, it's slowly becoming apparent we're the ones who will be responsible for the earth's demise.

Last week I was flipping through the channels, right about the time between when "Late Night with Conan O'Brien" goes off the air and "Girls Gone Wild" infomercials have yet to grace the airwaves, I caught something on the History Channel that was downright scary if it is to ever become reality, and there is strong evidence it will play out.

Yes, I'm about to go global warming on everyone. Those are two words we love to sweep under the rug every time someone mentions the potential halt it will put on the advancement of human civilization and the comfortable life we've grown accustomed to.

The show was "Mega Disasters: Mega Freeze," and it described the disastrous effects global warming will have in triggering extreme changes in ocean currents. As a result of the dramatic changes in the ocean's temperature an ice age could potentially strike the Northern Hemisphere, in addition to more disastrous storms and droughts.

But my intention is not to declare we have a problem. I'm here to tell you why I think we're not going to do anything about it.

But my intention is not to declare we have a problem. I'm here to tell you why I think we're not going to do anything about it.

Human beings simply don't like to be told they're wrong. We're under the assumption it is our destiny to move ahead in our modernity fueled by the culprit of this whole mess, oil.

Homo sapiens are the new kids on the block. Yet ironically, because of the toxins and unnatural levels of carbon dioxide we have sent up into the atmosphere since the Industrial Revolution, we're about to screw it up for all of the other living creatures. Some of those creatures have been here for 3.5 billion years and somehow managed to live harmoniously with nature.

"Hey, who cares about the other living things on Earth?" says the imaginary person reading this column. "They live without security, without comfort and without opportunity. They are slaves to Mother Nature and all of its destruction. We inherited the Earth from God, and it is our playground. After I'mone exploiting the Earth's resources I'm going to a gated community up in the sky where they hopefully show re-runs of "Dancing with the Stars" and "American Idol." And don't you dare paint me as an animal-basher, I own a dog."

This way of thinking is where the problem lies. The problem isn't that people watch reality television, but the development of religion, specifically monotheism, is the beginning of the human superiority complex. Daniel Quinn's book "Ishmael" offers a possible explanation of how things came to be the way they are today.

According to Quinn, the advent of agriculture in the Fertile Crescent region, specifically by the Neolithic people, led those people to believe they controlled nature and were therefore equal with the gods themselves. In essence, the world belongs to man, not the other way around.

Once those humans became controllers of their own food supplies and not reliant on nature, human civilization, and later monotheism began to expand as the need to cultivate more and more land became necessary. It was our dream of one day finally mastering the Earth to our desires. Essentially we began to take more than we needed.

But as a result of the agricultural revolution and then monotheistic religions, humans over a period of thousands of years were lulled into a hypnotic trance that we can do whatever we want with the Earth. That's why nothing will be fixed, we have big egos.

And I can't go on without mentioning the people with some of the biggest egos the earth has ever seen: Our current administration has done little to nothing in cooperating with other nations in trying to thwart a disaster which would bring human civilization to its knees.

The most notable ignorance displayed by this administration was withdrawing from the Kyoto Protocol in 2001, claiming it would put too much of a burden on the economy to reduce the level of greenhouse gases emitted. The Bush administration would like us all to think that global warming would mean an extra couple months to wear shorts and flip-flops.

One of the fathers of psychology Carl Jung once said that "people cannot stand too much reality." But reality must replace denial because denial has reigned supreme for far too long. As long as denial about what we are doing to the only planet we have reigns supreme, our disillusioned reign as kings and queens of the world is coming to a screeching halt.

But you never know, maybe that asteroid will prove to be habitable. I hope you can pick up "Girls Gone Wild" there, too.

Think about different perspectives

Andrew Freeman

Simple question – don't take more than a few seconds to answer it. How Liberal is UMass?

If I conducted an exit poll on our little referendum, I'd expect answers ranging from "very" to "love-child of Nancy Pelosi and Michael Moore." UMass has an image, a reputation and half a million "Bush lied, People died" bumper stickers, that supports the claim that it is a very Liberal school.

It's all well and good to call UMass Liberal, but what does that actually mean? The word "Liberal" has many definitions, and even political meaning has changed over time.

A 19th century Liberal believed government should keep its hands off the economy entirely, and that voting should be restricted to those who knew best, namely the wealthy. In short, on today's political spectrum they would be far more Conservative than any Republican.

The modern conception of Liberalism is completely different. Self-proclaimed Liberals usually accept the current economic system, but believe it needs to be regulated by the government, both to prevent excesses and to ensure individuals have a fair chance at success. Most Liberals value individual freedom, and their social views reflect a desire to protect it against governmental interference. Many support abortion and gay rights for this reason.

So are UMass students Liberal? Some of them might say so, certainly. But many on the political Left would shun the label, preferring terms like Progressive. Some would go further and declare themselves Socialists or Communists. In the end, these are just labels, and they have limited descriptive value for people's beliefs. Many students are detached from politics, and care more about their next drink than the last election.

Are our professors Liberal? Some undoubtedly are. My experience has been that the majority of professors do not mention their political beliefs in class, focusing on more relevant information, like the course material. Never have I seen an instructor force his views on a student.

The people most concerned about Liberalism at institutions like UMass tend to be Conservatives. Some complain about intolerance towards their beliefs. A recent visitor to this campus, University of North Carolina criminology professor Mike Adams, provides a good example.

Adams writes a column for the Conservative Web site townhall.com, and was invited here by the UMass Republican Club to lecture. His topic: "How to Win Friends and Irritate Feminists." Adams also opposes homosexuality. In an August 24 column, for example, he claimed gays were "a class of people who are afflicted with an emotional or mental illness," and accordingly they should not be allowed to adopt or teach children. His justification for this diagnosis: some gays had sent him hate mail, in response to other statements of his they found offensive.

Unfortunately, political discourse in this country is rarely about being articulate, nuanced or thoughtful. It largely consists of mocking, overpowering and otherwise silencing the opposition.

Predictably, given such positions, the lecture was a fiasco. Students began protesting even before he arrived. His lecture was frequently interrupted, and during the question and answer session, a student refused to give back the microphone, prompting a Republican Club member to seize it from him.

I have mixed feelings about the lecture. Adams should have been allowed to speak without interruption. Opposing someone's ideas is not an excuse to drown them out, or silence them altogether.

However, the whole event reeks of cynicism. Like the pro-Wal-Mart rally last semester, the purpose of this gathering seems to have been arousing controversy and Leftist anger, rather than expressing Conservative principles. Adams' writing is designed to be divisive – he has no apparent interest in "How to win friends," let alone trying to understand the people he attacks. Selecting him as a speaker appears less about encouraging honest, fair intellectual debate, and more about inciting a riot.

This incident reveals a salient way in which our campus is not Liberal. One of the definitions of "Liberal" is "broad-minded," a characteristic absent from the Adams lecture. Neither the speaker nor the protesters seemed willing to listen to dissenting views or seriously discuss their differences.

Unfortunately, political discourse in this country is rarely about being articulate, nuanced or thoughtful. It largely consists of mocking, overpowering and otherwise silencing the opposition. Politics becomes holy war, a righteous campaign to win converts and destroy the enemy.

The breakdown of civilized debate is detrimental to everyone. Societies where groups refuse to acknowledge and respect one another often devolve into violence and civil war; look no further than Iraq.

No faction, party or individual has a monopoly on the truth, and those who claim it are deluding themselves. Society's problems are complex, and we need to be flexible, not shackled by ideology, to deal with them.

Having eyes does not mean you can see

Greg Collins

Factions across the political spectrum are conspicuously guilty of refusing to consider alternative points of view. Nowhere is this more apparent than here at UMass, where a disturbing trend has exposed the hypocritical nature of self-proclaimed Liberal students and administration officials. Its one resonant characteristic is the failure to seriously consider different political viewpoints.

On Nov. 1 an Israeli journalist spoke about this summer's Israeli-Lebanese war to mostly attentive listeners in the Campus Center. However, he was repeatedly and rudely interrupted by certain crowd members who continued their discourteousness during the question and answer session.

During the week of Nov. 6-10, the UMass Republican Club collected donations for disabled veterans in front of the Student Union, in honor of Veterans' Day. Protesters harassed the group's members, made misogynistic comments towards the group's female participants and asked how they could sleep at night asking for such donations.

The fact that many people are unwilling to consider alternative viewpoints reflects more poorly on their intellectual shortcomings than their target's inadequacies and fosters blind opposition to truth-seeking.

The cauldron of political contentiousness on campus boiled over on Nov. 15. UNC Wilmington professor Mike Adams gave a speech in the Campus Center about how he felt politically Conservative thought is stifled on college campuses and why the feminist movement has been counterproductive to empowering women.

The day before his speech a flyer describing the event, which had been placed on the bulletin board near the Franklin Dining Commons, was burned. On the day of the lecture, before the professor had set foot in the room, a large group of students dressed in women's attire danced in front of the incoming crowd.

Much like the experience of the Israeli journalist, Dr. Adams was repeatedly harassed and insulted throughout his speech. Unfortunately, the question and answer session ended early. The professor exited abruptly after a tussle ensued following a student's refusal to ask a question. It is ironic that this student took up time that could have been used to question Dr. Adams on his views.

The methods of the Adams protestors are inconsistent with the respectful protests of the majority of Liberal activists on campus and nation-wide. However, even campus non-radical Liberals are hostile to viewpoints which challenge their previously held dogmas.

For example, the possibility is raised that the current safe sex ed programs on campus and nation-wide in schools are ill-conceived and ineffective. This is met with knee-jerk reactions from radicals, most Liberals, and even some Conservatives at UMass-Amherst, not to mention University Health Services, who otherwise do a commendable job disseminating health information.

These people do not even consider the fact that even though there were no safe sex ed programs similar to modern day programs before the 1960s, out of wedlock births and STDS were lower than what they are nowadays.

Furthermore, it is safe to say that most students and faculty on this campus do not realize that many people in America think in a completely different way than northeastern Liberals about God, morality, and the purpose of human existence. Even those who call themselves politically "moderate" or "independent" on campus scoff at and do not seriously consider many of these viewpoints, such as the notion that a higher power designed the universe.

The enduring nexus connecting the disrupters and resisters of the lectures, donation-collecting and safe sex debate is the failure to reexamine their preconceived notions about political, economic and religious issues fomented by politicians and mainstream media outlets.

The fact that many people are unwilling to consider alternative viewpoints reflects more poorly on their intellectual shortcomings than their targets' inadequacies and fosters blind opposition to truth-seeking. All individuals are capable of pursuing and finding the truth using their God-given gifts like a brain.

Yet, some are unwilling to do this because either the truth cannot be found, or they do not want to see the truth. For instance, evaluation of the effectiveness of contemporary safe sex ed programs should encompass researching whether STDs were lower before the implementation of such current programs. How many safe sex advocates on campus can honestly say they have done that?

There are additional implications to turning a blind eye to the pursuit for truth when campus Liberals are more concerned with being politically correct rather than with confronting and combating substantive issues. In refusing to expand their tolerance towards alternative viewpoints, Liberals can afford to say whatever they want without facing the consequences of the causes they support.

It's easy for a self-proclaimed Liberal to take a morally neutral stance on the Middle East conflict between Israelis and moderate Arabs on the one hand, and terrorist or terrorist-controlled regimes on the other hand, when he or she does not live in a neighborhood targeted by Hezbollah. Unfortunately, those who are directly affected by this neglect of moral truth are the ones who suffer, like Israeli and Arab children.

While modern day Liberalism emphasizes political diversity and tolerance, ironically those who profess to support Liberal causes often hold myopic visions of how the world works. All of us at times are guilty of ignoring alternative viewpoints.

Nonetheless, on this campus, it is primarily radicals, Liberals and self-described moderates and independents who do this on a consistent basis. These people should be condemned for acting contrarily to the ideals they proclaim so boldly.

Remove ID from classrooms

Wesley Miller

The phenomenon known as Intelligent Design that has been slowly working its way into classrooms over the past few years is no longer a strictly American phenomenon. According to The Guardian, some 59 schools in Great Britain have taken to teaching Intelligent Design as an alternative to Darwinism.

The decision to incorporate these materials into science education has been met with opposition by numerous civil rights groups, but maintains a solid base through the support of parents and students. Despite the complete lack of empirical basis and thinly veiled socioeconomic agenda, Intelligent Design seems to hold some legitimacy as a scientific theory among populations in secular countries.

Legally, Intelligent Design has been acknowledged as DOA in the courtroom. Though it does not claim the existence of God, it does claim that the complexity of the physical universe points to some kind of creator.

Any scientific theory that gives credence to a metaphysical being is, in my opinion, inherently unscientific and violates the constitutional separation of church and state. The Judicial Branch seems to think the same way. Recent court decisions in Ohio and Pennsylvania have removed the teaching of Intelligent Design from their classrooms.

The issue is not, however, as black and white as it might seem. Proponents of ID have found recourse in criticizing the hegemony of modern science over other discourses. Closing the discussion around creation and evolution could be considered a contrary impulse to the whole idea of science, which is as much based in theory as it is empiricism. Psychoanalysis is a good example of a legitimate medical practice that was once considered a mere pseudoscience. So why not ID?

Intelligent Design also appears to have legitimate political and financial backing. George Bush announced publicly that he supported the teaching of ID in schools.

"I think that part of education is to expose people to different schools of thought," Bush said.

Truth in Science, the Texas based organization responsible for distributing material to schools in the UK, is among numerous groups and think tanks dedicated to seeing ID in schools. Indeed in the case presented before a court in Dover Pennsylvania over the teaching of ID in public schools, the defense was assisted by the Thomas More Legal Center, a Christian Organization backed by billionaire Thomas Monaghan, owner of Domino's Pizza.

It is no revolutionary insight into the current state of American politics to say that religious influence is reaching uncomfortable levels in our government. Polls by the Pew Research Center last week showed 64 percent of Americans favor teaching some form of creationism in publicly funded schools.

The American people by and large are not afraid of religion in the classroom. In times like these, we need to be able to trust our lawmakers and court systems to act rationally and protect the secular presence in our nation whether it be atheists, scientists or what have you.

Many have argued that Intelligent Design could dissipate the religious war in America to a mere classroom discussion, and if properly executed, this could be accomplished. After all, the role of religion in American life is not going to dissipate anytime soon. Of course, ID would need to make its appearance alongside Darwinism and be accompanied by a legitimate discussion of the two. Better yet, ID could make an appearance outside the science classroom. After all, there's no science involved.

As I think about the basic idea of separation of church and state, I realize how absurd equitable treatment of science and religion in public schools really is. If proponents of ID were really interested in introducing the idea of relativity to evolution instead of trying to remove a basic contradiction from religious life, we'd find a way to examine this subject historically, not the other way around.

Without indulging in Liberal paranoia, I can say that the introduction of a theistic perspective in the classroom violates the foundations of our nation's educational system. We must not allow religion to drive a wedge between our basic notions of myth and fact. Such would be contradictory to the notion of progress.

Coke bottle shape making a comeback

Teresa Franco

The appearance of Callie on "Grey's Anatomy" (played by Sara Ramirez) the sultry, curvy orthopedic surgeon brings a gust of fresh wind into the stuffy world of impossibly thin characters prancing around Hollywood. The mold women in the public eye were expected to fit in appears to be steadily melting away – or so we think.

One night while skimming through comments on Ms. Ramirez's character, any hope I had the media was breaking away from the stigma of the stick figure was diminished. Comments from young adult women consisted of "I hate Callie, she's such a sasquatch." (A sasquatch is defined in the dictionary as a 'large manlike animal')

I've assumed for years women have been outraged that the ideal waist line for women kept continuously shrinking. I thought that it was the public eye that was obsessed with the body fat of every celebrity. It was the makers of magazines deciding to feature solely slender models, completely disregarding any woman above a size six or with the slightest shape of hips. It was movie and television shows who established the token "nice fat girl" character.

I was convinced it was anyone but the audience who were convinced these standards for women were ideal, so I was shocked to see the viewers themselves demeaning a character meant to relieve the assumption that skinny is the only pretty.

Actress Elizabeth Hurley is no help to ending this warped version of what beauty is defined as by young women. Hurley shortly after being named "babe of the century" in a poll a few years ago shot down Marilyn Monroe's size with the infamous quote she told Allure magazine "I always thought Marilyn Monroe looked fabulous, but I'd kill myself if I was that fat."

Hmm, funny Hurley should say this because Monroe's dress size doesn't seem to be an issue to the majority of my friends who have pictures of Monroe gracing every square inch of the walls in their bedrooms. Is Hurley suggesting she would opt to become an emaciated skeleton than become the luscious glamour icon Monroe was if it meant she had to, God forbid, be a few dress sizes bigger?

It's disheartening when girls have pined and pleaded for more real life-sized women for years, and then when their wishes are finally granted there are still girls who shoose to make a sour face at the whole concept.

These cruel comments made to these beautiful women are baffling since they are coming from the mouths of girls who are suppose to feel better about themselves by seeing characters of normal sizes. Growing up, I'd let out a satisfying sigh of relief whenever I came across an actress or model whose bones weren't poking out from every angle of her body.

I've had so many conversations with my friends over the years, of how upsetting it is to see characters on our favorite TV shows wasting away because of strict diets. So, why are these girls dishing out the negativity, girls like myself grew up hating?

When did the belief that slim equals beauty originate anyway? Paintings during the renaissance period displayed full-figured ladies as the main models, and they were considered works of art. I vert during Monroe's era thicker was better. Her dress size has been estimated to be about what a size 12 is today, and she is a now a legend for beauty and glamour. So what's all the fuss over actresses and models of the same size today?

I fear this battle on body types will never be completely defeated. Actresses and models who don't exactly fit the mold Hollywood promotes will be cast in "fat girl" roles, and models of larger sizes will continue to be scuffed and scorned by some.

It's disheartening when girls have pined and pleaded for more real life-sized women for years, and then when their wishes are finally granted there are still girls who choose to make a sour face at the whole concept. It's sad that the aspiration to be stick thin has been embedded in the minds of young girls so well that the thought of women whose body types stray away from the norm are viewed as total disgraces.

The character Callie on "Grey's Anatomy" is a breakthrough in the entertainment world in the sense the show makes no mention of her weight at all. She's a tough orthopedic doctor and a heart breaker as well. When she first stepped onto the show, it didn't even occur to me she was a different size than the other female characters on the show.

Television show producers are starting to throw out the typical measurements created for women, and not seeing weight as a factor for beauty. Now if only the girls in the audience can start to see it in the same light.

Gov't Mule to rock Palladium

By Michael Hardman
Collegian Staff

American roots heroes, Gov't Mule is gearing up for The Palladium in Worcester tonight. 'Mule' recently released their latest album, "High & Mighty," in September and has been touring relentlessly this year.

The band features Warren Haynes on guitar and vocals, Danny Louis on keyboards, Andy Hess on bass, and Matt Abts playing drums. Haynes, one of the most powerful guitarists actively playing, leads this band into another chapter of the band's career. Their creative boundaries were blown away with the heavy "High and Mighty" album.

The album features their normal explosive riffs, complex grooves, and tall-tale characters woven into the songs, yet they went a step beyond by fusing classic rock and jam music, straying from their blues roots. Many other bands have done this also, but 'Mule' is refusing to be categorized through the blues, folk, reggae, soul, and jazz influences that are well represented throughout the album.

Many of the songs feature an urgent, larger-than-life sound that is reminiscent of the band's legendary live shows. "High & Mighty" is the second album that this current lineup has created. The original lineup, together since the band's inception in 1995, was shaken in 2001 when their original bassist, Allen Woody, passed away. After experimenting with many different bassists, Andy Hess, formerly of the Black Crowes, was recruited to join the band in 2003.

"Our goal was to capture the chemistry, and the spirit of the band, which has progressed into something beyond what it was for the last record," says Haynes. "We took the interplay that happens on stage and utilized it to create something magical in the studio."

The hard rocking band members still have trouble creating a straight forward rock tune. There is a strong improvisational attitude sneaking into every song they create.

"Nobody is just playing a part. It is all about listening and call and response," Haynes explains. "We are all steeped in jazz and blues, so improvisation is in our life's blood."

The opening track, "Mr High & Mighty", begins in the manner that a funny car launches from the starting line, in a heavy, thunderous riff. From there is a mix of every genre that never lets up.

Many of the songs have social commentary laced into them, such as "Like Flies." The sorry state of the music industry is explained in this tune. "Many of today's artists have forgotten the values of quality music and fame is their main target," says Warren Haynes.

Gov't Mule's gig later today should prove to be another great one, as they have been playing at the top of their game since summer. Recently, they have been playing most of the "High & Mighty" songs, but their signature live standbys are still being thrown into the mix.

Donovan Frankenreiter and his relaxing acoustic jams are opening at 8 p.m. 'Mule' will go on at 9:15 p.m. and play until they are forced to leave.

"[The audience] not only allow us to experiment on stage, they encourage it, to the extent that we can feel that encouragement coming from the crowd," says Haynes. "They didn't come to hear the records, they didn't come to hear the same show we played last night, they came to be part of a moment in time, and that's what we are there for. It's an experience that we all share together."

The Palladium's doors open at 7 p.m. Tickets are $26 in advance and $28 at the door. Come and experience some mind blowing grooves and jams.

Gov't Mule will perform at the Worcester Palladium tonight at 7 p.m.

Dinosaur Jr. plays NoHo

By Dave Master
Collegian Staff

This Thursday at Pearl Street, Amherst's own Dinosaur Jr. will stomp on stage and roar extended guitar solos at the crowd, turning Pearl Street into prehistoric preying grounds.

Lou Barlow is teaming up with J Mascis and "Murph" again, a surprise reunion that brings back the original 'Dinosaur' lineup. After some time off as a result of creative differences, Barlow has rejoined the band, which only adds to the excitement and anticipation of this Thursday's performance.

Mascis is known to guest appear with indie sensation Broken Social Scene during local shows, which only teases the crowd and leaves them wanting the Dinosaur Jr. signature sound. Mascis single-handedly redefined indie music, which demands the respect of projects like fellow musicians, Broken Social Scene. He brought back the extended guitar solo, which was first mastered by Neil Young with songs like "Danger Bird" and "Cortez the Killer" (Zuma 1975).

Mascis and Barlow started a prehistoric hardcore band called Deep Wound in '82. Deep Wound played machinegun-fast music, and aimed to play faster. They released a self-titled 7-inch and contributed two songs on the compilation LP, "Bands That Could Be God." They quickly disbanded in '84 and started Dinosaur Jr. in '85.

Dinosaur Jr. was retrograde against their hardcore influences – Black Flag, Minor Threat – in the early 80's. They demanded slower songs, more guitar solos, and reverted back to a singer songwriter mentality involving underground rock music. Their distinct musical sound defined indie music, which put Dinosaur Jr. at the forefront of the early underground scene.

Cowpunk – a musical phenomenon of the 1980's – classifies the early Dinosaur Jr. sound. This genre utilizes alternative country music orchestrated with electric guitars and lazily-sung lyrics. This can be heard on Bug released in '88, and most accessibly on their self-titled debut, Dinosaur, released in '85. On Dinosaur, Mascis maintained a whiny low-key drawl lyrical style, creating almost a southern twang. He was compared mostly to Neil Young at the time, even though Mick Jagger from the Rolling Stones was a bigger influence. Along with Dinosaur Jr.'s cowpunk sound was The Meat Puppets, who also defined the music of their time and was one of Mascis' major influences.

In 1986, Dinosaur Jr. ventured out on their first tour – a two week period of college shows as the opening act for Sonic Flood. "There was nothing like them," says Lee Ranaldo of Sonic Flood. "They had nothing to lose and everything to gain and they were going for it every night." On the last show of the tour, Dinosaur Jr. played Neil Young's "Cortez the Killer" with Ranaldo on vocals, followed by an epic jam.

Mascis' early songwriting for Dinosaur Jr. had depth. It incorporated raw emotion with raw guitar solos. Mascis invited personal experience into his songs with lyrics like "Now it's a drag/With no hope of coming back/How can you ever get it together?" (from "Yeah We Know," track four of "Bug.") The song is aggressive, but not fast. The aggressiveness is achieved by the tension made between the heavy drumming and lazy singing by Mascis.

"Freak Scene", the opening track of "Bug" explodes with a simple chord progression involving simple rhythms that are reiterated by the drums. Mascis chooses to employ a rhythm acoustic-guitar on the chorus, quickly followed by a Mascis-signature extended guitar solo. The track is filled with opposing themes within the lyrics and musical orchestration.

In 2005, out-of-print albums – "Dinosaur, You're Living All Over Me," and "Hug" – were re-released on Merge. These first three albums released by Dinosaur Jr. helped define indie/underground music. Their influence can still be heard today.

Dinosaur Jr. will own the stage this Thursday night. Keep on the lookout for crowd-lurking raptors. And remember, a T-Rex can't see you if you stand still. Mascis might show Pearl Street mercy on Thursday, but don't hope for it.

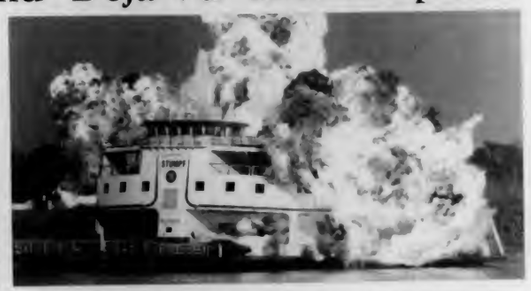
Lou Barlow, J Mascis and Murph are once again reunited as Dinosaur Jr. The band will headline Thursday night at the Pearl Street Clubroom. Tickets are $30.

Denzel and 'Déjà Vu' miss the point

By Kate Bauer
Collegian Staff

Sadly, the phenomenon that is 'déjà vu' is left unexplained in this whirlwind of a techno-filled, time traveling, action-sci fi-thriller popcorn flick.

Our film opens up to a cheerful scene of sailors and their families boarding a ferry in New Orleans en route to a Mardi Gras party. Everyone is laughing, smiling, children playing (see if you can spot Dakota Fanning's little sis Elle); everything's perfect. But the scene has an unsettling sense to it, as if you know something bad is about to happen, and it certainly does. One of the cars on the ferry, filled with explosives, is detonated, creating a tidal wave of flames that rocket up into the sky, sending people and cars into the river and turning the ship into a heap of molten plastic. The chaos that ensues is eerily reminiscent of 9/11, as people frantically shout, mothers ask about missing daughters, and debris washes up on the shore. EMS trucks and police cars are cramped on a ferry dock as rescue boats start to clean up the debris and start hauling bodies out of the water and Doug Carlin (Denzel Washington) enters—the epitome of a senior detective with his calm and collected nature. Gathering evidence on the shoreline near the explosion, he finds what appears to be a shell casing from a bomb, and the explosion is ruled as a terrorist act, and the hunt begins to find the one, or ones, responsible.



DÉJÀ VU

DIRECTED BY: TONY SCOTT

STARRING: DENZEL WASHINGTON

PG-13

GRADE: B-

Again, we've fallen victim to the Hollywood tangle of film verses film trailer. Déjà Vu's trailer, first released back in September, presents an interesting idea for a plot in its tagline: "If you thought it was just a trick of the mind, go back, and look again." Defined as a feeling that one has seen or heard something before, the term "déjà vu," and the movie's title, are entirely ambiguous to what's actually happening in the film. Instead of looking further into the phenomenon that is deja vu, the movie reaches too far to the left in order to try and create an exciting sci fi thriller for the masses. Bottom line – we've got a movie trailer more enticing than the movie itself.

A mix of documentary and theatrical style, filled with tight close-ups and sweeping camera angles, so familiar to a Tony Scott (and Jerry Bruckheimer) production, the movie moves along at a fairly even enough pace to keep you interested in what's going on. There's just the fact that you spend half the film asking yourself "What? Huh? What does that mean?", and you spend the other half looking for clues of déjà vu that amount to nothing by the end of the film. Even the terrorist's vague declaration of "You think you know what's coming? You don't have a clue" leads to nothing more than the ramblings of a psychotic instead of a possibly interesting twist to the plot.

Despite a film boasting a good supporting cast with stars like Val Kilmer (Agent Pryzwarra), Jim Caviezel (Carroll Oerstadt), Bruce Greenwood (Jack McCready), and Adam Goldberg (stealing the show as tech wiz Denny), the center of the film is the formidable Washington, who still delivers, albeit with a little less panache. I was actually interested in seeing more of Jim Caviezel's character, and though his time is short in the film, he uses it well to creep the audience out, a character a 180 degrees away from his portrayal of 2004's "Passion of the Christ."

There is too much tech-jargon in the film to follow, and a lot of the elements in the story come off as somewhat preposterous, but the film is never dull. Denzel has been around for so long that he commands a certain amount of attention, and the movie relies heavily on him to bring the audience in. Paula Patton (Claire Kuchever) doesn't play as large a role as the trailer implies, unless you count her role primarily consisting of the techies following her around her apartment as she walks around in her underwear or takes a shower.

The twinkling, teasing music helps to keep the audience's attention (even if it does sound like a rip-off of "Paycheck's" score), and there is a sort of mocking element to playing the Beach Boys' "Don't Worry Baby" right before an explosion.

Ultimately, I was hoping for a bit more of a splash ending, but looking back on Tony Scott's past films like "Domino" or "G.I. Jane", that isn't quite his style. There was one creative car chase element in the film where timetravel is actually involved, and the quick pacing of the flashback images the techies navigate makes for some interesting cinematography.

While this is Denzel's, Tony's and Bruckheimer's third collaboration together ("Crimson Tide" and "Man on Fire,") let's just say that here the third time's not the charm, and you'll be leaving the theater scratching your head.

Denzel Washington stars in Tony Scott's new movie, "Deja Vu," their third cinematic collaboration together.

Fashion and icons

By Kelly McGuire
Collegian Correspondent

If you look up the definition of fashion in a dictionary, you'd find this explanation as the first listing: "A prevailing custom or style of dress, etiquette, socializing..." Yes, we understand that fashion literally means wearing whatever hip style of clothing is gracing the covers of Vogue, Elle and Glamour, but in reality, it's so much more. Fashion is a way of life, the way you present yourself and the way you view yourself and the world. It's a visual art, every individual is their own canvas that they get to decorate in anyway that inspires them.

If you're an avid fashion lover like me, then you know who the biggest fashion icons are, past and present. If you're not, but still love fashion too, let's put you up to speed with the rest of the fashion obsessed world. Have any of you ever watched America's Next Top Model? If you ever have, many of times Tyra Banks will have celebrity and special guests on the judging panel for the starving, stick thin, models dying to get their face on the cover of Elle. Many times, one of the special guest judges is a woman named Twiggy. We're going to start with her, as one of the biggest symbols of the fashion world.

Twiggy was born in northern London in 1949. In the 1960's, Twiggy became known as what people still know her as, the world's first supermodel. Her big bright eyes and stick skinny body mixed with the short boy-bob hair cut, instantly erupted on the fashion scene. In the year 1967, Twiggy – at the young age of eighteen – graced the covers of Vogue and Harpers Bazaar – probably the two most widely renowned fashion magazines of all time.

Twiggy wore all of the recent trends of the 1960's fashion generation: the mini skirts, tweed suits, and the "Mod Look". The Mod Look was derived from Mary Quant, a Victorian woman who took the mini skirt look, invented by Andre Courreges, and made it even more daring as it entered English and American mainstream fashion scenes. Twiggy wore these mini skirts, which were in London around 7-8 inches above the knee versus 4-5 inches in America. Accompanying these oh-too-short mini skirts, were colored tights. This was one of Twiggy's signature looks and she is still known for it today.

I'm giving you this history lesson, ladies, in an attempt to make a valid point about fashion: it's ever evolving and ever changing yes, but we always come back to our roots. For example, one of the most important must-have pieces of clothing today is the ever diverse mini skirt. Perfect for all occasions, Twiggy wore it in the '60s and we're wearing them today. The colored tights? They are back too! Pair them with a mini skirt and some boots and you'll have the classic, but still trendy look that Twiggy had then and that girls are craving now.

Another small Twiggy tidbit: if you've never seen a picture of Twiggy, search the internet for one. Notice her extremely long, chunky eye lashes. Great, right? Try them yourself, you'd be surprised how much shape and definition they give to your eyes. That's it for this week, ladies.

Rock your style or rock Twiggy's if you prefer.

Twiggy, the world's first supermodel, still inspires many to this day, and even finds time to guest star "America's Next Top Model."

This week in Durfee: Bonsais

Durfee Conservatory is open for your enjoyment Monday through Friday, 8:30 am to 4:30 pm. It is located across the street from UMass Health Services.

This week's stop is Durfee's House 1, the Bonsai Room. A source of great pride for Durfee, House 1 lies at the beginning of the greenhouse, facing the Morril science buildings and the central part of campus and is home to some of Durfee's oldest wonders.

Of course, there are bonsai trees, which are intricately shaped and styled miniature trees, native to China and Japan. Bonsai literally means "tree in a pot" and is an ancient art form originating in China. Durfee's bonsai trees range in age from 10 years old to well over 100. See if you can find the olive tree bonsai (there are many kinds of bonsai trees) which is over 200 years old! The bonsai trees have been a feature of Durfee for a long time and have been collected from all over the world. These unique and beautiful living art forms are really wondrous when you take the time to look at them. Take your time, because they fill the shelves and benches along the walls of House 1 and no two are alike. If you find yourself especially interested, you might want to take the Bonsai Art class taught in spring and fall by Armand Prevost himself, open to all.

Now is an exciting time in House 1, because the Japanese Camellia trees have just begun to flower. You'll see explosions of white, red and pink ruffled blooms until mid-March as you walk down the aisles. Like the Bonsai trees the Camellia trees are a classic part of the Durfee stock. They have been in Durfee's collection since the early 1870s. They were gifted to the conservatory by the emperor of Japan, as a thank-you to the venerated William S. Clark, first president of Massachusetts Agricultural College, who founded an agricultural school in Sapporo, Japan in 1876, which has since become Hokkaido University.

Clark was also given many other trees and plants to bring home to Amherst back for display and for study. Even the huge European and Copper Beech trees that tower in the courtyard next to Durfee have their origins in Japan! They made the long trip over the wild seas as little saplings almost 140 years ago. In fact, many do not know that the UMass campus is an arboretum in itself (the Waugh Arboretum), which features many of these rare Japanese trees along its walking tour (available online).

You might notice as you walk between the rows of Camellias that there is one tree that doesn't match the others. It has little white and cream-colored flowers in clusters and a sweet, enchanting fragrance. This is the Osmanthus Fragrance tree from China, also known as the Sweet Olive tree, acquired in the later 1800s as well. The elegant tree is known for its fragrance and is used to flavor teas. Surrounding these beautiful trees, apart from the Bonsai collection, are Rosemary, Cymbidium Orchids and Japanese Lace Cap Hydrangeas. Ask Armand about the special ancient uses that some of these plants have. Take your time in this house, you'll be surprised and moved by the history and the beauty of the rare plants that lie within these walls. Remember, Durfee is always looking for volunteers, so if you're intrigued by House 1 or excited by any exhibit in Durfee you might want to consider a volunteer position. You can work as little as one hour a week and learn more about the conservatory while caring for all of its beautiful plants!

Paul Jackmauh is a regular volunteer at Durfee and a plant enthusiast.

Minutemen battle Terriers to tie at BU's Agganis Arena

"That was a bad turnover," said BU coach Jack Parker. "It was a bad read by our forward [Smolinsky] as well."

Both teams caught fire in the final frame, with BU taking little time to swing the momentum back in its favor, scoring a power play goal 4:12 into the third period.

The Terriers tried to get Quick moving through the crease a number of times before finally putting one past him. Bryan Ewing skated around the net, pulling Quick to his right. Ewing then passed to Pete MacArthur, who had a wide-open net for the easy goal.

Less than a minute later, MacArthur returned the favor to Ewing with a helper of his own. On a near mirror image of the previous goal, MacArthur received a pass from Kenny Roche at the left post. Quick followed the puck to MacArthur, who quickly threw the puck to Ewing, who had an even easier shot at the net, scoring with Quick still scrambling to get into position.

The Mass Attack showed great resiliency by responding just over four minutes later. At 9:32, Matt Anderson fired a shot from the top of the left faceoff circle. Curry made the pad save, but left a long rebound, which Kevin Jarman sent beat Curry with a quick shot, tying the game at two.

"[Jarman] has played very well for us this year," Cahoon said. "He's created some chances for himself and scored some goals. I think he's starting to understand that he can be a force at this level."

Moments after Jarman tied the game, 11 of the 12 players on the ice (save for Curry at the other end) became engulfed in a large scuffle that re-erupted a number of times as players began shoving each other and putting gloves into the opposing players' faces.

Quirk, Justin Braun, and Chris Capraro for UMass, and Jason Lawrence and Chrls Higgins for BU found themselves in the penalty box for roughing and grabbing-the-facemask infractions. UMass came out short-handed following the altercation, but the situation was quickly evened by a hooking penalty against BU's Eric Thomassian.

If the third period was Quick's time to shine, overtime was Curry's. The senior battled a 7-1 shot advantage in favor of UMass, saving holding onto the tie and the one point for his team.

La Salle remains undefeated

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Non-conference opponents have not proved to be much of a challenge for several Atlantic 10 teams. Even some of the squads projected to finish in the cellar have dominated their non-league schedule.

Although they were only expected to finish ninth in the A-10, the La Salle women's basketball team's 5-0 start is generating some buzz in basketball circles.

The Explorers defeated Wagner, 74-53, on Sunday to extend their winning streak to five games. The five-game run includes wins over Big 5 rivals Villanova and Pennsylvania.

A-10 Basketball

In the game against Wagner, the Explorers out-rebounded their opponent 45-31 – including a 15-rebound difference on the defensive glass. They also shot 50 percent to the Seahawks' 34.3.

Some of the conference's historically weak teams like Massachusetts (5-1) and Saint Louis (5-2) are turning some heads with their hot starts.

UMass lost its first game of the season this past weekend while Saint Louis rode a hot start to a 5-0 record before dropping its last two games to Washington and Miami of Ohio.

Conversely, the Saint Joseph's Hawks were fifth in the preseason polls and are just 1-3 out of the gate. Consecutive losses to Hartford, Virginia Commonwealth and Illinois put the Hawks at a disadvantage, but they should be fine as conference play is still a ways away.

Ricketts does it again

La Salle senior forward Crista Ricketts' received her third consecutive A-10 Player of the Week award – this is the fourth time that she received the award.

In the Explorers two victories last week, she averaged 19.5 points and 11 rebounds per game.

The conference selected her to its Preseason All-Conference First Team and she is not disappointing so far in her senior season.

In La Salle's five victories this season, Ricketts averages 23 points and 11.4 rebounds per game – both of the totals lead the A-10. The 21 points she scored against Penn made her the first Explorer to start the season with four consecutive 20-point games.

She recorded three straight double-doubles for the first time in her career as well. She hopes to become just the fourth La Salle player to reach the 1,500 point milestone – she is currently 12th on the school's all-time scoring list with 1,251 points.

Ricketts also received A-10 Rookie of the Week honors four times during her freshman season.

She looks to continue her hot streak when La Salle plays its first home game of the season Wednesday night against Binghamton.

Finally

The Saint Louis Billikens had not won a road game since they defeated Loyola-Chicago on Dec. 3, 2003. Since that date, they lost 34 straight games on the road. This was certainly on the minds of SLU players when they headed to Southern Illinois to take on the Salukis last Tuesday.

The Billikens won by a score of 80-73 to improve to 5-0 on the season before losing their next two games.

In the game against SIU, freshman guard Teresa Lisch scored 27 points on 9-of-14 shooting. She came out firing, scoring seven of the team's first 11 points. The Salukis cut the lead to three late, but Lisch hit a 3-pointer to effectively put the game away for the Billikens.

Senior forward Rachel Diener added 22 points for the Billikens. She was 5-of-8 from beyond the arc for Saint Louis. She also recorded three steals in the Saint Louis victory.

This is not what they had in mind

When Fordham hired Cathy Andruzzi as its head women's basketball coach prior to the start of this season, it hoped that she could bring some stability to the position – Fordham had eight coaches in the program's 29 seasons.

Andruzzi is one of nine head coaches in the A-10 that have held their position for less than five years.

She hoped to get off to a good start to have her team ready for A-10 play, slated to start Jan. 5 at La Salle.

Her first four games have not gone according to plan, however.

The Rams have dropped all four of these games – including an embarrassing 50-point loss to Marist in their last time out.

The smallest margin of victory for a Ram opponent this season is the 25-point beat down that American laid on Fordham in its season debut.

The Rams have shot a paltry 29.7 percent from the field this season while their opponents average a robust 53.5 percent.

The Rams' season will not get any easier as they welcome a 3-2 Manhattan team to Rose Hill Gym Wednesday night then travel to Columbia, S.C. to square off against the SEC's South Carolina Gamecocks.

Conference play begins in just over a month for the Rams and they hope to get a few wins under their belt before then.

This will not be easy for the young Fordham team – six of the team's 11 players are underclassmen, including four freshmen.

Curry and Quick put on show

BU just pressed the net real hard from all angles," Quick said. "I just knew that I had to cover the bottom of the net really well because that's where they usually shoot."

Last night's game is indicative of the quality goaltending that Hockey East possesses. Quick and BU senior John Curry are two of the best in the league, if not the nation.

Curry turned in quite the performance. He blocked 22 UMass shots including a key glove save in the third period. It wasn't so much a save as it was Curry snatching the puck out of midair.

UMass came at him with a flurry of shots in OT – eight in all – but Curry held strong. After saving a few rebound chances, the puck shot straight up in the air and had disaster written all over it. But Curry kept his poise and plucked the puck from the air, silencing the barrage.

"Unquestionably the two most valuable players on the ice were the two goaltenders with critical saves in crucial situations," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "Jon Quick was maybe tested a little bit more than John Curry."

Curry is now in his fourth year as a Terrier, but this is just Quick's second year in Amherst, and just his first as the featured net minder. In little over year however, Quick's improvements are noticeable. Both coach and player say his one year of experience is helping him more than anything.

He entered last night's game with the third-best goals-against average in the conference. His 2.01 place him just behind Joe Fallon of Vermont, and Curry. Quick also leads in save percentage, checking in at .935.

A-10 teams ride rookies early the game in the remaining seconds after arguing a call. Ahmad Nivins went for a lay-up and a foul was not called when the shot was blocked by Gary Claxton. Martelli said that the official "blew the call," but has since apologized to the official who made the call.

Long Overdue

Speaking of coaches who are in the spotlight, the most anticipated debut of any A-10 head coach in recent memory had to wait almost two full weeks into the season. Fran Dunphy's Temple Owls (0-2) were the last A-10 team to kick off the 2006-07 campaign when they took on Kent State last Tuesday.

The Golden Flashes had different plans, however, and spoiled Dunphy's long-awaited tenure to begin with a come-from-behind, 63-54 win over the Owls. Kent State erased a 29-19 lead at the half and outscored the Owls 45-25 in the second half.

On Monday, the Buffalo Bulls decided to join Kent State in being party spoilers, coming out of Temple with a 64-62 win in Martelli's home debut as coach of the Owls.

Despite a new head coach in town, one part of Temple's game which hasn't changed from last season is its struggles offensively. Temple shot just over 40 percent from the field in its two losses this year.

Hogging the Lead

The Dayton Flyers are sitting at 4-1 and one doesn't need to look any further than guard Brian Roberts for one of the key reasons why Dayton is flying high in this young season.

Prior to Tuesday night's game against South Carolina State, Roberts led the Flyers in a number of categories, including points per game (23), steals per game (1.2), and is shooting close to almost 50 percent from the field and is shooting over 40 percent from beyond the 3-point line. Roberts' 23 points per game ties him for first in the A-10 in scoring with Temple's Dustin Salisbery.

In a microcosm of Roberts' season thus far, the junior guard put up 20 points and pulled in three rebounds in Dayton's 68-64 win over Louisville last Friday.

The Second Team All-Conference member averaged 16 points a contest last season and shot 41 percent from the field.

Seems Like Ages Ago

The St. Louis Billikens (4-1) were in the news for all the wrong reasons last week when they fell to the Texas A&M Aggies, 69-33. For the Billikens, it was their worst offensive output since 1951.

But memories of that game were quickly erased when St. Louis defeated the Houston Cougars last Saturday 82-79. The Billikens shot just under 50 percent from the field, in stark contrast to when they shot a miserable 21 percent from the field against the Aggies. Kevin Lisch had 27 points in the win, only six points short of St. Louis output against the Aggies. Sophomore guard Tommie Liddell was back in form against the Cougars as well, recording his sixth career double-double with 24 points and 10 rebounds in the win.

The Cougars allowed 99 points in a win earlier this season to the Rhode Island Rams.

Hard Times with the Top of the Class

A-10 teams have posted a combined 43-21 record coming into Tuesday's slate of games, good for a .671 winning percentage. Eight teams have one loss or fewer and only two of the 14 teams in the A-10 are below the .500 mark.

However, none of those 43 wins have come against a nationally-ranked opponent this season. The A-10 has gone 0-5 thus far against teams in the Top 25, including No.17 Syracuse, No.5 Pittsburgh, No.12 Texas A&M, No.9 Alabama and No. 24 Tennessee. In those five games, A-10 teams have lost by an average margin of 15.6 points, but half of the games have been decided by 10 points or less.

UMass will be the next A-10 team with a shot to knock off a potential nationally-ranked opponent when it hosts Boston College this Saturday at the Mullins Center.

Unlikely twosome makes waves

Jorgensen and Omar come up big in UMass' first-round win

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts football team produced some unlikely heroes in Saturday's 35-14 win over Lafayette in the first round of the playoffs.

Sure, there was Steve Baylark, who did his thing with over 150 yards rushing and two touchdowns.

But two individuals who hadn't cracked the stat sheet since the leaves were on the trees were responsible for 14 of the 35 UMass points Saturday.

Ian Jorgensen and Mike Omar caught one touchdown pass each (it was the first career TDs for both players), which no doubt drew some 'Who is that?' responses and the ensuing flip through the depth chart to find the name that matched the number.

It was Omar's sixth reception all season, and it came in the second quarter with UMass holding a comfortable 14-0 lead.

He lined up on the far-side slot and quarterback Liam Coen faked the hand off to Baylark and rolled out to his right for the play-action pass. The two Lafayette linebackers bit on the play and Omar was free and clear down the field.

"I got the chance to go in and I noticed that it was going to be wide open from the start because we were running the ball consistently and that zone play had worked in the past," Omar said. "The linebackers came up fast and the drag play was wide open. I was on a cross and that's usually the linebackers' zone so they have to get back. They didn't and I was wide open."

Omar's parents flew in from northern California – where Omar went to high school – and his brother flew from San Diego to see him play. Saturday's catch was the culmination of several months of rehabilitation from a knee injury, and the junior wideout awarded his team and his parents with his first touchdown catch.

"It's a playoff game and the first game that [my parents have] come to," Omar said. "I was obviously excited to show them the campus and show them the stadium. And I ended up scoring a touchdown, so it was cool."

Omar hadn't caught a pass in a game since Villanova on Sept. 16. The torn meniscus in his knee forced him into surgery, and Omar has spent the last month and a half recovering.

"I was coming back off of rehab and finally getting my shot and I ended up taking it," Omar said. "It's been pretty frustrating because I don't really feel 100 percent but I wanted to stick it out and I wanted to make a difference with this team and help the team out as much as I can."

Jorgensen's catch followed a 14-point Lafayette run to close the first half. After the speedy start, the Minutemen turned the ball over twice (a Coen interception and a fumble on a kick return) and the Leopards capitalized on both opportunities.

The drive started with 4:34 left in the third quarter and a steady dose of Baylark moved UMass down to the 7-yard line, when the Minutemen again used the play-action pass to fool the defense.

Jorgensen faked the block on the defensive end and bolted for the endzone, trying to create some space for himself. Coen found him in the back of the UMass zone for seven points and a 28-14 UMass lead.

"I was blocking down and waiting for the cornerback to actually read run," Jorgensen said. "Then I tossed the defensive end to the side, but a linebacker came to my side and started grabbing me, so I just tried to get his hands off of me and I got behind him. I didn't even see Liam, I just saw the ball coming over the line and I had to catch it."

Jorgensen began the 2006 season as the starting tight end, but Rutgers transfer Brad Listorti took over early in the season. Jorgensen hasn't had many opportunities this year – he had one catch against both Northeastern and Towson – but on Saturday, in the most important game of the season, he delivered.

"I'm not the first read on that but you know there's a possibility of being open with how we run the ball and everything," he said. "So I got excited when [the call] came in."

Jorgensen and Omar got a lot of people excited on Saturday, and while playing time against New Hampshire this Saturday might be thin, the glory this past weekend belonged to these two unlikely heroes.

Minutemen battle ranked Terriers to tie

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BOSTON—Jon Quick and the Massachusetts hockey team (6-3-2, 4-2-1 Hockey East) fought Boston University (5-2-5, 3-2-4 HEA) to a 2-2 tie in a duel of two top-rated goaltenders. Quick made 33 saves last night in front of 4,449 fans, including 16 stops in the third period alone.

battling BU's John Curry to a stalemate.

UMass	2
BU	2

"They both made brilliant saves," said UMass coach Don Cahoon. "The game was defined by the goaltending."

The Minutemen return home Friday to host College Hockey America's Niagara at 7 p.m.

UMass was outshot by the Terriers, putting 24 shots on net to BU's 35, including an overwhelming 18-6 Terrier advantage in the third period. The Minutemen jumped out early with a second-period goal, but BU responded with two quick scores in the third before Kevin Jarman tied it with 10:28 left

"The way the game evolved, we were happy after giving up the second goal to get the goal back and [we will] probably look at the point as a positive as opposed to walking away without the win," Cahoon said.

BU outshot UMass 9-4 in a scoreless first period, though both teams had chances to light the lamp.

The Mass Attack quieted the BU faithful, scoring a nifty goal with two minutes remaining in the second period. BU's Kevin Kieft made a bad pass across the ice in his own zone, leaving it behind Steve Smolinsky. Sophomore Cory Quirk alertly swiped the puck from Smolinsky and skated all alone toward the net.

Advancing on Curry from the left, Quirk deked to the right and tucked a backhand shot behind a diving Curry for the 1-0 lead. The surprisingly large number of UMass fans in attendance Tuesday took over for the Terrier fans in cheering, as the goal drew considerable noise from the non-student sections of the arena.

"I was actually coming off the bench, Davis forced [Smolinsky] into me," said Quirk. "I came up with the puck on a breakaway. It's just one of my moves I always do. I always feel confident with that move."

UMass goaltender Jon Quick made 33 saves against Boston University last night on the road, and led the Minutemen to a 2-2 tie. UMass returns to the Mullins Center on Friday to host Niagara.

Junior defenseman David Leaderer and the Minutemen held the Terriers to just two goals at Agganis Arena last night. The Minutemen were outshot, 35-24, but received some stellar plays from goaltender Jon Quick.

Quick and Curry put on a show for the Agganis crowd

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

BOSTON—Imagine this, you're between the pipes and close to 300 red-and-white clad college students are right behind yelling at you in unison, directly into your ear. Never mind the fact that the game is tied and your team is playing one of Hockey East's finest—Boston University.

That's the scenario Massachusetts hockey goalie Jon Quick dealt with last night during UMass' 2-2 overtime tie with the Terriers at Agganis Arena.

BU's crowd is one of the loudest and intense bunches in the conference. The fans take any opportunity to get into the opposing team's head—and they especially harp on the goalie. The student section at Agganis remains on its feet the entire game, and its chants are so specifically timed that it sounds as if the taunts are hollered from a single voice.

But that didn't phase Quick last night. He backstopped UMass' efforts in earning its first point ever at Agganis.

The Mass Attack's goalie says he uses some reverse psychology to turn the screaming Terrier fans into a positive.

"I pretend that they're my fans and they're cheering for me," Quick said after the game. "The more they cheer the better off it is for me."

Quick's strategy must have worked because he recorded one of his finest performances against the Terriers last night. The sophomore turned away 33 shots—17 of which came in the third period and overtime alone.

BU came after Quick hard in the middle of the second period after he held the Terriers scoreless for the first period and a half. One of his finest saves of the night came on a shot from Kenny Roche.

Roche received the puck from Bryan Ewing and quickly ripped a shot from right post. Displaying the athletic ability that he is so highly praised for, Quick went down in a split to stop the puck. It bounced off his left leg pad and out of harm's way.

But the pressure wasn't off yet. Just minutes later, BU came at him again. UMass experienced trouble clearing the zone, and it translated into scoring opportunities for the Terriers. Quick turned away pucks from every direction with barely any time to breath.

"They just crashed the net and were able to get a few opportunities," Quick said. "Luckily I was able to make a couple of saves."

Not much changed in the third period. BU scored both its goals in the third, each coming on similar plays. The Terriers caught Quick on the move twice, and each time scored with cross-crease passes and one-time goals.

Quick held his ground and got through the period, forcing the game into the extra frame.

Freeman surpasses Irving in UMass win at Savannah State

The Massachusetts men's basketball team needed only one more victory away from the Mullins Center to top last year's win total when not in Amherst. UMass didn't waste any time establishing itself as a much better team on the road in 2006-07, jumping out to a 42-24 halftime lead and running away with a 72-49 win over Savannah State (5-4) last night at Tiger Arena in Georgia.

UMass	72
Sav. St.	49

The Minutemen (6-1) host Boston College (2-2) on Saturday night at 7:30 p.m. at the Mullins Center.

"We understand what it takes to win," Thomas said after last night's game on the difference in this year's team. "We work together. We don't care who gets the credit. We have an extreme work ethic, whether it's on or off the court."

The Minutemen were led by senior forward Rashaun Freeman, who surpassed Julius Erving on UMass' all-time scoring list with his game-high 14 points. Freeman also led the team in rebounds with seven, and shot 5-for-7 from the floor.

UMass led by as much as 31 points in the game at the 15-minute mark of the second half. The Minutemen used their depth to knock around the Tigers throughout the game. James Life (13), Brandon Thomas (11) and Gary Forbes (10) each finished in double figures along with Freeman.

Thomas and freshman Ricky Harris provided a spark in the first half, combining for 15 points off the bench. UMass outscored Savannah State off the bench 24-12 in the game.

"What I like about Brandon right now is that he's really understanding his role," Ford said. "He's learning how to play within that team concept, understanding what's going to get him minutes, and he's really helping our team right now.

"With Ricky Harris, it's just a matter of getting him more playing time," Ford added. "He's just a tough, little sucker right now. He's really scored in bunches."

UMass got off to another strong start in the first half, opening the game with an 8-0 run and holding Savannah scoreless for the first four minutes, until Joseph Flegler hit a three-pointer at 15:55 to put his Tigers on the board for the first time.

Flegler tried to make many things happen for Savannah State throughout the half, but his effort wasn't enough, as UMass held onto the lead that it took with Freeman's easy layup just 11 seconds in.

"You definitely want to get out to good starts, but I'm worried if we don't get off to a good start, our guys start to worry what's wrong," Ford said. "So I told them, it's not about the score early. As long as we're playing hard and focused, and not making mistakes early, that's the type of start we want to get off to."

UMass dominated the rest of the game and cruised through the second half. And while the final score looked like a blowout, Ford believes there are many things that need improvement.

"I haven't been happy with our rebounding all year long," Ford said after his team only outrebounded Savannah State 41-38. "I think we're just relying on [Freeman and Jasmel] to rebound. We just have to get more help on the glass because I think we're very much underachieving right now on the backboards."

Freshman Ricky Harris and the Minutemen have three wins on the road this season, topping last year's win total away from the Mullins Center. UMass returns home to face Boston College this Saturday.

Freshmen make early impact

The Who once sang that "The Kids Are Alright." They could have very well been singing about the 2006-07 freshmen class in the Atlantic 10, as at least three teams are relying heavily on their underclassmen to contribute.

A-10 Basketball

The Richmond Spiders have started five different freshmen in their first four games this year and despite a 69-52 loss to Old Dominion last Saturday, are off to a 3-1 start. Forward/center Dan Geriot leads all Richmond players in scoring, averaging 14.5 points per game and is second in rebounding (3.3) only to freshman Brian Morris, who has pulled in five rebounds a contest. Morris also leads the team in assists (3.3).

Meanwhile, another youth movement is occurring in Pittsburgh, where the Duquesne Dukes (2-3) are being led in scoring by freshman forward Robert Mitchell, who is averaging 16.8 points a game.

Not far behind is Scott Urote, who has put up 16.2 points a contest. Mitchell has also made his presence known in the paint, averaging 7.4 rebounds a game, good for 11th in the conference. Mitchell averaged 19.0 points, 6.7 rebounds, and shot 52.3 percent from the field in the course of three games this year, and posted his first career double-double in an 87-82 loss to Northern Illinois.

In fact, the Dukes started three freshmen in their first game of the season, the first time that had happened since NCAA bylaws were changed prior to the 1972-73 season that granted freshman eligibility to play.

Down the road in Philadelphia, the Saint Joseph's Hawks are having early success with two freshmen manning the starting backcourt. Guard Jawan Carter is averaging just less than 10 points a game and averaging 32.8 minutes while his teammate in the backcourt Garret Williamson is averaging seven points a game and is shooting 67 percent from the field while shooting 50 percent from beyond the 3-point line.

TO THE PRINCIPAL'S OFFICE

The Hawks were in the spotlight prior to this season when many were questioning whether the young squad would be able to make any impact in the A-10 this year. Now the spotlight is being shone on head coach Phil Martelli since he was reprimanded by Atlantic 10 Commissioner Linda Bruno for comments he made about the officiating after the Hawks 65-61 loss Sunday to Penn State.

Martelli was called for a technical foul and ended up costing the Hawks

Patrick set to return to UM

For the second time in less than two months, Deval Patrick will speak at the UMass campus.

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Massachusetts' newly elected governor, Deval Patrick, is returning to the University of Massachusetts this Friday to speak about higher education.

The event will be put on by the Public Higher Education Coalition at UMass, which includes members from the Faculty Union as well as the Student Government Association.

During Patrick's campaign, he argued for more funding of public higher education, citing that 85 percent of students remain in Massachusetts to work after they graduate from college. By investing in higher education, Patrick believes that he is "investing in the future workforce of Massachusetts."

"He has said that higher education is a priority for him," said Elvis Mendez, president of the SGA.

Mendez says Patrick's speech will revolve around five major points: affordability, outreach, access, democratizing the University and better funding.

"He will be speaking very briefly, and we will break up afterwards into community meeting style discussions about the five points," said Mendez. "He will talk about what UMass and public higher education could be."

The Public Higher Education Coalition is hoping that Patrick will share in their ideas for the future of higher education in the state.

"Public higher education has been chronically underfunded and under-valued," says Patrick's official Web site, devalpatrick.com. "Public higher education is too expensive. As a result, some of our strongest students are being denied the opportunity to continue their education."

UMass fined 70K for environmental violations

BY HOLLY SEABURY
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The University of Massachusetts has been fined for several violations by the state Department of Environmental Protection (MassDEP). While UMass is currently undergoing numerous, expensive construction and renovation projects, officials now will deal with the violation fine of $70,000.

The first violations were recognized in a MassDEP inspection on May 16 and 17, 2005. The inspection revealed hazardous waste storage and treatment violations, as well as industrial wastewater violations at different campus locations, including the bus maintenance garage and Lederle Graduate Research Center.

Another violation was found in an inspection of the campus on June 28, 2005. According to the investigation, the asbestos pipe insulation in French Hall had several areas of damage. Asbestos which can be easily inhaled is also carcinogenic, meaning that inhalation could lead to cancer.

UMass did not perform an asbestos survey prior to demolishing the ceiling in French Hall, did not remove asbestos before demolition, did not use proper asbestos removal procedures, did not seal the asbestos into properly labeled leak-tight containers and did not notify MassDEP properly, according the investigation.

In addition, on June 27 and July 12, 2006, UMass self-reported excessive amounts of smoke being released from the three coal-fired boilers at the Physical Plant's main boiler facility.

"A history of non-compliance is a major factor for large fines," said Eva Ior, the Springfield representative for MassDEP. "Because UMass has a history, with violations spanning over a year, there will be a bigger price to pay."

UMass has cooperated with the state and made an agreement with MassDEP, which will suspend $40,000 of the fine if the campus complies with the terms and conditions of the agreement.

The agreement asks that UMass applies an Environmental Management System (EMS) to address the proper management of known and suspected asbestos on campus. UMass will also conduct Supplemental Environmental Projects (SEPs) in the amount of $29,000. The SEPs will require conducting six asbestos awareness training sessions for municipalities in Western Massachusetts, and replacing the traffic lights on Commonwealth Avenue, Massachusetts Avenue and North Pleasant Street with energy saving light-emitting diode (LED) lights. UMass will also pay a penalty of $1,000.

Starting in January of this year, MassDEP has issued over 50 fines of more than $10,000 to various violators. While fine prices vary for different violations, UMass' fine of $70,000 is one of the highest of the year.

UMass was fined $70,000 for numerous environmental violations by MassDEP.

MassDEP is in charge of guaranteeing clean air and water, safe management and recycling of solid and hazardous wastes, timely cleanup of hazardous waste sites and spills and the preservation of wetlands and coastal resources.

Bush's Mideast visit sparks protests within Jordan

BY JAMAL HALABY
ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMMAN, Jordan—President Bush's visit here Wednesday aimed at stemming the chaos in Iraq sparked small but angry protests in Jordan and defiance from Iran and Syria—at a time when anti-American feeling in the Mideast is widespread.

With the Iraqi killings and kidnappings moving closer to a full-blown civil war and tensions mounting in other Mideast flashpoints, many in the region feel Bush's visit may be too little, too late.

Bush's arrived in the Jordanian capital Amman on Wednesday night and was whisked away to King Abdullah II's hilltop palace for talks with the monarch.

His two-day visit hit an immediate snag, however, as Bush's planned meeting with Iraqi Prime Minister Nouri al-Maliki was postponed until Thursday.

Also casting a shadow over Bush's summitry was a political crisis in Iraq. The party of anti-American Shiite cleric Muqtada al-Sadr suspended the participation of its 30 lawmakers in parliament and its six members in al-Maliki's Cabinet to protest his planned meeting with the U.S. president.

The United States' top rivals in the region, Iran and Syria, also took advantage of Bush's rare Mideast visit to express their defiance of Washington. Earlier this week, Bush accused the two countries of fueling the violence in Iraq.

The ability to "challenge is the most precious thing we possess, so we will keep challenging until we achieve our goals," Syria's President Bashar Assad said, according to Syrian official media.

Hardline Iranian President Mahmood Ahmadinejad held a competing summit Wednesday with Iraq's president Jalal Talabani and called for the United States to withdraw troops from Iraq.

"I advise you to leave Iraq," Ahmadinejad said. "Based on a timetable, transfer the responsibilities to Iraqi government. This will agree to your interests, too."

Iran has been trying to position itself as the top regional power broker in an effort to counter Washington's influence in Iraq.

Officials set date of new gym construction

BY AMBER VALLANCOURT
COLLEGIAN STAFF

University officials have recently announced another "New Dirt" project. Construction on a recreational center is scheduled to begin in June 2007.

The recreation center will provide members of the university community with an alternative to Totman and Boyden gymnasiums, which have become notorious for overcrowding.

"The gyms are always packed, so it will be nice to have another option aside from Boyden and Totman," said Mike Childress, a sophomore art major.

"I think having a new gym on campus will be good incentive for both myself and other people to go."

The architect for the recreation center is Sasaki Associates of Boston, and the construction manager has not yet been selected. Hopefully, the recreation center will be completed by early 2009.

The new gym's location will have quite an impact on the Hicks Way landscape, amongst the old stucco dairy barn, the milkers' bungalow and the small engine repair shop, all of which will be raised to make space.

The $50 million, 120,000 square foot building will add a lot more than incentive, including a juice bar with a lounge area, a wellness center, sports clubs area, and an outdoor patio.

Also included in the facility will be three dividable multi-purpose gym courts and 22,000 square feet of weight and fitness space. Club sports like fencing and wrestling will also benefit from the three multi-purpose rooms for non-court related activities found in the three story design.

A sheltered bus stop will also be added on Commonwealth Avenue next to a gently sloping greenway, which will be put in place for relaxation and recreation.

"The Rec Center isn't just a destination, it also forms a pedestrian boulevard between the center of campus to the east and the recreation fields and Mullins Center to the west," said Cleve Carrens, project manager for Facilities and Campus Planning.

Man found with child pornography

BY HOLLY SEABURY
DAILY COLLEGIAN

Detectives from the Amherst Police Department and an agent from the Immigration and Customs Enforcement arrested an Amherst man on Monday, Nov. 28 for possession of child pornography.

Officials entered the home of Ronald T. Garney, 59, of Cottage Street, at 6:30 a.m. Monday to locate and seize child pornography with a search warrant. The execution of the warrant followed a joint investigation that has spanned the last several months.

The pornography that officials seized appeared to be commercial, and was not produced locally. Police have no evidence that the pornography depicts local Amherst children.

Also seized at the scene were several pieces of computer media as well as a computer tower. The Massachusetts State Police forensics team was contacted and will conduct a search of the material for additional evidence.

Garney will be arraigned in the Eastern Hampshire District Court.

Parents are failing in paying for school

Tuition costs are continuing to rise at exponential rates

BY EMILY REYNOLDS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

With the cost of college rising every year, recent studies have shown that parents are not doing nearly enough to adequately save for their children's tuition and fees for school.

According to a study done over the past summer by Mathews Greenwald and Associates, Inc., parents are not saving enough money for education and have unrealistic expectations for the amount of financial aid that their child will receive.

"The amount the typical parent plans to save for college is likely to cover 23 percent of their children's undergraduate expenses, at best," said an article put out by AllianceBernstein Investments based on the study.

The article goes on to say that not only are parents not saving enough now, but parents of younger children who plan to save the same amount are not factoring inflation and the rise of tuition, which has increased significantly in recent years. University of Massachusetts prices have increased by 50 percent under the Romney/Healey administration, according to the Massachusetts Professor Society Web site.

"My parents have paid for the past two years. Next year, my parents aren't going to be able to afford it, so I'm taking out a massive amount of loans," said Brittany Cartin, a sophomore at UMass.

Her parents are not the only ones to miscalculate the costs of school. Most parents spend far more on vacations and dining out than saving for school.

"Most have spent more money on entertainment and/or discretionary purchases in the past year than they have saved for their children's college costs," said the AllianceBernstein article.

The parents who do accurately estimate the costs of school do not accurately estimate how much financial aid and scholarships that their children will receive. Almost three-quarters of parents think that their child will receive a scholarship based on academics, sports, or the arts. Most students do not receive such scholarships, and for those that do, the scholarship does not cover all of the expenses.

For some, scholarships are a big part of their ability to go to school.

"My parents aren't paying for any of college. I'm all by myself with it," says sophomore Gurpreet Kaur of Merrimack College. "They don't want to help at all."

As for financial aid, 68 percent of

New advice: Don't sit up straight

By Sara Goudarzi
Associated Press

(AP)—The longstanding advice to "sit up straight" has been turned on its head by a new study that suggests leaning back is a much better posture.

Researchers analyzed different postures and concluded that the strain of sitting upright for long hours is a perpetrator of chronic back problems.

Using a new form of magnetic resonance imaging (MRI), researchers studied 22 volunteers with no back pain history. The subjects assumed three different positions: slouching; sitting up straight at 90 degrees; and sitting back with a 135-degree posture – all while their spines were scanned.

"A 135-degree body-thigh sitting posture was demonstrated to be the best biomechanical sitting position, as opposed to a 90-degree posture, which most people consider normal," said study author, Waseem Amir Bashir, a researcher at the University of Alberta Hospital in Canada. "Sitting in a sound anatomic position is essential, since the strain put on the spine and its associated ligaments over time can lead to pain, deformity and chronic illness."

Back pain, according to the National Institute of Neurological Disorders and Stroke, is the most common cause of work-related disability in the United States. It costs Americans nearly $50 billion annually. Sitting appears to be a major cause of this ailment.

"We were not created to sit down for long hours, but somehow modern life requires the vast majority of the global population to work in a seated position," Bashir said. "This made our search for the optimal sitting position all the more important."

When strain is placed on the spine, the spinal disks start to move and misalign. At a 90-degree sitting position, this movement was most prominent. The disks were least moved when subjects were sitting back at a 135-degree sitting position.

"We have to do something that is similar to the lying position," Bashir told LiveScience. Lying down in a relaxed position with your knees slightly bent is the best position that a person can be in, because it doesn't cause any stress on the ligaments, the thigh muscles as well as on the back.

Parents struggle to pay kids through college parents think that colleges will have reasonable financial aid packages. The vast majority overestimates how much money their child will receive.

"Ninety-seven percent of aid administrators think that parents have a false sense of security that colleges will help them cover costs," said the AllianceBernstein article. "Two-thirds of aid administrators believe the current financial aid system does not meet the needs of many students and their families."

The article goes on to say, "Nearly three-quarters say that less than half of those who apply for aid are financially able to meet their expected family contribution, and 61 percent think it would be a major financial hardship for the average family applying for aid to do so."

Although UMass is a state school and expected to be cheap, it is the fifth most expensive state school in the country according to USA Today.

While students today are racking up the debt to pay for school, there are places to look for help. Fastweb.com is a free Web site that filters through thousands of scholarships that students can apply for, and AllianceBernstein Investments put together CollegeSavingsCrunch.com to help parents plan for saving for school.

Students cooking up home recipes

By Stephanie Reitz
Associated Press

STORRS, Conn.—Stung by decades of jokes about mystery meat and soggy sandwiches, college dining halls around the country are borrowing recipes from the ultimate authority on heartwarming meals: Mom. (And Dad, too.)

That's how Kristina Forzaglia's favorite dish – her mom's rich and creamy stroganoff – got on the University of Connecticut menu, along with other students' comfort foods from home, such as Albanian chicken wings, couscous with spinach, and pumpkin cookies.

Colleges see the approach as a way to lend a little culinary flair to their cafeteria and relieve homesickness, too.

"It's a great connection with home for the students, and a way to de-institutionalize a college food service program," said J. Michael Floyd, food service director at the University of Georgia, which pioneered the approach 20 years ago with its annual Taste of Home competition.

From hundreds of entries that are taste-tested each year, Georgia has selected such winners as eclair squares, poppy seed chicken and bulldog punch bowl cake.

"These parents aren't just sharing a recipe," Floyd said. "They're sharing a family tradition."

At Williams College in Williamstown, Mass., barbecued salmon and Thai eggplant dishes had their start in students' homes, as did the Ukrainian apple nut squares and whole-wheat cheddar buns.

The practice has been catching on at big universities such as Yale and Harvard and small schools such as Wheeling Jesuit University in Wheeling, W.Va., and Soka University of America in Aliso Viejo, Calif.

Some experts say it is just the kind of idea that would appeal to college-age "Millennials," members of the generation born after 1981.

William Strauss, co-author with Neil Howe of "Millennials Rising" and "Millennials Go to College," said those young adults are more connected with their parents than previous generations.

"By and large, the parents come from a generation that looks back on their college years with a fair amount of positive reflection and happy memories," Strauss said. "Serving those family meals is an example of a college finding a positive way for the kids and the parents to take advantage of the tighter student-family connections that we already see in this group."

Bush, Maliki to hold crunch talks on Iraq

Talabani said he reached a security agreement with Iran, which the U.S. has long-accused of backing some of the Iraqi Shiite militias blamed for the violence. Talabani gave no details on the security agreement.

In Jordan, meanwhile, hundreds staged sit-ins and shouted anti-Bush slogans at several demonstrations scattered throughout the capital. Security was beefed-up, with bomb-sniffing dogs at hotels and tanks and troops dotting the main highway from the airport to downtown.

At one street demonstration, about 1,000 people from several opposition groups and political associations marched to the Prime Ministry building where they burned American and Israeli flags and an effigy of Bush. Many carried portraits of ousted Iraqi leader Saddam Hussein.

At another rally, organized by Jordan's branch of the Muslim Brotherhood, about 300 people carrying Jordanian flags and anti-Bush banners marched through the University of Jordan. One demonstrator held a sign that read: "You are not welcome in Jordan. You have our children's blood in your hands," while another banner said: "Bad Bush, you are not welcome in our homeland Jordan."

Hundreds of Jordanians staged silent sit-ins and angry demonstrations yesterday to protest U.S. President George W. Bush's visit, telling him he was not welcome in their country.

Overall, the protests were smaller than expected and no clashes were reported, though security was tight.

Several Jordanian newspaper columnists expressed doubt that the Bush-Maliki talks would offer any breakthroughs on Iraq and the other political hotbeds – Lebanon and the Israeli-Palestinian crisis.

"Many believe that sectarian violence [in Iraq] has gone well past the point of no return," columnist Hasan Abu Nimah wrote in The Jordan Times.

"There are no quick solutions for either Palestine or Iraq. The situation in Lebanon, Syria and the rest of the Arab world is directly linked to both crisis areas. That simply means matters on both fronts are bound to get worse and the American entanglement in Iraq will deepen, too," he said.

WOMAN'S BACKPACK IS STOLEN

Last Wednesday, at 12:30 a.m., a reporting party left her backpack unattended while in the library and came back to find it stolen. There was a calculator, two packs of cigarettes and a calendar inside the backpack with an approximated value of $150. A suspect was described as a college age Hispanic male wearing a grey hooded sweatshirt and baggy jeans. After police arrived on scene a search was conducted for the stolen items and the suspect but neither was found. The investigation is ongoing.

TWO CARS BROKEN INTO NEAR GRAYSON DORM AND LOT 49

A vehicle was broken into in Lot 49, north of Grayson dorm. The owner noticed it at 9:57 a.m. and reported it to police. The owner believes he forgot to lock the doors to his vehicle and no forced entry signs were found. A video iPod valued at $350 was stolen as well as later model iPod valued at $200 and a small knife. The police have no suspects at this time.

At 11:45 a.m. another vehicle owner reported her car had been broken into in Lot 49, though no items were stolen. The door handle to the car was broken and the gas cap was opened but there appeared to be no other damage to the vehicle. There are no suspects at this time.

LAPTOP STOLEN OUT OF GRAYSON DORM

In Grayson dorm at 9:58 a.m., a resident reported his laptop stolen on the previous Tuesday, Nov. 21, 2006. The resident and his roommate left their door ajar as they left the building to attend a game and came back to find a laptop worth $1,200 gone from the room. Police are still investigating but have no leads.

Britney crotch-shot shocks fans

By Erin Carlson
Associated Press

Britney Spears is behaving more like her soon to be ex-husband, Kevin Federline, than a pop princess on the verge of a career comeback.

Fresh from her split from the club-hopping Federline, Spears looked hip and wholesome weeks ago in a surprise appearance on David Letterman's show and while ice skating in New York's Rockefeller Center in a Gap sweater. But now she's unleashing her inner wild child, running around with party girls Paris Hilton and Lindsay Lohan, sporting unflattering hair extensions and flashing her apparently panty-less crotch to the paparazzi. (Be prepared to cringe if you dare to view the uncensored photos, splashed unceremoniously across the Web).

"She's a beautiful girl and now that she's single and she's having fun, I think she's just trying to express herself," said New York-based celebrity image consultant Amanda Sanders. "Unfortunately, it's the wrong message that's coming across. And the shame is she was really such a role model."

Spears, who turns 25 on Saturday, and Hilton were inseparable while hitting L.A. hotspots over the holiday weekend. People magazine reported Wednesday on its Web site that the duo will co-host the 2006 Billboard Music Awards, scheduled to air live in Las Vegas on Monday (Fox, 8 p.m. EST).

Representatives for Hilton and Spears did not respond to messages Wednesday.

She's enjoying the single life and who can blame her after putting up with K-Fed's antics? – but many Spears watchers disapprove of her decision to cavort with Hollywood's most infamous heiress.

In a post on Spears' MySpace.com page, a female fan urged Spears "to read this so you understand how your fans may see the situation ... now your children need you so do the right thing brit, and be a mother and forget the partying."

Rosie O'Donnell said Wednesday on "The View" that Spears should stop bonding with Hilton and move in with her, her partner Kelli and their kids so she could have a "stable family around her."

Can the mother of two young sons return to the sexy yet sweet Britney of yore?

Maybe, maybe not. But she might reconnect with her fans by making savvy career moves, said Entertainment Weekly magazine executive editor Lori Majewski – like doing a duet with ex-boyfriend Justin Timberlake, or sitting – not jumping – on Oprah Winfrey's couch.

"The public can be very forgiving and, you know, if she were to go on Oprah, the court of public opinion could quickly turn," Majewski said.

"A few tears and the words 'I'm sorry' can go a long, long way. Or 'I'm embarrassed' or 'I didn't mean to'.... But the ultimate key to the success of a future career for her is a new – it doesn't have to be a wholesome image – but a new, cleaned-up image and a hot single."

The girl's worth millions and probably has "fabulous things" spilling out of her closet, Sanders said, but that's not enough to buy class.

It is enough, however, to buy a stylist.

"Now she's got awful extensions and her hair just looks – it looks cheap," Sanders said. "And I don't want to use Tara Reid as a shining example, but, you know ..."

It's your turn, Britney. Now go and give Oprah a call.

Patrick set to increase education funding

"I will invest in public higher education so that quality goes up and costs to students and their families go down," said Patrick on his Web site. "All high school graduates will have access to a quality, affordable public university or college."

Patrick also has plans to increase higher education through bonds, while raising funds and research for other important issues at the same time.

"I will issue bonds to invest in expansion and development of public colleges and universities. Proceeds from the bonds issued to support stem cell research, for example, will be invested in research facilities and faculty development in public colleges and universities," said Patrick on his Web site.

Patrick became the first black governor to be elected in Massachusetts history last month, breaking the Republican Party's 16-year hold on the state's top office.

With a resounding victory, Patrick completed his rise from a political unknown barely more than a year ago to a national figure.

In his first run for political office, Patrick, a Democrat, defeated Lt. Gov. Kerry Healey to become only the second black man to be elected governor in U.S. history. Former Virginia governor L. Douglas Wilder was the first when he was elected in 1989.

An alarming situation

Chris Reardon

Do you want to hear the most annoying sound in the world? Contrary to what may be popular belief, it's not the obnoxious trill of Jim Carrey's Lloyd from Dumb and Dumber. If you really want to hear the most annoying sound in the world, just come on down to John Adams Tower, entrench yourself in some heavy studying, a great movie, or a warm bed and wait for the inevitable: a most unwelcome fire alarm. Welcome to my life and the lives of the other 500 students who live in John Adams.

There is little else that can ruin what has the potential to be a nice day than an early-hours siren, coupled with strobe lights, a long trudge down stairs, cold weather, and then fighting with everyone else in the building for a chance to take the elevator back up to your floor when the alarm stops.

John Adams has suffered no fewer than five fire alarms this semester, only one of which was the required fire drill. According to the Amherst Fire Department, the other four were caused by a malfunctioning dryer in the dormitory. The dryer (which a resident assistant told me was located on the 14th floor of the building) releases too much moisture into the air, which eventually gets into the hallway adjacent to the laundry room and sets the alarm off.

The fire alarms are a huge inconvenience. Hundreds of students are forced to evacuate the building every time the dryer goes on the fritz, completely disrupting their lives.

Not only that, but the Amherst Fire Department must respond to every alarm as if it were a real fire emergency. This is a costly process in terms of both money and manpower.

> For the four non-drill alarms that have gone off this semester, this means that at least $2,400 that could have been spent by the school to the benefit of students in order to fix the problem is instead being put on the town for essentially nothing.

"On average, if one costed out a fire alarm response it would be in the $600-700 range," said Amherst Fire Chief Keith Hoyle.

For the four non-drill alarms that have gone off this semester, this means that at least $2,400 that could have been spent by the school to the benefit of students in order to fix the problem is instead being put on the town for essentially nothing.

It is downright ridiculous that such a small problem should represent such a huge inconvenience, not only for the hundreds of students and resident staff living in John Adams, but for the Amherst Fire Department and the town of Amherst as a whole.

"Housing Services needs to correct this situation, I assume by putting pressure on the vendor to properly vent the units," said Chief Hoyle.

I'm not one to think I know a thing about the complications within administration and the sheer amount of red tape required to get things done on campus. Yet I look around and I see new dorms, a new dining commons, a new walkway around the library, and work being done to the Student Union. Clearly someone around here knows how to get things accomplished for UMass. To that one person I beseech: the dryer situation in John Adams needs to be resolved immediately. I don't think I can take one more fire alarm this semester without losing my mind, and I'm sure most of the other residents of John Adams feel the same way. New buildings are nice and all, but not at the cost of maintaining the older buildings.

UMASS.EDU

Students in John Adams keep having to leave their rooms, but for reasons more annoying than a fire drill.

I really don't think it necessary to wait for yet another fire alarm to go off in order to finally do something about the problem. The people in John Adams have been inconvenienced enough. To allow the problem to continue without taking action is just further proof that the administrators at UMass are more concerned with bringing new students into the University for the future (meaning more money for them) than with taking care of the current population at present.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR

AN IMPORTANT WEEKEND

You can feel the momentum building again with UMass sports. The Men's Lacrosse team under coach Greg Cannella has been nationally ranked and amazingly want all the way to NCAA Championship game.

Softball had a great run in the NCAA and advanced to their first-ever Super Regional. UMass took national runner-up Northwestern to a final game of their three-game series. Coach Elaine Sortino prepares her team well by participating in early season tournaments against perennial powerhouse teams from the sun belt.

The Hockey team, under Coach Don Cahoon, has become tremendously competitive and nationally ranked.

Men's Basketball under new coach, Travis Ford, after an undefeated pra-season, is now 6-1 with the only loss coming at the hands of Pittsburgh, one of the top five teams in the nation. You can sense the improvement and momentum with the basketball program at UMass.

Football, under coach, Don Brown, has again come to national prominence, 3rd ranked nationally in Division I-AA. Football now has a record of 11-1, they are Atlantic 10 Champions and their only loss was to Division I-A Navy, in a game that UMass thoroughly outplayed them. The UMass team is now involved in the Division I-AA Championship play-offs, having won their first game last Saturday against Lafayette.

In honesty, the only missing element is fan support, at least to the extent that it should be with such competitive and exciting teams. Many can recall what fun and excitement there was for all of us during the 1996 run toward the Final Four in Men's Basketball and the 1998 National Championship in football. You could see and sense the excitement by not only all the students, but the local townspeople, people throughout western Mass and throughout the state. It was not unusual to see UMass shirts and jackets on kids and people throughout the state. It was a time of fun, excitement, and pride.

Part of the student experience at college is in supporting and attending school sports. These experiences will be remembered throughout life, particularly when your team has national prominence and the potential of being the best in the nation. This Saturday, UMass Football hosts New Hampshire in the 2nd round of the NCAA play-offs. This year's UMass team has even better balance, and certainly a better defense than the team that won the national championship in 1998. You will have a chance to see David Ball, wide receiver from New Hampshire who broke Jerry Rice's NCAA record for touchdowns. All of this right here in our "back yard" at UMass.

This is an appeal to students, local towns people, alumni, and to all residents of western Mass. Attend this Saturday's football game. This can be a beginning toward showing our support for the great coaching and student athletes at UMass.

A DIFFERENT POINT OF VIEW

In response to Wednesday's column "Having eyes does not mean you can see: Think about different perspectives," by columnist Greg Collins, I would agree, it seems that fascism is definitely an alternative on this campus.

Collins describes the protests against hate speech and those who support them as "hypocritical" and "disturbing." Collins criticizes liberals for stifling free speech, and points to the recent visits by a racist Israeli reporter and a Fascist professor as examples. The professor in question, Mike Adams, is a virulent racist and, if you check out his Web site, dradams.org, the first thing you see is Adams proudly brandishing a gun.

He is fine with saying that all Muslims are terrorists and deserve to be blown up, that every undocumented immigrant should have their "undocumented a" tossed out of the country," that affirmative action should be scrapped, etc.

I don't think the question is whether or not UMass is too left-wing. We should be asking how this Neo-Nazi could be invited to speak on our campus. The International Socialist Organization was not being rude when they interrupted him. They're just not polite to racism and sexism in general.

A man who collects guns and rants on about how all Muslims blow up people and gang-rape women should not be allowed anywhere near an academic institution, or anywhere else for that matter. Collins writes that the purpose of the speech was to talk about how Conservative opinions were being stifled in college campuses. If that was the case, why was it provocativaly titled "How to make friends and irritate feminists"?

Collins is wrong to believe that these kinds of protests against hate speech are hypocritical. It's not about alternative points of view or different politics. These are all the values we are taught to respect and fight for. There is no place in UMass for hate.

Worshiping false idols

Kaitlyn Silva

As I sit in my dorm room late at night and sit myself in front of the television, I flip through the channels and eventually reach MTV. Jessica Simpson's face blinds me as she squeals, "Oh my gawd," I continue surfing and come across a celebrity gossip show where hosts are discussing Paris Hilton's latest scandal. I throw up in my mouth a little bit and change the channel as fast as humanly possible.

I see Jay Leno on the screen and decide to watch. My sense of sanity vanishes moments later when I see his guest, Lindsay Lohan sits opposite of Jay and sighs about the paparazzi constantly reporting about her nightlife; she's 20 years old, of course she's going to party. Are you kidding me?

I'd like to think that I'm not the only person who shudders at the state of the country every time I see these women, along with a few others, disgrace my television set. They're beautiful at first, with every inch of their body tanned to perfection, their hair curled and sprayed with care, their face painted with just the right amount of make-up, and the necessary raunchy excuse for an outfit, just to remind everyone exactly how enormous their (possibly fake) breasts are. While every gossip-worthy "it" girl has their own variation, this seems to stand as the basic formula.

The brilliance of their appearance is striking until they open their mouths to give an interview. The string of idiotic questions and commentary that follow are often horrific enough to make any fourth-grade student cringe. These gorgeous women, who have found marginal success singing songs that they did not write and performing in films that are of little merit, are speaking as if they've only managed an elementary school education.

It's impossible to imagine that these A-list celebrities are genuinely as uneducated as they act. Chances are they were never anywhere near the top of their class, but their words and actions just seem too calculated to be realistic. A look of confusion never crosses their face before they give an answer. Instead, we see the cheery grin of feigned uncertainty followed by the expulsion of several vapid sentences. After that comes a bubbly giggle.

They have pretty faces, but they're as dumb as can be. Through their good looks and thoughtless actions, they relay a message to their fans: Being an airhead makes you adorable.

While you'd think this message would only affect a more vulnerable, younger generation and be ignored by college-age adults, this is not the case. Just take a look around campus. It won't take you long to find someone chatting away on their cell phone in hyper-speed. "Oh my gosh. And he was like... and then I was like 'Whatever.'" Not to mention the one girl in every dorm who acts as if she's had a portion of her brain removed every time she speaks to the attractive guy who lives down the hall.

I'm not suggesting that these students aren't completely vapid all on their own, but it's easy to be influenced when the sexy starlet they see on television gets attention while acting the exact same way. The students with the same attitudes as these oblivious celebrities are the ones who are likely to buy their music, clothing and movies. Sadly, the sales fuel the celebrity's popularity, creating a circle that continuously embraces vapidity and ignorance.

> Through their good looks and thoughtless actions, they relay a message to their fans: Being an airhead makes you adorable.

Are all fans of Paris Hilton mindless giggling fools? No, but by idolizing a spoiled rich heiress that once asked, "Wal-mart… do they make walls there?" they're not exactly rooting for intellectual thought.

Some could call my reaction to these women and their lack of intelligence jealousy. I assure you that it's not. There are plenty of female celebrities out there who are much more attention-worthy than these mentioned above. They have poise, charisma, and knowledge. They're also smoking hot.

Beyoncé Knowles and Angelina Jolie, for instance, counteract the growing stupidity trend and prove that women can be both smart and sexy. While the paparazzi still covers them, they're not asking for attention by stumbling down the streets of Los Angeles drunk. They're known for their talents rather than their uncontrolled behavior. Shouldn't we all be so lucky?

Why do we give a hopeless ditz with a pretty face love and adoration? Why do we read about their lives in the tabloids and stare as they play dumb during an interview? We should be turning our heads in disgust. While they are pretty, their personalities are nothing to be admired. Chances are you would not want your sister, cousin or niece to turn out like one of these stupid girls, so why admire them?

America needs a new image to endorse – the image of a woman that is independent and intellectual, a women who will not dumb herself down just for the attention. It's time to bring the smart girl back.

Paris fashion collection comes to Boston

By Krista Cosco
Collegian Correspondent

The Museum of Fine Arts in Boston is currently holding a fashion exhibit that will last until March 18, 2007. The event features clothing from designers such as Christian Dior, Valentino and Chanel, to name a few. The show is a collection of pieces from influential designers' recent season's lines.

There are 10 designers whose designs are being featured: Yamamoto Yohji, Viktor and Rolf, Hussein Chalayan, Maison Martin Margiela, Rochas for Olivier Theyskens, Azzedine Alaia, John Galliano for Christian Dior, Valentino, Karl Lagerfeld for Chanel and Christian Lacroix. Exhibited are ready-to-wear designs and haute couture dresses, which is French for "high sewing" and refers to handmade, made-to-measure attire.

An haute couture dress can cost several thousands of dollars up to $200,000 for an elaborate dress, especially for a wedding. These dresses and clothes that can be sold in stores and are not made to measure, called ready-to-wear.

They were exhibited by designers who displayed flawless craftsmanship of the articles. Each designer's exhibit was visually stunning. From a Chanel ostrich feathered dress that took 980 hours to make to a Marie Antoinette styled Dior leather ensemble, one would have to see to believe.

New 'Call of Duty' tanks competition

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

According to the television, it's time for the holidays. While nature disagrees, we get 60-degree freebies after Thanksgiving, along with the constant reminder that video game season has entered full swing. The sight of that tiny man with the futuristic machine gun unloading into the giant robot-alien has been commonplace recently. They're out there, and if you know about Wiis and PS3s, not to mention something about an Xbox 360, then that image is probably ingrained in your skull. This December, next generation consoles, meet Generation X.

Last year, the definitive successor to the first-person WWII shooter legacy was Activisions' "Call of Duty 2." This season brings the third installment to the series, complete with marked improvements in aesthetics and minor alterations to the gameplay. If you liked killing scores of Nazis last year, chances are "Call of Duty 3" will once again satisfy.

Graphics

Infinity Ward, the original developers of the franchise, passed the reigns to Treyarch, in order to get a head start on the fourth Call of Duty. Visually speaking, Treyarch produced nothing short of a masterpiece. The first game in the series to be entirely designed for the Xbox 360's capabilities, cutting-edge eye candy is abundant. Particle effects and dynamic lighting allow rising smoke to mingle with rays of sunshine through holes in a bombed out ceiling. Changing focus between short and long distances in succession produces an uncanny blurring effect, while long blades of grass move independently in the wind. The level of detail in every object is truly remarkable.

Sound

Explosions, ricochets, echoes – they all do the graphics justice. Outstanding digital audio definitely adds to the intensity of war. While verbal commands and sound bytes get repetitive, hearing frantic German voices around the bend never gets old.

Gameplay

Adding more vehicles to the single player campaign mode allows for a nice change of pace. Additionally, Treyarch implemented an entirely new physics engine that allows for destructible environments, so that box you're hiding behind may not be there in another 30 seconds. "Branching mission paths" allow for a sense of freedom as the player decides which route is most appropriate to accomplish the task at hand.

Despite looking and sounding fantastic, CD3 had more noticeable flaws than CD2. While you can survive grenade blasts mere feet away, jumping over a chair or short wall can be frustratingly problematic. Fellow computer soldiers will endlessly fire at the enemy through a ceiling or wall, and dead bodies at times mysteriously float in space.

Multiplayer

CD2 was the most played game on Xbox live last year, and this time around they have made improvements. Class-based game play and larger maximums on team size mean more fun for online players.

"Call of Duty 3" takes place in the weeks following the allied invasion of Normandy, as you participate in American, British, Canadian, and Polish campaigns. The Canadian and Polish campaigns are a nice change of pace, but there is really little emotional investment in the characters as you bounce around from campaign to campaign. Furthermore, all fighting takes place in France and culminates in the liberation of Paris, so there is no major change in scenery as there was in previous installments.

The overriding feel of "Call of Duty 3" is the same as its predecessors. The controls are identical, as is the tactic and style of the single player mode. While there were next-generation steps in aesthetics and minor additions in the gameplay, the fun factor may have taken a step back. With the genre getting flat and overdone, there seems to be a lot of "going through the motions" for the player, while bugs and hiccups offset the brilliance of the graphics and sound. At the end of the day, if you liked "Call of Duty 2," the third one will occupy too much of your time.

Only a year after the release of 'Call of Duty 2' Treyarch productions has released a third installment of the video game. CD3 is a masterpiece for Microsoft XBox 360, taking full advantage of the systems graphics.

Women Center always there to help

Teresa Reilly
Collegian Staff

Women of all ages, races and ethnicities with problems ranging from sexual assault to making it through school are welcome at the Everywoman's Center. The center is located in the basement of Wilder Hall at the University of Massachusetts Amherst and has been helping women from the community for the past 34 years.

"Right now, during the holidays, is a big time for us because survivors of sexual assault have to go home for the holidays," said Marianne Winters, who has been the director of the Everywoman's Center for the past six months.

For most students, the upcoming winter break is a great vacation. However, for other college students, who were abused by family members, they are forced to pack their belongings and head back to a potentially uncomfortable environment.

"One of our first steps is to make sure that the victim is safe," said Winters, describing the actions the center takes when first meeting a new survivor.

The center will foremost create a safety plan that may include helping any victim figure out living situations if need be.

The center is completely confidential and the volunteers there know the steps to take when dealing with sexual assault victims. If the assault is within five days it is possible to prevent pregnancy, if that is the wish of the victim.

Winters says that she always recommends a medical examination and she will even send an advocate with the survivor in order to make it a more comfortable experience. If victims choose to press charges, advocates will be sent with them to the police station as well.

Support groups and counseling are available for all women in the community to take advantage of. Support groups for women of sexual assault, women who have bipolar disorder and even groups for women who are stressed are available through the center. Private counseling sessions are also offered. If a victim isn't able to make it down to the center, the hotline is always an option.

According to Winters, roughly 200 new people call into the hotline every year in regards to sexual assault.

"Not all the callers come into the center; some we are able to help just over the phone," said Winters.

The hotline operates 24 hours a day so that there is always someone available to any survivor in the Hampshire County who is in need.

"We have people call who were sexually assaulted 40 years ago and just had a bad dream," said Winters.

Another large aspect of the center is violence prevention.

"I recently did training with the police to help them handle victims of sexual assault," said Winters. "We do training with any professionals who may come into contact with survivors."

The Educator/Advocate Program sends out volunteers to hang up bulletin boards and talk to classes and dorms about violence prevention. The program allows students to become active in helping out peers in the community.

In 2004, there were over 207,000 sexual assaults reported, according to the Bureau of Justice's 2004 National Victimization Survey. Of the victims, 203,000 were women, and 96 percent of the offenders were male.

While women have the higher amount of sexual assaults reported in the country, men are still victims, according to Winters.

"We want to involve men in this work," said Winters. "We want men to understand that they have a role."

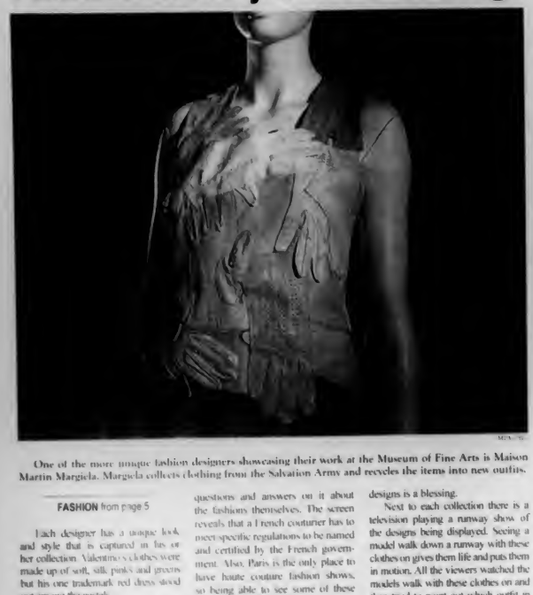
According to the National Center for Injury Prevention and Control, "female students are more likely than male students to report sexual assault."

While the center's main focus is on helping sexual assault victims and preventing future crimes, it also offers opportunities for women to come talk about everyday problems they may have.

"We had a couple of women come in the other day and talk about their problem with the buses," said Winters.

The center is open Monday, Wednesday and Friday from 9 a.m. to 2 p.m. and Tuesdays and Thursdays from 12 p.m. to 4 p.m. Support groups run at various times throughout the month, and more information is available at the center's Web site, www.umass.edu/ewc.

Fashion is not just for wearing



One of the more unique fashion designers showcasing their work at the Museum of Fine Arts is Maison Martin Margiela. Margiela collects clothing from the Salvation Army and recycles the items into new outfits.

Each designer has a unique look and style that is captured in his or her collection. Valentino's clothes were made up of soft, silk pinks and greens but his one trademark red dress stood out among the pastels.

Among the most eclectic and interesting designs was that of Maison Martin Margiela who recycles old clothing from the Salvation Army to assemble his new fashions. On display was a waistcoat made entirely out of bottle caps and a jacket created out of a seat cushion.

Also on display is the black and white, animal fur designs of Azzedine Alaia, who shows a white Mongolian goat fur dress. These are just a few examples, but every exhibit in the show brings a different feel and a different recreation of what fashion really is.

The haute couture dresses cost thousands of dollars and are hand made. The detail in these dresses is amazing and the exhibit gives one an appreciation for both the designer and his or her work. At the end of the collection there is a large screen with questions and answers on it about the fashions themselves. The screen reveals that a French couturier has to meet specific regulations to be named and certified by the French government. Also, Paris is the only place to have haute couture fashion shows, so being able to see some of these designs is a blessing.

Next to each collection there is a television playing a runway show of the designs being displayed. Seeing a model walk down a runway with these clothes on gives them life and puts them in motion. All the viewers watched the models walk with these clothes on and then tried to point out which outfit in front of them was being modeled. It was a nice touch to see the clothes displayed and modeled at the same time. Audience members have the chance to feel like they are in Paris at an haute couture fashion show, but can still see the designs up close.

The Museum of Fine Arts "Fashion Show: Paris Collection 2006" will run until March 18, 2007 and costs $21 for students. Tickets are available online at the Museum of Fine Arts Web site. The show lasts for about half an hour and there is a fashion show store outside of the exhibit for souvenirs. For fashion lovers or those interested in the art of design, the collection is beautiful and interesting. They will learn a ton about high fashion and get to see some famous designers' work up close and personal.

NEW YORK DAILY NEWS

A couple of new developments in the TV world suggest we're moving ever closer to the time when we viewers can become our own program directors watching what we want when we want.

Sounds like Nirvana, huh?

Or maybe not.

But we may have less and less choice about it.

What's hurtling us toward this new world is, naturally, the Internet, which has the flexibility traditional media lacks.

A television station sends out one signal at a time. At 9 p.m. EST on Sundays, ABC towers transmit "Desperate Housewives." They can't also send out "Grey's Anatomy."

The Internet has no such constraints. ABC puts "Desperate Housewives" on the Web and a viewer can watch it anytime, whether or not someone else has clicked on McDreamy.

Time-shifting became an increasingly significant part of the TV world back when someone finally invented a VCR that viewers could operate. TiVo and its cousins have simplified that process further, and today a growing part of the TV-watching world stores its shows and watches them when it's convenient, not when they're "on."

TV fought this for a while, but now has decided to work with it. Networks are making more shows available over the Net. MTV offers videos over the Net, and movies-on-demand services are thriving.

Meanwhile, a survey by the Project for Excellence in Journalism found the best coverage of this month's elections wasn't on networks' broadcasts, but their Web sites.

The main reason was that the Web sites offer almost unlimited data all the time. If you didn't want to wait for the on-air anchor or the crawl to update you on the Virginia Senate race, you could get that update on the Web site with a click.

All this has a number of implications. Because watching TV shows on a computer screen can be annoying, look for it to become easier and more common to hook computers into TV sets.

Look, too, for traditional media to offer more content without shaping its use. Just as iPod users choose which songs they want on their "station," TV viewers can choose from a menu of news or entertainment.

The problem is that the novelty can wear off when viewers realize they may now have to devote more time to TV, not less.

Just as music fans must keep up with new sounds and download them into iPods, TV watchers must now find their own hour for Gaby and Carlos. One suspects some will find it easier to let ABC keep doing it.

For the foreseeable future, ABC surely will. But a story Monday out of Great Britain reported that some officials are already discussing the idea of eventually discontinuing the AM and FM radio bands, figuring at some point most listeners will receive that programming through alternative means anyhow.

The tech train keeps rolling.

Wildcats coming to McGuirk

40-25-3.

Leading up to that game in early November, there was much emphasis placed on UNH's offense, and with good reason. The Wildcats boast one of the best in the nation. The duo of Santos and wide receiver David Ball was the focus of all the talk.

This time Brown wants it the other way around.

"The one thing that gets overlooked in our scenario is our offense is pretty good," he said. "I get my hair up a little bit because we're pretty good on offense too."

UMass possesses the 19th-ranked total offense in Division I-AA. UNH is No. 6 on the list of 116 schools. The Minutemen check in with 374.83 yards per game as a team.

Senior running back Steve Baylark has a lot to do with that number. This season, the A-10 named Baylark the Co-Offensive Player of the Year – he shares the honor with Santos.

The running game is a staple of the UMass offense. Brown has no problem riding his workhorse when the situation calls for tough yards. Baylark posted his fourth-straight 1,000-yard season in 2006, joining just three other I-AA runners: Georgia Southern's Adrian Peterson (1998-01), UNH's Jerry Azumah (1995-98) and Hampton's Alonzo Coleman (2003-06).

Baylark has rushed for 1,460 yards this season with 12 touchdowns. He began the year splitting time with Matt Lawrence and Tim Washington in the backfield, but Brown has used Baylark as the featured back since he ran for 104 against Villanova earlier in the season.

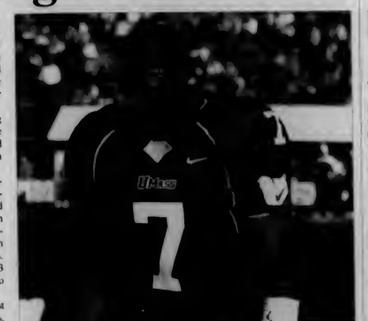
With Baylark and the running game averaging 175 yards per game as a team, passing lanes have opened up to sophomore quarterback Liam Coen this season.

The A-10 named Coen to the All-Conference third team at the conclusion of the season. He's completed 157-of-240 passes this season. Coen has completed passes to 15 different receivers, including touchdown passes to seven separate receivers. In all, the sophomore has posted 23 touchdowns this season, compared to just five interceptions.

Coen's pick against Lafayette last Saturday was his first in five games, dating back to Towson on Oct. 14.

His favorite target is Brandon London. The 6-foot-5 wideout has been on the receiving end of 37 passes this season for 630 yards – the Minuteman with the next highest yardage total is JJ. Moore with 422.

"We may not do it as flashy, but we're equally as effective [as UNH]," Brown said. "I'm a firm believer in physical yards. And when you can't make physical yards I think that's going to haunt you at some point in time."



Senior safety James Ihedigbo was in on four tackles and had 1.5 sacks in UMass' 28-20 win over New Hampshire on Nov. 4.

UMass has to be perfect in rematch

when all hell broke loose."

UNH senior wideout David Ball caught his first touchdown pass of the game at the 6:50 mark of the third quarter and the Wildcats added another field goal before the fourth. It was 28-13 UMass at the beginning of the fourth, but Santos wasn't done.

"They got the big-name guys and rightfully so because those guys are great football players," Coen said. "I hadn't really got to see Ricky [Santos] and Dave [Ball] play before last year. They had good numbers and stuff, but they are great football players. They're the best around."

Ball wasn't finished after his first TD reception. Santos hit his favorite receiver for another strike with 6:48 left in the fourth to bring the Wildcats within eight at 28-20.

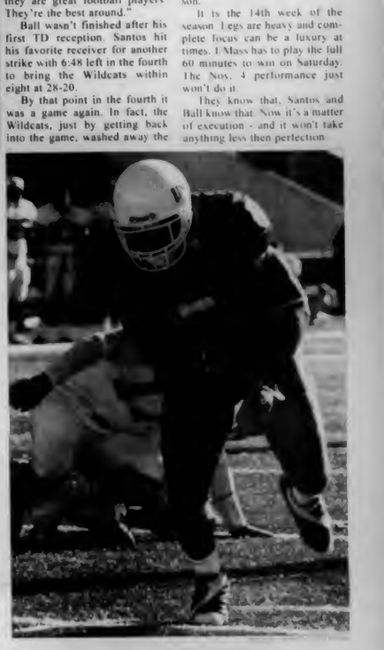
By that point in the fourth it was a game again. In fact, the Wildcats, just by getting back into the game, washed away the statement that UMass made with its dominance in the first half.

"I look at that game and I think that there are two things that have been forgotten," Brown said. "Santos throws the ball and it goes off of the slot's hands and Sean Smalls gets two hands on the ball and all he has to do is [grab it] and he's going to be 70 yards for a touchdown because he's the only guy between him and the posts.

"Then we don't focus and catch the ball and they go in and score. You never know when one of those scenarios is going to cost you a football game. One play could ruin the whole season."

It is the 14th week of the season. Legs are heavy and complete focus can be a luxury at times. UMass has to play the full 60 minutes to win on Saturday. The Nov. 4 performance just won't do it.

They know that. Santos and Ball know that. Now it's a matter of execution - and it won't take anything less than perfection.



Senior running back Steve Baylark has 12 rushing touchdowns this season. He has ran for 1,460 yards and averages 121.7 yards per game.

Senior running back Steve Baylark is in his fourth straight 1,000-yard rushing season.

UMass football attracts fans' attention

BY JEREMY RICE
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This Saturday, McGuirk Stadium will be filled with screaming fans that hail from every direction. On top of the students in attendance, fans will be arriving from as far as Vermont, and as close as down the street in Amherst.

One thing is certain, however UMass fans are excited about their football team again. At 11-1, the Minutemen have earned their best record in years, and have turned heads that haven't been focused on this team in just as long.

Sure, the locals and the students have always cheered for the Maroon and White, but now everyone and everyone they know is jumping on the UMass football bandwagon at just the right time.

Seth Sibley, a Greenfield, Mass. native and a senior at UMass, attended the game against Hofstra on Nov. 18, his first since sophomore year. He hopes to make it to the game Saturday as well.

"I've talked to a couple of friends outside of UMass [about the team]," Sibley said. "They didn't realize how well the team was doing. They actually came back for the Lafayette game last week."

Sarah Weisner has lived in Amherst her entire life. She attended high school in Amherst, graduated from UMass and currently works in Memorial Hall for Development. When the Gold's Gym on University Drive was still a supermarket, Weisner worked there on Saturdays, and could hear the cheers coming from McGuirk Stadium every Saturday afternoon.

Of course, she will be at the game Saturday, but so will many of her friends who are returning to Amherst to see their team.

"My friends who I grew up with have been saying, 'Oh they're doing well again'," Weisner said. "They're doing awesome, and everybody's really happy. The lacrosse team [came close] last year, but we haven't had a national championship in a while. Athletics always brings out the local pride."

While the success of the Minutemen has brought back the casual fans, the die-hard fanatics are riding an emotional high similar to what the players themselves must be feeling.

Dick Raymo has been a fan of UMass football since his alma mater, Vermont, dropped its program. He has become an avid UMass sports fan since the days of Marcus Camby and the basketball team's Final Four run. He is as excited for the game on Saturday as he has been in his years as a fan.

"I'm very excited about this weekend, [but] I'm nervous about it," Raymo said. "My wife and I will be here for both basketball and football. We're spending the night down at the Hampton Inn."

He has even made friends with a number of the players personally during his travels. He makes his trip from Vermont to Amherst three times a week. On Tuesday, Raymo drives down to attend Chancellor John Lombardi's class on the history of college sports. On Wednesday, he attends the sports luncheon, where he rubs elbows with the coaches and watches film of last Saturday's football game. Then on Saturday, he and his wife come to support the Minutemen at McGuirk.

"I am into this school, I really am," said Raymo. "I think the world of [UMass]. I get the warm fuzzies when I think of UMass athletics right now. This year is going to be a nice year, but watch out next year. It's going to be even better."

One word that seems to be on the tip of every football fan's tongue is balance. Comparisons have been made to the 1998 team that won the national championship behind running back Marcel Shipp, and everyone seems to agree that the 2006 squad is the more balanced group of the two.

"I feel this team plays more as a unit," said Weisner. "The '98 team was more about individuals."

Another Sports Luncheon regular, Hank Tomkowicz, had similar feelings about the game. A native of Adams, Mass., Tomkowicz is a season ticket holder and has been a fan of UMass athletics for years.

"They're obviously a little different. I would say this team plays a little more defense," said Tomkowicz. "I guess they could go all the way too. A lot of the times it's breaks and turnovers, so you never know. Hopefully the crowd will be behind them and they'll move onto Montana or maybe get [Southern] Illinois at home."

"I don't think we're soft in any one area," said Raymo. "I think this team is more balanced than the '98 [National Championship] club."

Raymo had the boldest prediction this week in claiming that New Hampshire would be UMass' biggest obstacle in the entire tournament.

"I think if we get by New Hampshire, we go all the way," Raymo said. "I have the greatest respect for the coach. I think coach Brown has a team with a great deal of chemistry, and I think if the chemistry is there, then the pride is there. They're very focused, and I credit him for that."

First postseason meeting between rivals to be one for the ages

Rob Greenfield

New Hampshire and Massachusetts. The two best teams from the Atlantic 10 North (one of them being the conference champ) meet in the quarterfinals of the Division I-AA postseason tournament Saturday.

This is the first time that these two rivals have met in the postseason, I've.

The normal routine is one game a year, and this is the also the first time that UNH and UMass have played each other twice in one season.

Think about that one for a second. Two teams in close proximity with location and talent have never met twice in one season and have never met in the playoffs.

Here's a little history for you.

In 1978, the first year of the I-AA postseason – I-AA was just Division II before the Minutemen made it to the finals (there was only two rounds so it wasn't uber-impressive) before losing to Florida A&M, 35-28.

Since then, UMass has made it to the postseason seven times. Before the 2000 season, the most recent appearance came in 2003 when Colgate ended the Minutemen's season with a 19-7 victory.

In the last three years, UMass has fallen short of the playoffs. Last year, the Minutemen entered a regular season matchup with the Wildcats at a 6-1 pace and headed toward the postseason. But UNH derailed the Minutemen in a heartbreaking 34-28 defeat, and UMass lost two out of its next three games to miss the playoffs.

"They knocked us out and kept us from getting into the playoffs last year," UMass running back Steve Baylark said. "This is definitely a time to prove that we should have been there last year in the playoffs but it's also a game where you have to prove yourself in the A-10.

"[UNH] made it to the playoffs last year but they didn't finish it off so we're trying to be the better team from the A-10 and represent the A-10. With the team we got this year it's definitely the team to represent UMass."

The Wildcats are as good as advertised. They have made it to the playoff quarterfinals in the last three years and have been the annual Atlantic 10 representative in the NCAA playoffs.

This year, however, the Minutemen enter the playoffs as the favorite from their own conference. The Wildcats slid by Hampton in the first round with a 41-38 win and now travel to McGuirk for a historic rematch that will not disappoint.

In 2004, the Minutemen used the Wildcats as a trampoline, defeating them 38-21 on the road and winning three out of their last four games to finish the season. Brown, who took over the UMass reigns from Mark Whipple in 2004, cites that game as a launching pad for his program. The Minutemen have gone 22-6 since.

"It's probably the day we all bought in and moved on," Brown said, referring to the 2004 victory over UNH. "We were down 14-0, too, and had to come back and play really well in all phases."

Now the Minutemen have UNH again, and the stakes are the highest yet. David Ball, the career touchdown receptions leader for Division I-AA, and Ricky Santos – the conference's annual passing leader – are at the top of their games.

The Wildcats spread the ball out against the Minutemen in the second half of the Nov. 4 matchup and scored 17 unanswered points in the second half before time ran out. UMass will have to come up with a colossal effort and a flawless game plan to stump the offense again.

If the Wildcats start to roll, then Liam Coen and the UMass guns will have to start firing fast. But Coen believes that his guys can hang with the high-flying act.

"We have a very well-rounded offense," Coen said. "If we have to run the ball 40 times or throw the ball 40 times, and that hasn't happened. We feel comfortable doing either of those things because of the guys that we have around us."

Whichever team wins, Saturday will be a fun day. There is too much emotion and too much talent on both sides of the ball for it not to be a close game. UMass' seniors have been "frightening" with their execution over the last two weeks, according to Brown, and Santos and Ball don't want to see their careers end in UMass country.

So let the battle begin. Safety James Ihedigbo, Baylark, wideout Brandon London and lineman John Hatchell – among others – will suit up for their last matchup with UNH.

They will run faster and harder then they ever have before. It is the biggest game of their careers, as it is for most everyone on the UMass sideline. Santos and Ball have just one 60-minute session left to prove their worth against the Minutemen.

The stars will align on opposite sidelines and only one team will emerge victorious. Either way, it will be a good show.

See you there.

'One game at a time' mentality for UMass

Junior Alisha Tatham is shooting a team-high 60 percent from the field throughout the first six games of the season. She ranks fourth on the team in scoring with 7.5 points per game.

By Domenic Poli
Collegian Staff

A five-game winning streak – and one of the best starts to a season in Massachusetts women's basketball history – came to an end after the Minutewomen (5-1) found themselves on the receiving end of an 86-61 whooping at the hands of South Florida (6-0) on Sunday.

The Maroon and White now looks to start a brand-new winning streak when it hosts the Wagner University Seahawks (1-4) tonight at the Mullins Center at 7 p.m.

UMass coach Marnie Dacko has stressed, however, that she is trying to get her team to focus not on streaks, but rather on approaching each game as it comes.

"We're trying to take to a philosophy of, 'Let's take it one game at a time,'" Dacko said. "We have to be able to come out ready. I'm concerned just with how we are mentally going to come out. We don't want to have a letdown from losing to South Florida and come in and play a lower level of basketball.

"We learned a lot [in Sunday's loss]," she added. "We learned a lot about who we are, and we learned a lot about what we have to do. We have to be able to make layups and we have to be able to make free throws. We got to the line 35 times and we missed 17 free throws and we missed 16 layups. We've got to be able to go in with authority and score."

Dacko mentioned that her team needs to bring high intensity to the Mullins Center if it wants to beat Wagner, which has given teams like La Salle a run for its money.

Two players who will likely supply much of that necessary intensity are sisters Tamara and Alisha Tatham.

The siblings from Brampton, Ontario, combined for 56 points in the Best Western Roundball Classic last weekend with Tamara scoring 34 and Alisha registering 22.

Tamara, the team's lone senior, started off her final year at UMass somewhat quietly and Dacko was concerned about when she would finally hit her stride. In the last two and a half weeks, however, she has turned things around. Over the last four games she has scored 48 points, 36 total rebounds and 8 assists.

"Tamara's capable of a double-double every game," Dacko said. "She's very athletic, probably one the most athletic kids we have on our team. And, for her, it's just coming out of her shell and being ready to go, and I was happy to see her perform so well [last weekend]. I'm very happy with what she brings to the table."

Tamara is currently third on the team with 55 points this season.

Alisha, the younger of the Tatham sisters, continues to improve with every game and often combines with Tamara for an excellent one-two punch.

She has racked up 22 points, 12 boards and nine assists in the same four games.

"Alisha is doing some great things. She actually got us back in the Stephen F. Austin game [last Friday] when we were down 12 and she did a great job against South Florida," Dacko said. "We just have to get her to limit her turnovers."

Alisha is 10 points behind Tamara on the Minutewomen's list with 45, which is good enough for fourth on the team.

Dacko is also looking for big things from the Maroon and White's fifth-leading scorer – 5-foot-5 freshman point guard Kim Benton. Despite her diminutive stature, the Springfield, Pa. native has shown a fiery, hard-nosed style of play and a three-point shot that tends to find nothing but nylon.

Benton has tallied 38 points on the year (including going 9-for-26 from behind the arc) and her coach says she has the green-light on offense.

Tatham sisters give Minutewomen a spark

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

While the Massachusetts women's basketball team fell from the ranks of the undefeated shortly after Thanksgiving, it heads into a two-game homestand against Wagner and Northeastern, looking to purge any remaining tryptophan fell over from the holiday break.

Despite sleeping through the second half against South Florida in the Best Western Roundball Classic Championship, missing 13 layups and 17 free-throws, the Minutewomen have to feel good about their 5-1 start to the season. It is their best record after six games since the 2002-2003 campaign when the Minutewomen started 8-1.

The Maroon and White should have continued success under the play of the team's lone senior, forward Tamara Tatham.

Picking up the Pace

Averaging 32.7 minutes per game to lead the team, T. Tatham is coming off her best performance of the season. In the Minutewomen's 86-61 loss at South Florida, Tatham tallied 19 points and 12 rebounds (nine offensive), for her second consecutive double-double. After starting slow in the first three games of the season (15 points), Tatham has doubled her offensive output in the last three contests, combining for 30 points. She leads the team in rebounds with 55, posting double-digits in that statistic in four of the team's six games. Her average of 9.2 boards per contest is good for second in the Atlantic 10 Conference.

UMass Basketball

Controlling the boards is nothing new for Tatham, as she led the team in rebounds last year with 6.9 per game. Last season, Tatham started 26 of 28 games and led the team with 96 turnovers. She had a personal best of one turnover on two occasions. This season, Tatham has already played one game in which she had zero turnovers, and two games where she only had one. So far this year, UMass is second in the A-10 in assist-turnover ratio with 90 and 103, respectively.

Mills Has Company

While junior forward Kate Mills has firmly established herself as a dominant player in the paint – leading the team with 12 blocks and 16.5 points per game, along with 8.0 rebounds per game (second to Tatum) – the attention she gets from opposing defenses gives the rest of the team more quality opportunities.

The Minutewomen are averaging nine more points per game than last season through the first six games, receiving a more balanced attack and relying less on Mills and junior guard Pam Rosanio to carry the load.

Junior guard Alisha Tatham leads the team in field goal percentage, shooting a robust 60 percent from the floor and averaging 7.5 points per game. Last season, the younger of the Tatham sisters averaged 4.3 points per game.

The emergence of freshman point guard Kim Benton as a real contributor to the backcourt (20.5 minutes per game) has added a significant threat on the perimeter. Benton leads the team with nine of the team's 20 three-point field goals.

Lofty Goals

UMass coach Marnie Dacko previously stated that she wants the team to make more free throws than their opponents' attempts. So far this season the Minutewomen have done just that, but could be taking advantage of the charity stripe to an even greater extent. UMass has made 110 of 167 free throw attempts, for a disappointing 66 percent. However, its opponents have only attempted 78 free throws, making 56 of those attempts. The 167 attempts are second in the A-10, and first among teams having played six games. Mills is most responsible for the weight of this statistic, leading the team with 25 points from the line on 32 attempts.

Senior forward Tamara Tatham leads UMass in rebounding with 55 total on the year. She averages 9.2 boards per game.

Prout makes UMass proud in S. Africa

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

A casual observer of the Massachusetts swimming program wouldn't be particularly impressed with sophomore Michael Prout's performance this year.

Typically swimming in long-distance freestyle events, Prout hasn't recorded a victory to this point in the season. His best finish came against Stony Brook in the first dual meet of the season when he took third in the 1,000-yard freestyle.

There are a few things about Prout that the results do not show, however.

Prout is currently away from the team taking care of something a little more important.

"Mike's in South Africa right now swimming at the Paralympic World Cup meet; it's pretty cool," UMass men's coach Russ Yarworth said. "We're all really anxious to hear from him, he hasn't contacted us yet. He's going to Brazil then to South Africa. We're waiting to see what he does; hopefully he's on track to break his world record."

In 2004, Prout won a gold medal in the 400-meter freestyle and a bronze medal in the 100-meter freestyle at the Paralympics in Athens.

Prout also holds Paralympic records in the 400-meter freestyle, 800-meter freestyle and 1,500-meter freestyle.

He has received attention from numerous media outlets for his past exploits. His trip to Africa is just another accomplishment for the West Springfield native.

Toys for Tots

The UMass Athletic Department is holding a holiday toy drive for underprivileged children.

The swimming and diving team is taking the initiative and doing everything it can to raise both money and toys for the drive. The swimmers and divers even gave some of their money allocated for food on road trips to the drive.

"We've had really good progress in the toy drive," UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb said. "Our parents have made good contributions and actually, the team gave some of their meal money to the toy fund. We're actually going out this year and buying toys."

Juniors Sam Demity and Colleen McCann are the team's Student-Athlete Advisory Council representatives. They will buy as many toys as they can with the money they raised.

"Sam, Colleen and I are probably going to go out sometime this weekend and use that money and get some more toys," Newcomb said.

The toy drive is a great way for the athletes to give back to the Amherst area around the holiday season.

Rappe's Return

Junior diving star R.J. Rappe has been out of action for more than a week after suffering an undisclosed injury once believed to be a hernia by UMass diving coach Mandy Hixon.

If the Minutemen had a head-to-head meet planned for this weekend, Rappe's return would be crucial as it would almost guarantee first place points in the diving competitions for the Minutemen.

The Minutemen are taking part in an invitational this weekend at Yale; however, Rappe's results will be a barometer of his health more than anything.

It is not known when exactly Rappe suffered the injury and even more unclear was the injury itself.

NCAA rules bar coaches from revealing exactly what an injury is anyway, but even after an examination, Hixon really didn't know what was ailing the two-time defending A-10 Diving Champion.

National Notoriety

National polls have very little bearing on the way coaches handle their teams – especially in the middle of a season.

In swimming, they are approached cautiously because the only real measuring stick of a team at the end of a season is its performance at the conference championships.

But it is always good for a team to know that its efforts are not going unnoticed. Both the UMass men's and women's swimming and diving teams know exactly how this feels.

Collegeswimming.com ranks the Minutemen eighth in its Division I Mid-Major poll – this is basically the equivalent of college football's Division I-AA.

The United States Naval Academy occupies the top spot in the poll. Considering the nature of the Navy, its success in swimming is not much of a surprise.

A-10 rival St. Bonaventure occupies the No. 9 spot behind the Minutemen.

The Minutewomen hold down the No. 22 spot in the women's poll – Harvard is No. 1. Fellow A-10 team Saint Louis is the highest-ranking A-10 squad in the poll. The Billikens are No. 7.

The UMass men's and women's swimming and diving teams have been ranked in the top 25 in the collegeswimming.com Mid-Major poll.

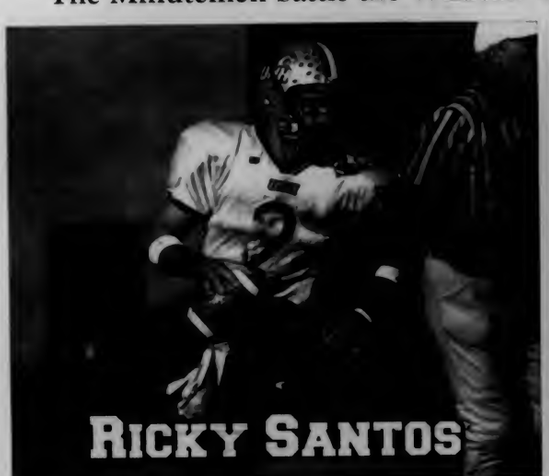
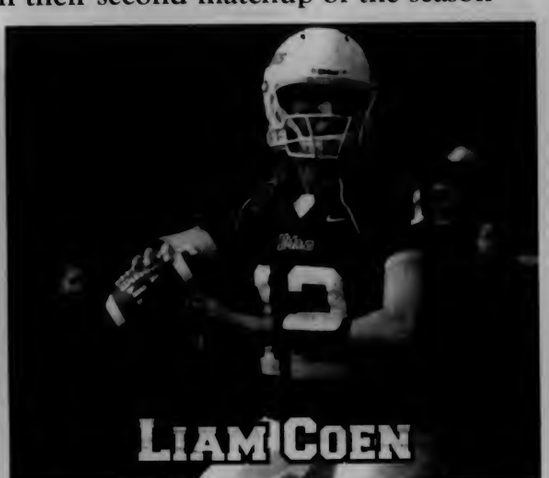
UNH vs. UMASS

The Minutemen battle the Wildcats in their second matchup of the season





UM and UNH battle

Minutemen go for season sweep vs. Wildcats

BY JON PELLAND
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's gotten to that point in the season where the Massachusetts football team will take any help it can get. This Saturday UMass squares off with New Hampshire in the quarterfinals of the Division I Football Championship.

UMass coach Don Brown says that his superstitions are starting to get the best of him. With the Minutemen's continuing success this season – they're in the midst of a school-record 10-game winning streak – Brown practices the same routine each week.

Every Thursday Brown orders the same meal, chicken tenders with honey mustard and fries. He then brings it home and sits in the same spot to eat. His son's wardrobe is one victim of Brown's superstitions this season.

"My son had left a pair of khakis, I wore them, he asked for them back and I've been wearing the khakis," Brown said with a grin, insinuating his son won't see those pants anytime soon. "You get wrapped up in all those things. It gets wacky."

But you can't blame Brown. The Minutemen (11-1) play one of their fiercest rivals on Saturday, and attempt to beat the Wildcats (9-3) for the second time this season. The first meeting between the two was dubbed one of the biggest games in Division I-AA this season, but this one is bigger.

UNH traveled to Virginia last weekend and took down Hampton, 41-38, to move on in the postseason. That win took some late-game trickery from UNH coach Sean McDonnell and the Wildcats' punt unit.

The Wildcats faced fourth down with just under seven minutes remaining and McDonnell called for the fake. The snap went directly to Evan Loring, who then pitched the ball to Maurice Duper. He carried the ball 19 yards for the first down. Junior quarterback Ricky Santos eventually pitched a 25-yard touchdown pass to Chad Kackert for the deciding points.

McDonnell is building a reputation of not being afraid to call for the fake. The Wildcats attempted one in their game against UMass on Nov. 4. Punter Matt Henry took the snap and rolled right looking for a play, but Minutemen David Burris and Wilner Alexis hauled him down for a 13-yard loss.

UMass won that game, 28-20, holding off a late-game rally by the Wildcats.

In their previous 68 meetings, UMass and UNH have never met in the postseason. The Minutemen hold the advantage in the all-time series,

UMass needs to be perfect to beat New Hampshire again

BY ROB GREENFIELD
COLLEGIAN STAFF

It's the second round and the second round – the second round of the Division I-AA postseason tournament and the second time Massachusetts and New Hampshire will match up this season.

Last time, at UNH on Nov. 4 in Durham, the Minutemen took a 21-3 lead into halftime and had a 28-3 lead in the third quarter before quarterback Ricky Santos and company stormed back and nearly tied the game.

The first half and the second half were completely different scenes. UMass looked the part of a No. 3 team and a defensive powerhouse in the first half, limiting the conference's best offense to a mere field goal.

But the Wildcats responded with a convincing finish that had the Minutemen holding onto a tenuous lead. This weekend will be difficult for UMass coach Don Brown. This is the fourth time that he has faced UNH wideout David Ball, and it's not getting any easier.

So what will Saturday's matchup be like? The first half of the Nov. 4 game, or the second half?

Brown used carousel play calling to confuse Santos and force him into bad reads in the first meeting. The Minutemen blitzed and dropped back, went zone and played man the whole package.

But, as Brown ominously anticipated, the Wildcats weren't close to finished. Santos found his rhythm in the second half and UMass quarterback Liam Coen and running back Steve Baylark put up just one touchdown in the second frame.

"I don't think our guys walked away from that game saying, 'We played great,'" Brown said. "I think they walked away feeling like, 'We didn't play our best football for 60 minutes.' And that's always your goal.

"There were a couple of things there that we just didn't do a great job of execution [in the second half]," he added. "We come right out, right down the field and score and we get it to 28-3. They'd only scored three points and you know that you're not going to get out of there with three points.

"[New Hampshire] put together a 17-play drive and score. And they earned it. As a defensive play-caller, if you make a team drive 17 snaps, then they've earned it. That's a long drive. That's making them pick their way down the field and execute all the way down the field. So they earned the drive. Then, that's

SGA votes to allocate funds for fraternity

BY SARAH SYED
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The Student Government Association of the University of Massachusetts held its fifth Senate meeting on Wednesday evening.

The first announcement repeated throughout the meeting was the return of newly elected governor, Deval Patrick, to the UMass campus. He speaks at 10:30 a.m. today at the Campus Center Auditorium.

Patrick will be discussing the five major issues concerning public higher education: funding, affordability, accessibility, faculty shortage and democratization.

His visit was organized by the Massachusetts Society of Professors (MSP), the SGA, the Graduate Employment Organization (GEO), the Graduate Student Senate (GSS) and staff unions.

Student Trustee Mishy Leiblum stressed that the UMass community should also attend the small group strategy sessions immediately following Patrick's "Higher Education Summit" at noon in the Campus Center basement.

A proposal to the Senate was also made at the meeting. Leiblum, along with fellow student coordinators, presented a proposal to the Senate to make the Student Bridges Program into a SGA Agency. According to the Mission Statement, the Student Bridges project aims to build relationships

Local Quaker group under Pentagon watch

BY NICOLE BOONJAKUAKUL
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Newly released documents have confirmed Pentagon surveillance on a local branch of a national Quaker group.

Documents requested by the national body of the American Friends Service Committee show that the organization was under government watch around the nation for organizing peaceful protest activities. The group, with the help of the American Civil Liberties Union, filed a request under the Freedom of Information Act to reveal exactly who the Pentagon was watching and why.

The FOIA documents, obtained in October, disclosed that the AFSC of Western Massachusetts was being watched as a result of anti-war actions the group organized in March 2005.

"Surveillance was triggered by actions that had to do with the truth behind military recruitment," said Jo Comeford, former program director of AFSC of Western Massachusetts. According to Comeford, who worked with AFSC WMA until this October, the organization along with several military recruitment education networks, staged a peaceful action where activists from the region gathered at military recruitment locations in Springfield, Hadley and Greenfield.

Members of the American Friends Service Committee protest in front of a federal recruitment building in Springfield. The AFSC, which promotes peace through dialogue, has been under government watch for the past several years.

"Our goal was to raise awareness in communication about the discrepancies in rhetoric of military recruitment," said Comeford. She said young people who are being recruited in the area aren't told that 57 percent of military enlistees receive no money for college after their service is completed – a fact retrieved from military databases.

"They are told what is possible, not what actually happens," she said. AFSC WMA wanted to let recruiters know that there is an organized group of people in the region hoping to tell the fuller, more complete story of military recruitment, said Comeford.

AFSC WMA seeks to empower communities to increase peace and build units through the use of education and community dialogue.

"We were in no way disparaging recruiters as individuals or bashing them in anyway. AFSC is a Quaker organization, so we're pacifists," Comeford said. "We engage in

Alpha Phi Alpha celebrates 100th year

BY LORAINE BUBIER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

This Saturday marks the 100th anniversary since the founding of Alpha Phi Alpha, the first intercollegiate black fraternity.

The District Banquet Ceremony to celebrate the anniversary will be held on Saturday, at 6 p.m. at the University of Massachusetts Campus Center.

"Our 100th year anniversary to us means a hundred years of excellence and service," says Jhovon Williams, the president of the Alpha Kappa Chapter of the fraternity. "We're proud of our history and of everything we've accomplished so far. We're proud to represent African Americans as well as mankind."

The UMass chapter of the fraternity began a week-long celebration with a movie night where the brothers watched "School Days," a film focused around the theme of stereotypes that sororities and fraternities often receive. Later this week, the fraternity will be going into Boston to join a rally in honor of Rosa Parks and black rights.

Members of Alpha Phi Alpha will be going into Springfield Saturday afternoon to tutor students from elementary school all the way to high school, a service that the members perform weekly. On Monday, the brothers plan to travel to Washington, D.C. to participate in an Affirmative Action Rally.

The fraternity has made many other contributions to the community aside from their daily services. Last year, they began the Black and Gold Scholarship Fund in honor of a past fraternity member who passed away. The fraternity often holds fundraisers to contribute to the scholarship, which will eventually be given to a UMass student.

Today, the first day of December, marks the beginning of their Black and Gold Christmas, a toy drive to raise money to contribute to the underprivileged houses of the community.

Alpha Phi Alpha, along with eight other fraternities, belong to the National Pan-Hellenic Council who own the group known as the "Divine Nine." The fraternity was announced Chapter of the Year by the council.

"The brothers that have come before me make me proud to be in it, it's a big part of who I am and where I'm from," responded Williams, when asked what he enjoys most about being a part of the Chapter.

Some of the more famous past Alphas include W.E.B. Du Bois, Thurgood Marshall, Martin Luther King Jr., Paul Robeson and John H. Johnson.

Media expert launches journalism lecture series

Media expert, Sree Sreenivasan will speak on the impact of technology in journalism on Tuesday, to launch this year's Journalism Program Lecture Series.

BY PATRICIA ROUMBAKIS
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Columbia University's new media expert, Sree Sreenivasan will launch the 2006-07 year for the Journalism Program Lecture Series of the University of Massachusetts, on Tuesday, Dec. 5, with a speech titled, "Journalism 2.0 – How Technology is Changing the Media, Journalists and Consumers."

The speech will cover the technological changes taking place in journalism today and the impact it will have on future journalists and the industry.

Sreenivasan, better known as "Sree," is a journalism professor and Dean of Students at Columbia University Graduate School of Journalism. He is the founder of sreetips.com, an Internet research site, and appears twice a week on WABC-TV in New York City. He is also a visiting professor at the Poynter Institute where his tips on using the Web can be found at poynter.org.

His work has been published in The New York Times, Rolling Stone, Business Week, Popular Science and many other publications in the United States, as well as India. Sree is also the co-founder of the South Asian Journalists Association, or SAJA.

This event is being held by the Journalism Program Lecture Series on Broadcast and the Media and is the beginning of a year-long series. This lecture series is funded by alumni David and Teena Kantor, class of 1979.

Admission for the event is free, and all are welcomed to attend. Pizza will be served before the lecture, and gift cards will also be raffled off. A reception will take place after the event.

For those who are looking for some helpful information on technology, go to Memorial Hall at 5 p.m. next Tuesday.

Firefighter claims discrimination

BY JOHN ROGERS
ASSOCIATED PRESS

LOS ANGELES — The emotional debate over whether Los Angeles should pay nearly $3 million to a black firefighter who had his meal laced with dog food by white colleagues has put the spotlight on a larger issue that often goes unmentioned: the hazing rituals that are part of a macho culture that is the firefighter's world.

Tennie Pierce, 51, sued the Fire Department in 2005 after colleagues mixed dog food into his spaghetti dinner. Pierce said he suffered retaliation for reporting the incident, verbal slurs and insults by firefighters "barking like dogs."

The case grew more complicated when photos emerged of Pierce engaging in his own pranks – smearing mustard and dumping water on restrained colleagues. He said those activities were consensual, a firehouse tradition to celebrate a promotion or retirement.

The City Council voted 11-1 earlier this month to award Pierce $2.7 million to settle his racial discrimination lawsuit. Mayor Antonio Villaraigosa took notice and vetoed the award. The council on Wednesday left intact the mayor's veto and trial was set to begin in March.

As word of the settlement and veto became heated topics on the Internet and local talk radio, critics accused Pierce of playing the "race card."

The veteran firefighter responded that his 20-year career was destroyed after he broke a code of silence and spoke out against something he believes was racially motivated and crossed the line of typical firehouse fun.

"This is wrong," an emotional Pierce said earlier this week. "If four black firemen did it to a white fireman, I would stand up."

L.A. City Council voted on Wednesday to overturn a $2.7 million settlement to Tennie Pierce, who claimed discrimination in hazing pranks.

As people took sides, sociologists and other observers said the incident has focused attention on an insular culture rarely seen outside of the firehouse.

"It's a lot like what happens in Vegas stays in Vegas," said anthropologist Jorja Leap, who teaches at UCLA's department of social welfare. "What goes on in the firehouse stays in the firehouse as

Amsterdam to shut prostitution 'windows' to public

BY TOBY STERLING
ASSOCIATED PRESS

AMSTERDAM, Netherlands — City officials say they will turn off the red lights and shutter a third of the prostitution "windows" in Amsterdam's famed Red Light District, where scantily-clad ladies of the night have beckoned customers for hundreds of years.

The move is part of a crackdown on crime in the area.

"We're not knights on a morality crusade, and this is intended to target financial crime, not prostitution per se," city spokesman Mariken Mateen said Thursday. "But we do think it will change the face of the Red Light District."

The Dutch government legalized prostitution in 2000 to make it easier to tax and regulate.

Mateen said the city was now making use of a new law to revoke brothels' licenses when it suspects operators have used them for money laundering or other illegal financial activity.

"In concrete terms (that) means that those involved won't be able to continue their businesses" after the measures takes effect on Jan. 1, the city said in a statement.

But advocacy groups for prostitutes said the move was misguided, since it will hurt the women who act as independent contractors renting space behind the windows. Brothel owners said they would appeal the decision in court.

"The biggest problem we have is with pimps on the street, not the people who own the windows," said Mariska Majoor, a former prostitute who now runs the Prostitution Information Center in the heart of the Red Light District.

"Local politicians don't understand that. Because they want to crack down on crime so badly they are acting like bulls in a china shop," she said.

"Fat" Charlie Geerts, who owns 20 buildings in the district and 60 of the windows slated for closure, said he would appeal the decision. Prosecutors cleared him of any criminal wrongdoing in September 2005.

"You're hurting a bunch of people who have nothing to do with it (crime)," he told local television station AT5.

The narrow streets near Amsterdam's center have been known as a hangout for hookers since the city was the hub of a global trading empire during the Netherlands' 17th century Golden Age.

Even before the formal legalization, prostitution in the district was tolerated by authorities and had become a major tourist attraction.

Women in lingerie stand behind the windows, tapping their fingers against the glass to attract customers, who are no longer sailors on shore leave. The area is home to runners-us popular bars, as well as brothels and sex clubs. (In some estimates, nearly a third of tourists who visit Amsterdam visit the Red Light District — most just for a peep.

The City of Amsterdam said yesterday, it is shutting down nearly one-third of the 350 prostitution "windows" in the famed red light district, as part of a crackdown on crime in the area.

But the area is a magnet for human traffickers, drug dealers and petty criminals, and Mayor Job Cohen and members of his Labor Party called for the crackdown.

Earlier, Cohen's administration earned a reputation for prudishness by barring pole dancers from a prominent nightclub and cracking down on public nudity during the city's annual Gay Pride festival.

Smaller brothels say the financial screening is unfair, because banks and reputable accountants are often unwilling to work with them, making it difficult to keep correct books.

"This is a war between the city and the real estate bosses, and it's the women who are suffering," said Metje Blaak, spokeswoman for De Rode Draad, a labor union for prostitutes.

She said she feared many prostitutes would end up working on the street, which is more dangerous and where it is more difficult to halt the spread of sexually transmitted diseases.

But city spokesman Mateen said business in the area has been in a slump and he suspected many of the prostitutes affected — around 300, given that the 105 windows that will be shut are often occupied in shifts — will find work at the remaining legal brothels.

He added he didn't expect the closures to hurt tourism revenues.

"Amsterdam has many other things to offer," he said.

Michigan woman sentenced for drugging children

MOUNT CLEMENS, Mich. — A suburban Detroit woman who admitted injecting heroin into her 12-year-old nephew and giving him and her 15-year-old niece heroin and cocaine was sentenced to eight years in prison.

Jacqueline Ellen Vuich, 26, pleaded guilty Nov 2 to delivery of narcotics to a minor, first- and second-degree child abuse, maintaining a drug house and keeping a person younger than 16 in a home where prostitution occurred. She was sentenced Wednesday by Macomb County Circuit Judge Matt Switalski.

Vuich's daughter lived at a home rented by Vuich's mother. Vuich was visiting Jan. 24 when she injected her nephew with heroin as he ate dinner. He was treated for a heroin overdose at a nearby hospital.

Jan Ruby Catton, 47, Vuich's mother, was charged with maintaining a drug house and a house of prostitution, and with second-degree child abuse. She pleaded no contest and was sentenced Wednesday to two years' probation.

Birth certificates going digital

BY JULIE CARR SMYTH
ASSOCIATED PRESS

COLUMBUS, Ohio — For decades, getting a copy of a birth certificate has required a weeks-long wait for the mail or a personal visit to a state's vital statistics office. That may soon change, much to the relief of those seeking passports, government aid and certain jobs.

Vital statistics offices around the country are trying to automate the centuries-old practice of keeping birth records. Of course, the shorter wait likely will mean a higher cost to consumers.

In Ohio, for example, the cost of a certified copy of a birth certificate has risen from $10 to $16.50 in the past two years. Fees in some counties, where various charges can be added, have reached $25.

"It's a little pricey for a piece of paper, especially since I'm here in Ohio," said Lovelle Scott, a young mother with two children, who needs hers to apply for government help.

States are increasing the fees to raise money needed to convert their birth certificate archives from dusty stacks of paper and microfilm to electronic databases.

The idea is to make it easier to retrieve a copy in an era of heightened national security, expanded voter identification mandates, a national immigration debate and upcoming federal ID requirements. The transition also will streamline a growing number of government processes that rely on birth certificate information.

Texas was among states able to take advantage of the political climate to raise money for a modernization, said Doug McBride, a spokesman for the Texas Department of State Health Services. He said it is unclear whether it was the mood following the Sept. 11th terrorist attacks, the debate over illegal immigrants, or something else.

The state began converting its 48 million birth, death and marriage records to electronic files in January, a project expected to take five years. A month before the conversion began, the state doubled the price of a certified birth certificate from $11 to $22.

Texas also is among states that have offered an interim step into the electronic age. Birth certificates can be ordered online and paid for by credit card.

Ohio officials have given themselves until 2010 to create digital images of the state's entire birth certificate archive, dating to 1908 — which includes 26 million documents on 43 million pages. The upgrade includes a move into a new, fire-protected headquarters.

with UMass students and local communities in order to "enrich the UMass campus and increase access to higher education for all students – regardless of race, class, gender, or origin."

Yajaira Cotto, a student coordinator on the project, stressed the importance of establishing connections with high school and middle school students.

"By introducing college life, it creates the notion and goal of 'I can get there [college].'" Cotto said.

The SGA is scheduled to vote on the approval of the Student Bridges into an agency at the next Senate meeting, which will be held on Wednesday, Dec. 6.

The Senate voted on two motions at Wednesday's meeting.

The first was the allocation of $4,777.12 from the finance reserve to the Alpha Phi Alpha Fraternity for its Centennial Celebration event being held this Saturday.

Chinedu Okongwu, the treasurer for the fraternity, broke down the allocation in two amounts: $2,011.12 towards police fees and $2,766 as a loan for a carpet and stage.

Questions were raised as to why the fraternity could not receive funds from one of its national chapters.

"Because this is the Centennial event happening throughout all chapters, it will be even more difficult to get the emergency money for this weekend's event," replied Okongwu. The motion was unanimously passed in favor of the fraternity.

The second motion of the evening passed regarded the need to procure new sources of long-term funding for Registered Student Organizations (RSOs). The Ways and Means Committee recommended that the SGA Executive procure this funding through grants, donations, sponsorships and any other means appropriate.

tion where its vital record is a part of the identity definition for citizens," said Jim Pearsol, assistant state director of vital statistics.

"And so, as the issue of identity has drawn attention for passports, for Social Security numbers, for driver's license, that's had a corresponding influence on state vital records offices to get ready."

Ohio began planning its digital conversion in 2000, after a fire threatened the building where it housed its main records collection, Pearsol said. The department also realized that, despite improvements, its processing time had peaked at about 3 weeks on average.

The process requires four people: one to receive the certificate request, either at a window, through the mail or online; one to retrieve the record; one to copy the record; and one to stamp it certified. The steps are physically segregated for security and safety purposes.

"We sort of maxed out as far as we could go with a paper-based system," Pearsol said. "We can take it from weeks to hours with an electronic-based system."

Most states began plotting their conversions after 2003, said Garland Land, executive director of the National Association for Public Health Statistics and Information.

In that year, the birth certificate form used by obstetricians, health administrators and registrars nationwide saw its first post-Internet revisions. The form is revamped every 10 to 15 years by the association and the Centers for Disease Control's National Center for Health Statistics, Land said.

The idea of finally moving the birth certificate system into the electronic age was great in theory. Then states saw the pricetag: an estimated $750,000, depending on population — or a minimum of $37.5 million for all 50 states. Only about half the states have been able to afford it, most through fee increases like Ohio's, Land said.

Documents confirm Pentagon surveillance

Documents released in October confirm that the Western Massachusetts branch of the American Friends Service Committee was under Pentagon surveillance for holding antiwar actions.

open, transparent dialogue, which is why this surveillance makes no sense. We would happily engage in peaceful dialogue with the government rather than waste tax dollars to observe nonviolent, public education actions."

The root of suspicion, which led the national group to file the FOIA request, stemmed from an article printed in the Wall Street Journal in March 2004. The article said a Pentagon group, the Counterintelligence Field Activity, whose 400 service members were ordered in August 2003 to maintain a "domestic law-enforcement database that includes information relation to potential terrorist threats directed against the Department of Defense." This, along with instances of harassment from members of Homeland Security, raises questions about government priorities.

"It's an atrocious way to waste taxpayers' money. The government should care about justice and peace and use tax dollars for teachers, housing, job-training programs, not watching a peace group performing public education," Comeford said. "It's an undermining of civil liberties as part of a post 9/11 crackdown on people's rights.

"We're aware that the [organization's] history may make the government suspicious of us, but we don't agree with it because we're just exercising our freedom of speech," she said.

The DOD obtained information of the March 2005 rallies by monitoring e-mails AFSC sent to group members. The constitutionality of warrant-less wiretapping of law-abiding Americans brings concern.

"We believe trampling the Bill of Rights and dismantling our Constitution will not erase the threat of terrorism," said Joyce Miller, AFSC general secretary for justice and human rights.

"This is a civil liberties issue, it's democracy in action," said Keith Harvey, AFSC regional director of New England. "It's scary to be put in a category of terrorists as an organization that promotes peaceful protest. It makes you wonder why the government takes its actions."

The Massachusetts region of AFSC has filed its own FOIA request to obtain information on government surveillance on the Cambridge office. They have yet to receive any results.

Council votes on firefighter's hazing case long the firefighters ride in on their big red trucks and put out the fire."

Earlier this year, a black firefighter sued the New York Fire Department after he said someone left a hangman's noose on top of his gear.

Two years ago, the city of Coral Gables, Fla., awarded $10,000 to a woman firefighter who said her male colleagues handcuffed her during a hazing ritual.

And a firefighter who was accused of causing at least $2,500 damage to lockers and gear in Dunedin, Fla., in 2001 said he was retaliating against co-workers who had filled his hat with spaghetti.

Such pranks have been part of the firefighting culture for as long as he can remember, said Charles J. Bose, a retired firefighter who published the book "Fire House Antics" in 2004.

The How-To of Holiday Shopping

Ways for UMass students to save during the holidays

By Melissa D'Amico
Collegian Staff

During the holiday season, many companies focus on the idea that bigger is better when it comes to buying gifts. From clothing, to toys, to PlayStation 3, the focus on buying the biggest and most expensive gifts has continually increased throughout the years.

But what ever happened to the days where homemade holiday cards and IOUs were admired and cherished as perfect gifts by friends and family? Just because you aren't six years old anymore does not mean that simple, thoughtful gifts will not be appreciated, despite the pressure by companies and advertisers for consumers to buy larger gifts.

By the time the holiday season comes around, most college students are running low on funds and energy to invest in holiday shopping. With finals looming in the air, and the desire to survive until winter break, the last thing most students want to think about is finding their friends and family the perfect holiday gifts – not to mention paying for them.

Being away at school during the holiday season can make shopping even more difficult than it already is. The lack of money, transportation and shopping locations can create many unforeseen obstacles for students.

For most UMass students, the most convenient place to shop while at school is the Hampshire Mall, which is just a bus ride down the road on Route 9. Yet, with only a handful of stores at the mall, students have a limited access to a variety of gift options.

If students are unable to find what they need at the mall, it may be increasingly difficult to find gifts in time for the holidays. As a result, many students must wait until they return home after finals to complete their shopping. Leaving students with only a short period of time to finish, or even begin their shopping, can create extra stress and frustration throughout the holiday season.

Holiday shopping doesn't have to be as stressful and expensive as it may seem. There are a variety of ways for college students to get meaningful and inexpensive gifts for their friends and family.

Homemade gifts are a tactic used by many. From baking to quilting, homemade gifts can add personal touches to a gift that store-bought gifts may not (and without the price).

Gifts which can be made within a college dorm room include quilts, pillows and jewelry. "Wal-Mart" and "Jo-Ann Fabrics" are perfect places to buy inexpensive fabrics, yarn and beads to make quilts, blankets, scarves and jewelry. These options make personalizing gifts easy. By simply choosing different beads, fabrics and colors you can coordinate your gifts to fit each of your friends' different personalities.

If you cannot sew and do not have time to learn, there are many other crafts and creations which can be made for your holiday gifts. Personalized picture frames, t-shirts or mixed CDs can be both fun to make and receive. Or if you have a video camera, homemade videos of memorable moments with your friends can be an entertaining present that will last for years.

If you don't have access to transportation that can get you off campus and to a mall where you can do your holiday shopping, there are a variety of places at UMass where you can get exactly what you need to create the perfect gifts. The Craft Center, located in the Student Union, has numerous craft options to choose from.

With anything from sewing to beading or metalwork, and even screen printing, the Student Union Craft Center and its workers can help you create the perfect holiday gift. Instructors in the Craft Center also offer workshops to help you learn different crafts. Within the coming weeks, the focus of its workshops include holiday photo cards, wall tapestries and knit scarves.

Online shopping has become increasingly popular this holiday season. Finding holiday gifts online gives students a chance to look at stores they would not normally have access to during the school year. So, why not get an online gift? Web sites such as GiveAnything.com offer electronic gift cards that can be used at over 300 different stores.

With such a variety of stores, it is easy to find gifts for everyone on your list, maybe even yourself. These gift cards also make great last-minute gift ideas if you are in a rush, or forgot to get a certain somebody a present.

Being thrifty when holiday shopping is not the only way college students can save during the holiday season. Organizing get-togethers with friends can reduce the amount of stress throughout the holidays. Instead of buying gifts for all of your friends, organize a Secret Santa or Yankee Swap with a group of your friends.

Yankee Swap is a common holiday tradition where each person who brings a single wrapped present chooses a number. The person with the lowest number goes first. As you move through each person, you are able to trade gifts until the last person has chosen. The first person to choose also chooses last.

Beginning this tradition among friends allows you to focus on buying a single present, and you will not have to worry as much about buying gifts for everyone you know. Official Yankee Swap rules can be found at Yankee-Swap.net.

One of the best ways to stay on track this holiday season is to stay organized. By setting up a budget as to how much you want to spend on gifts, or how much you want to spend on each individual person can make shopping easier. Just remember to stick to your budget, and you won't need to worry about your depleting bank account.

Also, if you begin saving some money each week in the months before the holidays, you may be able to have more money to spend on gifts than if you wait until the last minute to gather money.

Even beginning your shopping earlier in the year or shopping all year round can save both time and money. Buying presents during sales throughout the year can keep you from stressing out over last minute gift shopping. Also, shopping right after the holidays can start saving you money for the following year. Buying discounted wrapping supplies, holiday cards and decorations, and saving them until next holiday season can reduce future worries.

Do not forget that your holiday budget not only includes buying gifts, but the cost of wrapping them as well. Wrapping paper and gift boxes may seem minimal and inexpensive, but their costs add up as the amount of gifts increases. Being creative with what is used to wrap your presents can significantly cut spending costs.

Instead of wrapping paper, using cellophane tied with ribbon can be a more decorative and less expensive component of your gifts. Using small baskets which can be found at thrift stores or dollar stores can be an easy way to wrap a group of small presents.

Small things like holiday cards and gift tags, which go unnoticed by many people, can cause unnecessary spending. Homemade cards are less expensive and more personal than generic store-bought cards.

Creating your own gift tags is another way to personalize gift wrapping. By using things like extra photos of your friend's, or coasters from your mother's favorite restaurant, you can add small details to your gift that your receiver will notice.

One of the most important things for all students to remember this holiday season is that tangible gifts and spending money are not the only things worth giving. Donating your time can be a much more meaningful gift for many people during the holidays.

Through organizations such as The Food Bank of Western Massachusetts, a non-profit organization to help those in need of food throughout Western Massachusetts, students can volunteer at food pantries, soup kitchens, childcare centers and homeless shelters throughout Berkshire, Franklin, Hampden and Hampshire counties.

Ban the billboard

Tucker Merrick

Entering Amherst from Route 9, you are sure to run into attractions on all sides of the street. Restaurants, malls, movie theaters and diners have flourished in this area, largely because of the fuel they get from students' wallets. Amherst is a college town. With Amherst College and UMass right in the middle while Mount Holyoke, Hampshire and Smith College are in their peripheral, this town has been able to build its economy around the business of education.

This romantic vision of a small, quaint college town is something to be admired. Students laughing while catching a flick, or talking about a major as they skip through the mall to buy more school supplies – this is the idealistic view of UMass, and something that you could imagine coming down Route 9 from Northampton. Unfortunately, thanks to a ridiculous beer advertisement, this picture-perfect image is easily shattered.

Anyone who has come to Amherst East from Route 9 can't help to have seen a Bud Light billboard sporting the slogan "Our Kind of Town." This large and daunting display is one of the first images a motorist encounters as they cross the bridge from Northampton, and one that is sure to set a subliminal tone for the rest of their trip.

Amherst must be "their kind of town" because I guess everyone in it is long overdue for an AA meeting. Clearly this town must have an excessive drinking problem, and it's something to be admired. Bud Light gives the thumbs up, and they just put up the sign to make sure we got the message.

It's good to know that at least one major corporation stands by the typical college kid; a student who is looking to have a good time while staying low on calories. They must be providing us with support – it must be a selfless act against those stuffed-shirts who want to promote that lame romantic image. Bud Light helps bring everyone up close and personal with the real Amherst. We're loud, obnoxious and pretty much drunk around the clock.

Who wants that image promoted? Surely not the UMass Admissions staff. Parents who are driving up to take potential undergrads on a campus tour aren't looking for Bud Light encouragement. They're not checking billboards to see which ones signify a place of debauchery and alcoholism. Anyone who sees that sign is immediately turned off of thoughts of UMass as a hub of academia.

Anyone who sees that sign is immediately turned off of thoughts of UMass as a hub of academia.

I hope that no one actually drove by that billboard and nodded his or her head in agreement. I hope nobody thinks that a beer brewery has their best interests in mind. Budweiser, who makes Bud Light, is a company that wants to make money, and they don't care that their billboard isn't helping this town's image.

It is sad to recall the number of times I've gotten into a conversation with someone about college, and at the instant mention of my enrollment at UMass, people immediately tell me how much partying I must be doing. I always try to downplay that side of UMass, the other side of this college town, because it's not something to be proud of.

Now, I enjoy having a good time as much as the next person, and I am certainly not advocating for prohibition, but anyone who takes pleasure in that billboard has a distressing attitude. If you are driving by, and the advertisement inspires you to call a friend so you can see how much of a rack you two can tackle together, then there is a problem. There is nothing wrong with drinking, but there is wrong in this type of commercial and marketable mind-set behind drinking.

By Budweiser telling you that Amherst is "our kind of town," they are essentially promoting a funneling, shot-gunning, binge-drinking mentality. A place of deprivation. They want you to find out how much beer you can drink before your friend has to hold back your hair for you. They really want to know how you abused your power as president during a drinking game. More sales for them.

The question is: is your "kind of town" an ugly, red-eyed, hangover-ridden metropolis?

Don't buy into this Bud Light "our kind of town" attitude. All it achieves is the promotion of a drunken herd mentality while decreasing brain cell counts and increasing waist sizes. There is no problem in having a good time, but this commercialized version fueled by corporate endorsement is something to be wary of.

What is your kind of town? I'm sure everyone would rather envision it as a respectable hamlet of academia where students still know how to have fun. Don't let Bud Light claim this town in the name of the king of beers.

Mass conusmption at its best

Kevin Pascucci

Exactly one week ago today, thousands of Americans rushed out at 4 in the morning to be one of the first in line at their local shopping malls. As many malls opened as early as 5 a.m., shoppers rushed through the doors to take advantage of as many sales and bargains as they could. This event happens once a year and has been dubbed Black Friday, marking the first day of the Christmas holiday shopping season. Although this is only one day out of the year, it represents a much bigger issue in this country.

It wouldn't take anybody visiting this country long to figure out that we as Americans like to buy things. Starting at a young age, we were inundated with ads for cereals and toys that we had to have. I'm sure most of us can remember the commercials we saw while watching Saturday morning cartoons, which usually instructed us to talk to our parents about getting the advertised product. It doesn't change much when you become an adult either. The things you want just become more expensive.

As a consumer culture, we have allowed our lives to center around the belongings we own. We all want to be able to make a living with whatever we do in life, seeing as it's necessary in order to keep a roof over our heads and food on our table. The problem is that this is no longer enough. In addition to the basics, we also want to have the best car, the biggest house and the most "stuff."

The problem is that this is no longer enough. In addition to the basics, we also want to have the best car, the biggest house and the most "stuff."

This time of year is when we tend to fly our consumer colors the highest too. Now I'm not saying that it's wrong to buy presents for your friends and loved ones. It's just that we have shifted all of our attention onto shopping when it comes to Christmas.

This holiday means something different to everybody, but we all are united in the frenzy of shopping for the best presents we can find. This is proven by the fact that every Christmas, there is one gift that everyone fights to get their hands on. In past years it has been Furby's and Tickle-Me-Elmo's, and this year it appears to be the Playstation 3, which came out only two weeks ago.

Allow me to talk about this new video game system for a minute. The first thing I'd like to address is the price. The cheaper version of the PS3 is $500, making it one of the most expensive gaming systems ever. How can they get away with charging so much for it? They can because they know people will buy it anyways.

In fact, people have shot, stabbed and robbed for one. Upon its release, news stories of violence being used to acquire a PS3 began to pop up all over the country. In Manchester, Conn., a shopper was beaten and robbed of his new PlayStation 3 just minutes after walking out of the store reported the Associated Press.

It's pretty sad when people are assaulting each other right outside of the stores, and not even waiting for people to get home before robbing them. The crimes surrounding the release of the PS3 only show how much we have allowed ourselves to be controlled by what we own.

It's gotten to a point in this country where advertisements and product placements don't seem to faze us anymore. Even though we are bombarded with ads everywhere we look, whether it's on TV or in a magazine, we have come to accept them as a common part of our daily lives. Despite the fact that they don't seem to affect us right away, there are still psychological effects, which become more and more evident if we take a step back and look at our own purchases and consumption habits.

We've also seen the rise of credit cards, as well as the impact they've had on us as a consumer culture. Not only have they made shopping more convenient, but they have also raised the amount of debt in America greatly.

After all, it's much easier to spend money when you're not actually handing over physical cash. We as college students have become the biggest target for credit card companies to advertise to, and in turn have built up quite a bit of debt ourselves.

As we lookout over our shopping mall and Wal-Mart-covered country this holiday season, we need to be conscious of how we are spending our hard-earned money. If we continue to allow ourselves to be slaves to what we supposedly have to have, then we will only feed into this cycle of consumption and production. As American consumers, we are the ones who are truly in control of the market in this country, and therefore it is up to us to make a change in our lifestyles.

Allow me to end with a quote from one of my favorite movies. During a memorable scene from "Fight Club," Brad Pitt's character gives Edward Norton a piece of advice in regards to his belongings. "The things you own end up owning you."

Who's threatening society?

Jonathan Werner

Back in the beginning of the semester, the University of Massachusetts Cannabis Reform Coalition scheduled a meeting with Vice Chancellor of Student Affairs Michael Gargano. Three days before the meeting he cancelled on us.

The meeting concerned new policies he enacted under the guise of increasing public safety on campus. However, what these policies did was increase the police manpower devoted to arresting small-time users of marijuana.

Now, police officers, both plain-clothed and uniformed, routinely patrol the halls of our dorms. Using tactics such as impersonating "Bruno's" delivery guys and pretending to be from down the hall or working for some student organization, they seek out any and all users indiscriminately. They don't go after people who pose a problem, or even people who were being loud and obnoxious.

The effect of this has been a threefold increased number of arrests for petty possession since the policy was started. At the same time as the rise of the arrest rate, the punishment has also increased.

After each person is arrested he or she is immediately suspended because he or she poses an "imminent threat to the community." Many people have been kicked off campus housing, and there is a high rate of expulsion.

Marijuana is an illegal drug, and the police have every right and even obligation to enforce the law. However, the increased pressure on the drug is pointless. Small-time marijuana users pose no greater threat to safety than anyone else.

They are not contributing to the violence on campus nearly as much as people, who say, get intoxicated and run through their dorms posing in random rooms. There is only one possible way that marijuana users could pose a threat to the community, and the official excuse for the policy; If the user had massive quantities of the drug, there could be armed robberies which could lead to violence or even death.

However, the police are not going after the major dealers for whom this scenario is actually a realistic threat. Instead they arbitrarily go after any small-time user they can. I have a friend who is a high honors student. She was smoking alone in Durfee Conservatory, and was arrested by an undercover cop and suspended, for the obvious threat she posed to everyone around her.

Three weeks ago we (the UMass Cannabis Reform Coalition) again went to the vice chancellor's office to make an appointment. It was impossible to even get on his schedule until Dec. 1, three weeks later. We patently waited eager for an opportunity to express our opinion, and the opinion of over 1,300 people who had signed our petition.

I didn't expect him to change the policy, but I at least expected him to listen to us and to defend his position. Instead on Monday his secretary called me and told me the meeting was cancelled because Gargano didn't want to meet with us, and would not meet with us in the future. She explained that the increase in arrests was to change our reputation as a party school, a goal unrelated to public safety.

The problem is the idea that more marijuana arrests are going to reduce our reputation as a party school is flawed. The UMass Police Department has made no claims that the increase in arrests has had any impact on marijuana usage. The policy is ineffective at curtailing use and is only succeeding in arresting more people, and ruining more lives. It also increases the police record for number of arrests; essentially their plan is working against their goal.

More than anything I am upset that the administration refuses to talk to students about its policies, it refuses even to talk to a Registered Student Organization. This gives the impression of a detached administration, which refuses to open lines of communications with students and would rather act sneakily behind our backs making decisions that students have no way of influencing. Gargano needs to be sacked, and replaced with a more transparent vice chancellor who works in the best interest of the student body.

You can feel it in the air. Winter is coming. It's the holiday season again, chock full of shoveling, gift-buying and amazing heating bills. More and more it seems like people can't stand the cold. They can't stand the bleak grays of winter, the hardships of snowfall, the chill in the air. To them it seems like winter is the burden of the north – they want palm trees and beaches for Christmas.

Well I like winter.

I like winter a lot, so much, in fact, that I would dare to call it my favorite season. Sure it's not always a cakewalk, but there's more to a cold winter than people give credit. We're lucky enough to live in New England and experience the winter the way winter should be: hot chocolate, gloves, scarves and all.

There's something about the first snowfall. As corny as it sounds, it's magical. Even when it doesn't stick, you're ecstatic to greet it. What's better than eating a drifting snowflake? Nothing. And what's better than being bundled in a cocoon of warm winter clothing, complete with rosy nose and cheeks? Nothing.

So winter – do your worst. Hit me with 15 feet of snow, because that's just 15 feet of fun. I don't even care about being snowed in, so long as I have friends, family and copious amounts of hot chocolate.

I'm looking forward to this winter season. I want to break icicles off my house and munch on them like carrots. I want to pick up my little sister and toss her into a snow drift. I want to watch the mist on my breath dissipate into the air. I want all the little things that make winter, winter. I want to tackle snowmen, I want to make snow angels and I want to flop into a cooled cushion of white.

What's the best part about New England snow? Hitting the mountains. Snowboarding, Skiing, whatever – as long as you get to race down the slopes. Nothing sums up the rush of winter like a run down from the peak of a mountain. Nothing feels as good as hitting a fresh patch of powder and cleaving a path down the mountainside, and nothing is more relieving than wiping out into a soft mound of snow several feet deep.

Those first few tentative steps on a sheet of ice so thick it could hold an elephant, lacing up your blades so tight it hurts a little bit, the little rivulets in the ice that only form out in the wild. What an awesome feeling.

I don't even mind getting snow in my boots. The chill reminds me I'm alive, it wakes me up. I'll laugh it off. As long as you're having fun, I think anyone would agree that a little snow nookie never hurt anyone.

Most important on my list of activities to do this winter is the construction of Hoth – my personal snow fortress for snowball fights. I can't wait for the snow tunnels, the packed walls, the domed ceiling and (most important) the battle. You can't beat a stack of freshly packed snowballs and a few hapless targets running your way.

And how could I forget the skating? Not just at the rink, but out in the woods near your house. Those first few tentative steps on a sheet of ice so thick it could hold an elephant, lacing up your blades so tight it hurts a little bit, the little rivulets in the ice that only form out in the wild. What an awesome feeling.

Most important of all these things is home, family and friends. That's what the holiday season is all about. Sitting around the fireplace, sipping on eggnog and talking. And I know it sounds cliche, but it's all about being with the ones you love. Giving gifts and being happy, brought together in a cozy home sheltered from the cold.

Yes, sometimes the winter may seem unforgiving. It may seem harsh and bleak. It may seem like it's never going to end. Sometimes it just seems like one big hardship, but we need to remember that it's these hardships that bring us together. These are the days we're so happy to be with one another, so let's all enjoy it.

I'm a New England kid, born and raised with the snow and I say bit that powder, go make snow-angels, drink some hot-chocolate and have a snowball fight. I say be with your family and friends. I say give gifts, be happy and love each other because that's what the holidays are all about.

I say let it snow, let it snow, let it snow.

'Broken News' ties art with a message

BY KAREN ALSEN
COLLEGIAN CORRESPONDENT

Sept. 11, 2001 was a date that brought fear, anger and confusion into the hearts of all Americans. People watched in horror as the events unraveled, wanting to help out but unsure of what any individual could actually do. Mary Bernstein, an accomplished New England artist, decided to save newspaper clippings and various other artifacts from this historical period in an effort to make some sense out of the tragedy.

For the entire year after the attacks, Bernstein made weekly collages that illustrated the intense emotion that she felt personally, as well as the national and international state of affairs. The result is a fascinating look at a period in time that still stirs up emotion and wonder, five years later.

Bernstein's exhibit, "Broken News" is not just a documentation of the news events that followed 9/11. "Broken News" is a look back at 9/11 from the viewpoint of an observer in 2006. Bernstein demonstrates this idea by connecting headlines from the news in 2006 with the collages that were made from 2001-2002.

The current headlines are connected to each collage with a piece of string, which allows the viewer to see parallels that exist between the news of today and the news of five years ago. The purpose of the exhibit is to let the viewer step back and realize the cyclical nature of the news and how it affects our perception and understanding of what is going on around us.

Each of the recent headlines are color-coded and organized into 11 categories such as terrorism, the Taliban, the Catholic Church, Israel/Palestine and Iraq. The colorful headlines saturate the walls to form an elaborate web of ideas which then branch down to correspond with each of the 53 collage panels.

The panels are displayed around the gallery in their chronological order, while the opposite sides of each collage embody the seasons in an original Bernstein painting. The paintings were a response to her environment, as Bernstein said in her gallery opening speech, "I wanted to reflect what was around me."

Bernstein, who graduated from UMass-Amherst with a bachelor's degree in painting, has created 53 paintings, which by themselves are worth taking the trip to the exhibit.

The collages are filled with headlines from the biggest news stories of each week, often from The New York Times and Newsweek. Spliced in are cartoons, personal materials (such as e-mails, cards, photos and letters from friends), downloads from international news and a weekly diary entry from Bernstein herself.

The diary entries are compelling portraits of Bernstein's own life in reaction to the events around her. They bring tenderness and humanity, while reminding the viewer of what life was like for citizens during this extraordinary year.

"The personal part of how we live our lives is really important," Bernstein says of her diary entries.

Bernstein is aware of the power that news and language have over an individual. In an introduction to the exhibit, she wrote that sometimes people believe they are being informed by news that is not entirely accurate or stable. She realizes that many forms of news have an agenda and point of view.

"That question of what's really going on has a lot of layers," She said.

The detailed collages of "Broken News" are interesting to observe. However, the farther you step back from the collages, the more fascinating the exhibit gets, as you get to really see the full picture. The intricacy of the web of ideas and how they relate to one another symbolizes the world at large, one that can only be understood by taking a few steps back.

Because the headlines of 2006 correlate so precisely with the news from the aftermath of 9/11, Bernstein believes the news has come almost full circle in the last five years. In her gallery opening speech, Bernstein said that she back tracked the first mention of Iraq, post 9/11 to a poll in USA Today from the last week in November 2001.

A CNN Gallup poll found that 62 percent of Americans were in favor of a long term war, which included "hitting Iraq." This interestingly early piece of information is featured in the collage from the week it was published. As Bernstein says, "I was shocked that those Iraq stories were already there."

Bernstein says that when she started the collages, "it gave me something to do in my despair." However, "after doing this, I feel less rooted than when I started," she says. This is because the finished product has given her new insight into many issues by allowing her to see the connections from a wider angle.

The theme of "Broken News" is establishing ties between past and present issues. Bernstein is openly displaying her ideas while urging the viewer to connect the dots for his or herself.

"Broken News" is a free exhibit located in the Student Union Gallery that is open to all and will be appreciated by many. It runs through Dec. 8 and is open Monday through Thursday from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Friday from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m.

A student eyes the Student Union Gallery's newest exhibit, "Broken News," which features 53 paintings by creator and UMass alum Mary Bernstein.

Mary Bernstein, seen above with her new exhibit "Broken News," has tried to establish ties with past and present issues in the news, particularly after Sept. 11.

Quarterly Concern Issue 20: a brief introduction to McSweeney's

BY ALEX BUTLER
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Dennis and I are playing chess when the guards bring Jingo in. You die and go to heaven. When God gave me my own island, He said, take this island and make it yours. There once was this man, came one day to our town. Spring came and Pop sold half the flock and took his preaching on the road. The two of them, Ben and Adria, meeting in a manatee pool. We cornered Margo in the living room. A man grabbed my father by his shirt. Then he punched my father's face.

These are just some of the first sentences from the various stories encased in McSweeney's Quarterly Concern, Issue 20.

Now, if you're a stranger to the literary movement happening in San Francisco, a brief history of McSweeney's is in order.

Back in 1998, a group of young literary scholars took a firm standing on the Pacific coast Led by author and editor Dave Eggers ("A Heartbreaking Work of Staggering Genius" and "You Shall Know Our Velocity!") the communal organized and created a collection of short fiction, poetry and prose, all rejects of other magazines. Every issue has had a different theme – the theme of Issue 20's being art.

How do they do this? Well, simple: Every fourth page is dedicated to a full-color figurative painting, which bear no consistency with either one another or the story they neighbor. The cover itself is a brilliant work of art – a giant view of stacked pieces of land complete with dripping water and crawling vines, all covering a description of the process of making the book. Few books actually have the power to hold your interest via cover art, but Issue 20 does a remarkable job. The inside paintings feature such artists as Fred Tomaselli, Echo Eggebrecht, Henri Rousseau and Angelina Gualdoni, along with roughly 50 others.

Being a self-running collective of editors and contributors, McSweeney's has an absolutely free reign on what they publish and create. Since 1998, the cooperative has branched online as well as into television and magazines. "Timothy McSweeney's Internet Tendency" (www.mcsweeneys.net) is the "scrappy Internet arm" where there are daily postings of new poems, events and other oddities the group feels should be tossed in. They have their own monthly literary magazine "The Believer," which incorporates books, music, politics and art via long essays, book reviews, drawings and interviews. McSweeney's even spread to the world of DVD with "Wholphin," a quarterly DVD release of short films, documentaries and animation, all extremely obscure in nature. Comedians Patton Oswalt and Andy Richter have found themselves featured on various issues, as well as Spike Jones' lost documentary of Al Gore during his 2000 presidential campaign.

And from that small foundation, McSweeney's has grown to be one of the most widely read literary journals to date.

This is all well and good, but what about Issue 20? Besides the art, what does it hold within the covers?

Issue 20 comes complete with 13 wildly different stories from 13 separate authors. Certain stories exploring animal-plant romances, psycho librarians and passive-aggressive ventriloquism, the first poet to die, a troubled newspaper reporter and, yes, a manatee pool.

Also, at the end of the book, on the binding of the back cover is part one of Chris Adrian's new novel, "The Children's Hospital." A floating hospital leaves doctors and patients remembering a past world as the land masses of Earth have been flooded under seven miles of water. One med student finds herself with strange new powers. The ending leaves you wanting to rush out and buy a copy of the complete novel which was released in August of this year.

University of San Francisco professor Susan Steinberg opens the collection with "To sit, unmoving." This story reads almost like a series of observations from a young daughter of a stubborn and emotionally absent father. Her wild imagination pulls the reader right in – a torn, yet humorous picture drawn by a witty young girl. Though very "matter-of-fact," the story is extremely fun to read and is an accurate representation of what to expect throughout Issue 20.

Steinberg was at Memorial Hall last night, reading poetry with UMass alumnae Lisa Olstein.

Roderick White's "Elsewhere," shines a very different light on the idea of flashback. The reader is tossed into the mind of a 24-year-old who receives a bizarre message one morning from a complete stranger (an envelope explaining, "If a constellation was named after you, it would be phallic and largely insignificant.") The story winds through various situations, all leading up to an ending too weird to explain.

Though this isn't the most recent McSweeney's Quarterly Concern, it is certainly one worth remembering. If you are at all intrigued with what they are all about, Issue 20 is a great place to start. McSweeney's pulls together some of the most obscure, experimental, and just plain "out-there" ideas and puts them nicely into one collection.

Issue 22 is planned to be released in early 2007.

Website of the Week

WWW.COLLEGERAGE.COM

While Web sites like YouTube.com and Dailymotion.com continue to grow in popularity, a University of Massachusetts student has taken on his own project to archive popular television shows on one user-friendly Web site.

CollegeRage.com is senior Patrick MacLeod's first venture into Web-based multimedia, and the site which launched two weeks ago is rapidly growing in popularity, thanks in part to advertising and promotions on Facebook.com and Myspace.com.

"I bought the domain name about a year ago, but I just got the idea for the site three weeks ago," MacLeod said.

"It's basically links to streaming videos from offshore sites. It organizes videos from other sites that might be hard to find."

The content of the site includes shows such as "South Park," "Entourage" and "Lost," as well as a number of "Adult Swim" favorites.

"The site started with what I thought were the most popular shows," MacLeod said. "Right now I have shows that appeal to the college male crowd, but I'm trying to expand it."

MacLeod hopes to include "Desperate Housewifes" soon, as well as a list of nearly 30 other shows he hopes to add to the site, depending on availability.

MacLeod primarily pulls clips from the French-based DailyMotion.com, but he also uses a Chinese-based site, as well as a few obscure others.

"It's [CollegRage.com] simple, clean and less complicated than using other sites," MacLeod said.

Guest's new film worth 'consideration'

Harry Shearer and Eugene Levy star in Christopher Guest's new mockumentary, "For Your Consideration."

BY DAVID HUMPHREYS
COLLEGIAN STAFF

The year was 1984 and well known director Rob Reiner introduced the world to Spinal Tap, a fictitious heavy metal band from England, in his mockumentary "This Is Spinal Tap." Let us all pause for a moment and silently thank Mr. Reiner for his expertise, directorial prowess, and his planting of a comedic seed inside of Christopher Guest's ("Best In Show," "Waiting for Guffman") head. What "This Is Spinal Tap" did for rock n' roll, "For Your Consideration" does for Hollywood, but in its own unique way.

While seeming less direct than other mockumentaries, "Consideration" follows suit with other of writer/director Guest's works by using satire and copious amounts of tongue-in-cheek humor to get his point across. All comparisons aside, "Consideration" is really a masterpiece in its own right.

The basic story follows the making of a new movie called "Home for Purim" and follows the cast and crew associated with it. When rumors start on the Internet, some of the cast get caught up in the pre-Oscar buzz and the rest of the story falls neatly into place after this.

Containing stellar performances by Catherine O'Hara ("Home Alone"), Eugene Levy ("American Pie") and Harry Shearer ("This is Spinal Tap,") "Consideration" is really stolen by Fred Willard ("Anchorman: The Legend of Ron Burgundy") as talk show host Chuck Porter. His superbly timed, almost caustic wit clashes with the seriousness of events, creating comedic value where there might not have been any.

Much of the actual humor in "Consideration" comes from its satire on current pop icons and culture. From Ryan Seacrest to Anna Nicole Smith, Ebert and Roeper and Access Hollywood, nothing was spared from the ridicule of this production. Some of the best satire came from the fictitious show "Hollywood Now," hosted by Chuck Porter (Willard) and Cindy Martin (Jane Lynch, "Talladega Nights: The Ballad of Ricky Bobby").

Now, not all of "For Your Consideration" is golden. John Michael Higgins' ("Wag the Dog") character Corey Taft is entirely too reminiscent of Will Ferrell in "Anchorman." By using the same dry humor mixed with quick monologues littered with one-liners, as well as the same overall persona, Higgins really does a mediocre Ron Burgundy impression instead of creating a Corey Taft.

Another downfall is how noticeably "Consideration" drags towards its end. With many movies going far over two hours and still staying interesting, it is a wonder why, with only an 86-minute runtime and all of Guest's experience that "Consideration" has any drag at all. Assuming that the movie was cut down, either more time should have been added or the scene placement should have been rethought.

With Guest's touch and an all-star cast, "For Your Consideration" really lights up the screen and the audience. Reviving the art form of mockumentary, Guest and his cast brought loads of laughs, shouts and even a few groans from everyone in the theater. Get ready to see one of the year's brightest, wittiest and downright funniest films.

"For Your Consideration" is released by Warner Independent Pictures and is playing at Amherst Cinemas until Dec. 7.

Gov't Mule kicks it wide open

BY MICHAEL HARDMAN
COLLEGIAN STAFF

Gov't Mule headlined at the Worcester Palladium on Wednesday night. Frontman Warren Haynes spoke with the Daily Collegian's Michael Hardman.

Last night at the Worcester Palladium, Gov't Mule tested the breaking point of the building's structure. Hard rocking riffs and complex grooves, Mule's staple, relentlessly attacked an intimate crowd of several hundred. The band, fully capable of packing arenas, couldn't have cared less about the size of the crowd. They used the opportunity to create some far-out jams.

Donovan Frankenreiter opened the night's show with some soft jams that climaxed into well crafted blues riffs. His solid performance had the crowd amped and ready to go. The low rumble of "Muuuuule" could be heard constantly throughout the 15-minute wait.

The Palladium literally shook when Warren Haynes and Gov't Mule stepped onto the stage. Without acknowledgement of the crowd, the band ripped into "Sladjaw Jeasbed," from their album, "Deja Voodoo." From there, they continued with some of their hard rocking songs for most of the first set.

Their version of "Brand New Angel," from the new "High & Mighty" album, was quintessential 'Mule.' The overall groove of the heavy tune, allowed for experimentation, and Gov't Mule did just that. Haynes' overwhelming riffs and solos sent shivers through everyone in attendance.

"Catfish Blues" showcased Haynes' dirty, whiskey-soaked vocals in a 10-minute straight-from-the-swamp blues jam. They completed the first set covering Humble Pie's "30 Days in the Hole."

While the first set featured just two extended improvisations, the second set featured two full hours of them. The small, yet tall venue allowed almost perfect acoustics, with every note for each player being audible. Even Haynes' voice, which needs to compete with some serious noise, came out in full.

The second set opened with an epic "Unring the Bell." Stemming from its reggae influences, the lighting went red, yellow and green. During an extended jam, Haynes played a little "Get Up, Stand Up" tease. Danny Louis was in full force, creating some truly trippy keyboard melodies.

In the middle of the second set, Matt Abts was left on stage to solo on drums. Most people take these moments to hit the restroom or to get another beer, yet the crowd did not move. Abts, climbing the list of top drummers, furiously slammed into his drum set. Towards the end, he ditched his sticks to play with his hands, and nobody could tell the difference.

Gov't Mule finished the set with a classic take on one of their oldies, "Mule." The crowd was fatigued and it was midnight, yet the cheers and yells remained until they came back out to play an encore. The audience, trying to predict the song that could allow for the best Warren Haynes solos, was thrown for a loop when they started Tom Waits' country blues rocker, "Going Out West." Warren had everybody singing the chorus as the lights dimmed to black.

The Daily Collegian's Mike Hardman had a chance to speak with frontman Haynes after the show.

Mike Hardman: Your album, 'High & Mighty,' seems to be turning over a new chapter in [Gov't] Mule's career. Billboard referred to it as your 'Houses of the Holy.' How do you feel about that?

Warren Haynes: Well, I think that's quite a compliment, you know. I'm a big Led Zeppelin fan, and that's one of my favorite Zeppelin albums. So that's an honor.

MH: You guys tour at an iron man pace. How is it that you can keep up the high level of consistency?

WH: Well, that's what we do, spread the word. That's what it is all about. You get out on the road, a lot of long bus rides, sometimes not perfect circumstances, but when you walk out on the stage, it's all worthwhile.

MH: You mentioned before that the audience plays a big part at your shows. You said that you don't perform for the audience, but with the audience.

WH: Well, yeah, we are feeding off the energy that the audience is giving us. I think that musicians that improvise for a living are capable of so much more when there is a good audience. At the same time, we're playing for ourselves. Like a jazz band, we're listening intently to what we're doing. We're not ignoring the audience, we're actually feeding off their energy. We are very in-tune with each other and trying to deliver the best performance that we can. Something unique and exciting gets created that can never happen again.

MH: Tonight's crowd was a little smaller than your normal venues, but they were very energetic. How did you respond to them?

WH: They were really nice, you know. We don't play this market a lot, but the people are really great here. You play for the ones that are here.

MH: Last March, you played out in Northampton, Mass. You closed with "Going Out West" as you did tonight. Could this become a Massachusetts tradition?

WH: (Laughs) We just haven't done it in a while, so we thought it would be fun.

MH: You guys have a knack for covering lesser known songs, like "No Quarter," "Going Out West," "Don't Step on the Grass, Sam," among others. What process brings you to these decisions?

WH: It varies, it could be a song that I wish I had written or a song I felt I could do justice to singing. Sometimes it's just shock value, we want to freak people out. We definitely want to pick more obscure tunes, there is no point in playing "Stairway to Heaven" or "Sweet Home Alabama." At the same time, our audience is so varied, like tonight we played songs from The Band and Traffic. Some people may not know who did these songs originally. "Going out West" is a Tom Waits song, and we've been covering that since it first came out. Still a lot of people don't realize how far back the songs go, so it's cool to turn the audience onto new songs.

MH: The new album "High & Mighty," seems to have a lot of social and political commentary on it. "Like Flies" comments on the decline of the music industry.

WH: I just feel like we're moving backwards. It talks about the bar being at an all-time low. I read somewhere where somebody said that art is less important in today's society than it's ever been. I think it's probably true. People are much more interested in being famous, than they are at being good at something. The people that take that instant gratification route are missing out on what it really means to get good at something you enjoy. There is real gratification in that, as opposed to the adulation that comes and goes.

MH: Where do you see yourself in five years?

WH: Doing what I'm doing, hopefully to a lot of brand new fans.

Early success builds confidence

around," UMass coach Marnie Dacko said when asked what the biggest difference is from this year's team to last. "Their willingness to do whatever it takes on the floor has been key."

Winning tends to fill up a team's confidence level and the Maroon and White is brimming with it after the season's stellar start.

"I think our confidence is pretty high," Rosanio said. "Knowing we can go out there and win ballgames is a key factor for our improved confidence and results."

Despite the success, the team is staying grounded – realizing that the season is much too young to get too high after a win.

"The winning is really bringing our confidence up, but we can't get too conceited right now," Tatham said. "We just have to sustain our confidence level and know that we can go out there and beat big teams."

"They're playing to win now, rather than playing not to lose," Dacko said. "They're confidence is big, and I think that they're more relaxed out there. That being said, we still have a lot of work to do. This is just the beginning."

In the first half against Wagner, the Minutewomen struggled a bit and Dacko wasn't pleased with her team's performance. The second half was a stark contrast, and they pulled away rather handily from the Seahawks. Mills wasn't sure that the transformation from the two halves could have happened a season ago.

"Last year we kind of folded under the pressure," she said. "I don't know how we would have played in the second half of tonight's game last year. But tonight we said the first half is over, and we came out like it was a new game for us. We showed we were the better team."

As the season presses on, Dacko expects more of the same from her team.

"I certainly expect to win every game we play," she said. "That's the only attitude you can have. You have to come out with a positive attitude and expect to go out and win."

UM and BC success hinges on Williams

to how Williams is feeling before the game, and – for the record – it's ridiculous that we have to talk about an NBA prospect's effort like it's the Dow Jones.

One thing is certain: the bigger the spotlight, the harder Williams will play. So if the Mullins Center is packed tomorrow night, expect a big game from the BC big man, and expect a big loss for the Minutemen.

Ford scheduled (as you know by now) Pittsburgh, BC, Louisville and Kentucky for the out-of-conference part of the schedule. There are a couple of things that Ford is trying to accomplish by playing the better teams.

One: the better competition that a team plays, the better that team is going to get. Two: if the Minutemen come away with just one victory from any one of these games (0-for-1 so far) then the NCAA selection committee – Ford is hoping – will take notice and consider the Minutemen as a selection for the NCAA Tournament.

Ford may have lucked out this year. BC is down after Smith's graduation, and both Kentucky and Louisville are shells of their former selves. The Cardinals lost to the Atlantic 10's Dayton Flyers earlier this season, so obviously they aren't the powerhouse they have been in years past.

BC is in the same boat as Louisville. It still has some ridiculous talent on the team, but with losses to Vermont and Providence already this year, there is much room for improvement.

This is the team that UMass is facing tomorrow night. The Eagles are 3-2 and coming off of a convincing win over Michigan State, but they are vulnerable and extremely beatable – if Sean Williams doesn't come to play.

Cahoon searches for the right combination

By Jeremy Race
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts hockey team shuffled its cards Tuesday night for its Hockey East matchup against Boston University.

UMass coach Don Cahoon changed up his lineup for the game, moving his top two scorers – sophomores Cory Quirk and Chris Davis – to the top line alongside junior P.J. Fenton.

UMass Hockey

"It was a good chemistry we had [Tuesday night]," said Quirk. "P.J.'s a great player. He brings a lot to the table. And I've been playing with Chris all year, so there's nothing new there."

Matt Anderson played on the third line, working with fellow senior Kevin Jarman and sophomore Scott Crowder.

"We tried to get a little more balance in the lineup, given the makeup of BU's lineup," Cahoon said.

Tuesday's lineup may have been the most opponent-specific of any Cahoon put together this season. The top line of Quirk, Davis and Fenton represented the Mass Attack's most dangerous offensive players, while the second and third lines both matched a pair of experienced seniors with a younger playmaker.

"P.J. has played with Quirk and Davis before. That was an easy one," Cahoon said. "[Fenton has] been playing great as of late. That line is an important line whether Capraro's on it or Fenton's on it."

The second line saw the return of senior Mark Matheson to the center position. He was winged by Capraro and freshman speedster Will Ortiz.

"I thought by taking Capraro and putting him with Matheson, two experienced players, you can put someone like Ortiz with them, who can finish plays, and almost did [against BU]," Cahoon said. "We put Anderson in a position where he can play with another senior. We have four seniors in two groups of two, and we thought that physically we could use that advantage."

Cahoon has tweaked his lines throughout the young season, matching different younger players with juniors and seniors in an effort to find the most productive pairings.

"It's not an exact science," Cahoon said. "You get hunches, and you get a feel for what you see in practice. Then you try to look at what the opposition's going to throw at you – then you try to create a scenario where you can be competitive."

Continuity amid changes

Throughout the many shifts and modifications of the Minuteman roster, the one pair of skaters that Cahoon kept together up front is last year's Co-Rookies of the Year, Quirk and Davis.

They represent UMass' best offensive threats thus far. Quirk has amassed 13 points on seven goals and six assists, while Davis has tallied 11 points of his own, netting four goals and adding seven assists.

After rarely playing on the same line as freshmen, the two really hit it off on the ice this season.

"We had good years last year, and we're just improving this year," said Quirk. "We're both good players, and we complement each other well."

"You're talking about two of the better skaters up front," Cahoon said of the duo. "They've got great quickness and great speed, and so when the puck gets in transition those two can get after it pretty quickly and create a good back-checking, defensive effort into an offensive play."

Berry out, Bevis in

Defenseman Topher Bevis returned to the ice Tuesday night against BU after missing three games with a shoulder injury. His return allowed Matheson to move back to center where he has played most of the season.

"[Bevis] said he didn't feel any after-effects [following Tuesday's game]," said Cahoon. "When the game was over, he didn't feel any worse than when the game started, so that's good news. I thought he played within himself pretty well. He has to continue to do that and he'll be fine."

While the Minutemen got one of their defensemen back, forward Alex Berry missed his second-straight game.

Berry injured his knee early in the first period of the Nov. 21 game against Vermont, and has not seen the ice since. He practiced in skates Thursday for the first time since the injury, but is absent from lineup for tonight's game against Niagara, and likely won't see action next Tuesday at Merrimack.

"He was on the ice today for the first time, so he's day-to-day at this point," Cahoon said. "We'll see whether we can get him conditioned enough and healthy enough to play next weekend."

UMass starts out ahead of the game

By Joe Meloni
Collegian Staff

Saturday may prove to be one of the most important days in the history of UMass athletics, but for the Massachusetts men's and women's swimming and diving teams it's business as usual.

The Minutemen swimmers head to New Haven, Conn., to take part in the Nutmeg Invitational on the campus of Yale. The Minutewomen swimmers head to Northeastern for a dual meet with the Huskies and both diving teams are at Rutgers for the Rutgers Diving Super Splash.

UMass women's coach Bob Newcomb has his side ready for its matchup with the Huskies. The two teams haven't swam against each other in recent years, but there is certainly familiarity between the two coaches and teams.

"I have a lot of respect for their coach, I really like him, he's one of my good friends in the coaching world," Newcomb said. "Northeastern is one of the better teams that we swim [against] on our schedule."

The layoff over Thanksgiving break set the team back slightly in its training, so Newcomb doesn't expect the women to improve upon their times from the last time out. The times for the women will probably be on par with those of the Boston University Invitational, which NU took part in as well.

"We're in good shape for the meet, we're not going to swim as fast as we did at the invitational," Newcomb said. "Consequently, they're not going to swim as fast as they did either. It's a good opportunity to get people back in the pool and swim."

Since the divers will not be at the meet, Newcomb and NU coach Roy Coates agreed to take the diving scores from the BU Invitational and apply them to this meet. So, the two coaches decided to import the diving results from the Harvard Diving Invitational which took place two weeks ago and apply them to the meet.

"We're actually scoring divers from the [Harvard] Invitational from two weeks ago," Newcomb said. "We wanted to count diving as part of the meet. The coach at Northeastern is a very big supporter of diving, like we are."

The Minutewomen did not fair particularly well against the competition at the invitational, but they did score more points than the divers from Northeastern. Before the meet even begins, UMass holds an advantage. Mary Jenkins had the best score of any UMass or Northeastern diver in one-meter event as well as the three-meter.

The UMass divers head to New Jersey looking to get back on track after the break.

For the Minutemen, junior R.J. Rappe returns from injury. Freshman Byron Johnson and sophomore Matt Hall hope to light up the scoreboard as well. Neither has really made much of an impact for the Minutemen this year, although they are certainly progressing.

Sophomore Karen Upperco leads the charge for the Minutewomen with seniors Mary Jenkins and Melissa Pond and sophomore Sarah Horstmann in support.

UMass coach Russ Yarworth has loved what he's seen from his team in the last few weeks. Prior to the break, UMass put on a clinic at the BU Invitational. The entire unit gave a solid effort and the Minutemen won several events.

After the invitational, Yarworth worked the team hard to make up for the time they would be away from the pool while they were at home. Naturally, the team returned a little lethargic, but Yarworth made sure that wouldn't last too long.

"They're a little beat up. We had the three-day meet at BU then we went right into three days of hard training, and then we had the four days off for Thanksgiving," Yarworth said. "They came back a little sluggish, and it's taken a little while to get back into the routine. You can only peak emotionally and physically so often, and we did that at BU."

The invitational isn't a point of too much concern for Yarworth. The three days of swimming fits in the training schedule he devised before the start of the season. The meet will serve as a way for the swimmers to see where they are in their own progression.

"I'm not really looking for where they place," Yarworth said. "We may swim some great times, but we'll definitely swim hard. Basically the kids chose which events they would swim in. Some chose events they haven't swum in a while, it's good to let them do that to take the pressure off and let them have fun."

Mid-season meets are valuable to Yarworth for reasons other than just swimming.

"We'll be together in the hotel as a team," Yarworth said. "Hanging out in the hotel is good for team bonding. That's the kind of thing that molds a championship program and gets us ready for the end of the year."

Newcomb adds three to roster

By Michael King
Collegian Staff

The Massachusetts swimming family just became a little bit bigger. On Wednesday, women's swimming coach Bob Newcomb announced the signing of three recruits to National Letters of Intent.

Kaitie English, Jessica Starosielec and Annie Fogerty are part of the early signing period for collegiate swimmers and divers.

"We still have a few areas of need for the next recruiting cycle," Newcomb said. "But right now we are really excited about these recruits."

An Oakhurst, N.J. native, English is a sprinter with experience in both the freestyle and butterfly strokes. She swims for the Central Jersey Aquatic Club and was once a U.S. Swimming Sectional Qualifier.

"I think she'll fit in great," Newcomb said. "She's very talented, and I think she will be able to come in and develop like our other swimmers have. She will be a nice addition to the sprint – and the more sprinters we have, the merrier."

Starosielec, of Colonia, N.J., is a member of the Jersey Gators Aquatic Club and specializes in the breaststroke. The high school senior was a Junior National Qualifier and a Sectional Finalist in that stroke. She'll join Commonwealth College, the honors program at UMass, and major in mathematics.

"Jessica will fit a huge need in our program," Newcomb said. "She's a great breaststroker and has times that are in the top five or six in the conference in both the 100- and 200- [yard]. She will also swim the individual medley. She's a kid who's just beginning to realize how fast she can swim. I'm really excited about having her."

The final early signee, Annie Fogerty (Allentown, Pa.) is a diver who will have the difficult task of replacing graduating seniors Melissa Pond and Mary Jenkins. She finished second at the PIAA Class AA Diving Championships in the one-meter event last season.

"Annie is a former gymnast with a very limited background in diving," Newcomb said. "She was an elite gymnast as a child and she's a great athlete. The ones we do very well with in this program are those who develop. [Coach Hixon] has taken good divers and made them great. I think she'll be an excellent addition."

Diving coach Mandy Hixon recruited Fogerty, wresting her away from competition including Cal-Berkley.

"Annie has an amazing amount of potential," Hixon said. "She is one of the top gymnasts in the country and we are looking for great things from her."

Recruiting success in New Jersey is nothing new to coach Newcomb. Five current Minutewomen call the Garden State home, including junior Leighanne Kevil, sophomores Karen Upperco and Emma Putney, and freshmen Joan Baltazar and Kathryne Chalikis.

An interesting parallel, the men's team has three swimmers from New Jersey and two incoming recruits from that state.

Since the team has seven seniors, Newcomb will look to add at least three more recruits before the official signing period ends in the spring. The final list of incoming freshmen is typically announced during the month of May.

Eagles land in Amherst

Minutemen face big test in much anticipated matchup

By Danny Picard
Collegian Staff

All eyes were focused on the projection screen after Thursday's practice at the Cage. As the Massachusetts men's basketball team watched highlights from Boston College's win over Michigan State, you could feel the anticipation throughout the room.

UMass (6-1) hosts Boston College (3-2) tomorrow night at 7:30 p.m. at the Mullins Center, in a game that has been circled on everyone's schedule for months.

The Minutemen are coming off a 72-49 win over Savannah State on Tuesday night, and are currently riding a four-game winning streak. But the Eagles will be one of UMass' toughest matchups so far.

"It's a good test for us," UMass coach Travis Ford said. "This is not a do-or-die game, but it's a great test for us to see where we're at, and to see where we need to improve. We're excited that we're at home, and we understand the challenge at hand, but we're looking forward to playing."

Boston College began the season as the No. 15 team in the nation. Early-season losses to Vermont and Providence knocked the Eagles out of the Top 25 entirely, but back-to-back wins over Rhode Island and Michigan State have kept them in the Travis Ford national poll.

"[Boston College] is a Top 25 team, there's no question," Ford said. "They're not ranked in the Top 25 right now, but they'll get back there. They're a very strong team, and it doesn't matter where somebody's ranked. They're going to be very, very good – one of the best team's in the country."

The Eagles are coming off of a 65-58 win over Michigan State on Wednesday night at Conte Forum. Senior forward Jared Dudley scored 30 points and grabbed 10 rebounds, leading BC to its second consecutive win.

Dudley poses the biggest threat to the Minutemen on Saturday night. He leads the Eagles in scoring with 21 points per game, and averages a team-high 10 rebounds per game.

He will be matched up with UMass forward Gary Forbes, who transferred from Virginia and has a full season of playing experience in the Atlantic Coast Conference. While Virginia did not play Boston College in his two prior seasons in the ACC, Forbes put up stellar numbers, scoring 23 points against North Carolina and 18 points against Duke in 2005.

Shutting down Dudley is a key to victory, but the Minutemen realize that it's going to take a lot more than that.

"Our main focus is trying to win the game," Forbes said. "A lot of people are trying to put us up on a one-on-one matchup, but it's just a game. It's just another game."

"It's not the only focus, but it's obviously a big one," Ford said about shutting down Dudley. "He's one of the best players in the country, and for what he means to their team, he's their most valuable player.

"I like Dudley because he has a complete game," Ford added. "He shoots it, he rebounds, he makes other players better, and he doesn't force things. There's no question, he's the backbone of their basketball team."

UMass also needs to be on the lookout for Boston College center Sean Williams. Williams averages eight blocks per game, and has 23 total blocks in only three games this season. UMass forward Stephane Lasme has 34 blocks in seven games.

Gary Forbes is second on the Minutemen in scoring this season. His 14.1 points per game places him behind senior Rashaun Freeman.

The Minutemen have played well this season, with their only loss coming at the hands of No. 2 Pittsburgh, back on Nov. 18. As a result of its promising play, UMass received two votes in the Associated Press Top 25 poll earlier this week, while Boston College received none.

The Minutemen are still not satisfied.

"We're going to need everybody to play a little bit better than we have been," Ford said. "We have to rebound the ball better. We have to take care of the ball and not turn it over as much, and we need to shoot our free throws better.

"We need a lot of improvement on this basketball team right now. Right now, we're not close to where we want to be. We don't want to be great right now, we just want to be good enough to win games right now, and eventually be great in February and March."

It's only December, and the Minutemen are already playing one of their most meaningful games of the season on Saturday night in front of a crowd that has been waiting years to see UMass basketball return to glory.

"We want to bring it back to the days where the Mullins Center was sold out," Forbes said.

At 6-1, UMass is off to its best start since that Final Four season in 1995-96, but the hype hasn't bothered them yet.

"We just have to go out there and execute, and do what we're supposed to do," Forbes said. "It's a big game, and I think we should come out there pretty excited to play."

They should be excited, because on Saturday night at the Mullins Center, all eyes will be on UMass.

Different season, different story for UMass and BC

Rob Greenfield

The Boston College Eagles are coming to town on Saturday for a 7:30 showdown with UMass at the Mullins Center.

Besides Connecticut, BC was the most high-profile team on the Minutemen's schedule last season, and the Eagles drubbed a hapless and shorthanded UMass squad, 91-62, on Jan. 3.

This year is a different story. The Eagles aren't a vaunted Top 25 team anymore. They are a weak, inconsistent group that will show up on occasion. And with the loss of Craig Smith, the hard-working big man who dominated the interior, the Eagles have taken on the personality of their shot-blocker extraordinaire, Sean Williams.

BC rises and falls with Williams. Their fate rests solely on his shoulders. Captain and swingman Chris Dudley can score as many points as he wants, but without a consistent effort from Williams in the paint, BC should kiss the national stage goodbye.

And Williams won't always be there for his team. BC head coach Al Skinner suspended him for the first two games of the season for a "team rules violation" and then inserted him right back into the starting lineup for the third game of the season.

At the UMass-BC game last season, I saw Williams dancing outside the huddle during a BC timeout. He was shaking his arms and twirling around without a care in the world – during a Division I basketball game.

And while Dudley is the true leader of the team, their success rests on an unreliable Williams, who coasts at his own discretion. It says a lot about Skinner's recruiting style – personality doesn't matter as long as you have the talent.

So where does that leave UMass this weekend? The Minutemen are 6-1 and have defeated the likes of Northeastern, Oakland, Savannah State and Jacksonville State. Their one loss came on the road at No. 4 Pittsburgh, and the Minutemen fought the Panthers to a tie ball-game with four minutes left in the first half before they were overrun by a deeper team.

UMass and BC – the talent levels between the two teams weren't comparable a few years ago. Now, the Minutemen can stand on the same stage as the Eagles. Williams will match up with the UMass front court, and UMass coach Travis Ford might bring Stephane Lasme from the weak side instead of putting him directly on Williams.

UMass will have trouble containing Tyrese Rice, who is averaging 13.8 points and five assists per game. Sophomore Chris Lowe and freshman Tiki Mayben will pair up with the duo of Rice and Marquez Haynes.

Lowe and Mayben are not that solid defensively and have had trouble staying with opposing guards for the first seven games. Both Pittsburgh and Northeastern lit the twosome up from the outside, and Rice – who isn't shooting that well this season but has decent range – can hurt UMass if he's uncontested.

Dudley is averaging over 20 points this season and will not be stopped by anyone on the UMass side, so expect him to get his usual 20-plus output.

So again, it comes back to Williams. The outcome of tomorrow's game is directly correlated

Minutewomen blow Seahawks out of water

By J.M. Friedman
Collegian Staff

After stumbling out of the gate, the Massachusetts women's basketball team (6-1) dominated the second half, pulling away for an easy 73-58 victory over Wagner last night at the Mullins Center.

UMass	73
Wagner	58

Going into the locker room tied at 33 after twenty minutes of play, the Minutewomen needed to sure up their defense and get back to playing fundamentally sound basketball. UMass coach Marnie Dacko was apprehensive of an early letdown because the team was coming off a successful South Florida road trip, while facing a Wagner club that posted a 2-25 record last season.

"In my mind, I'm a realist, I worried about Wagner," Dacko said. "If we come out and execute in the first half like this on Saturday [against Northeastern], we're going to be in trouble. It was a wake up call for [the team]."

It didn't take long for the Minutewomen to do exactly that, waking up and dominating on both sides of the ball, outscoring the Seahawks 40-25 in the second half.

While the gameplan may have been to get the ball inside to senior center Tamara Tatham and junior forward Kate Mills, the Minutewomen had to adapt to a smothering Seahawks zone defense. Midway through the first half, UMass floundered as it attempted to adjust.

"[The struggles inside] were a result of not moving the ball well," Dacko said. "Our focus was to get it inside to Tamara and Kate, so when that didn't happen, we have to move better on the perimeter and we were just standing on the perimeter."

While Mills had another strong performance, shooting six-of-nine from the floor for 15 points, she played a more complimentary role against Wagner. The play of Mills' counterpart inside and the backcourt set the tone for the game.

Junior guard Pam Rosanio led the team with 18 points and nine rebounds, while sophomore guard Stefanie Gerardot tallied 15 points off the bench. The tandem of freshman point guard Kim Benton who "has the green light" from Dacko, and the quickness of the defensively minded sophomore point guard Sakera Young have been major pieces to the early success of the Maroon and White.

"I think we have a lot better leadership [at the point guard position] this year," Gerardot said. "They take the position of telling the offense what to do in a positive way, moving us around, and helping the ball movement which creates our offense and gets us the high percentage buckets that we need."

The continued strong play of senior center Tamara Tatham – 12 points, eight rebounds, eight assists – gives the Minutewomen a formidable duo inside with Mills.

"I think that you have to go to you're strengths and [Mills] certainly is a strength on our team," said UMass coach Marnie Dacko. "Now that Tamara is starting to play well she becomes an added strength inside and takes the pressure off Kate."

Tatham has been somewhat of an enigma in her four years at UMass. She possesses the athletic ability to be a dominant force, but sometimes lacks the intensity that Dacko demands.

"She's somebody that is capable of putting up numbers everyday, she can carry this team, it's up to her. I want her to be mean, I want her to be aggressive. She's still too much of a nice kid for me."

While Dacko has previously stated that she would like to see Mills shoot upwards of 20-25 times a game, the emergence of Tatham and the improved play from the backcourt give the Minutewomen depth in scoring, a necessary component against teams that have the personnel to contain Mills.

Against Wagner, four players scored in double figures, Mills, Tatham, Rosanio and Gerardot.

Despite taking only eight free throws, the Minutewomen found a different way to win last night. Against Northeastern on Saturday afternoon, they will need to play two halves of solid basketball to earn a victory.

UM brimming with confidence early on

By Eli Rosenswaike
Collegian Staff

Winning has the special ability to cure problems and make people forget about the past.

As the wins continue to pile up for the Massachusetts women's basketball team (6-1), memories of three consecutive losing seasons are slowly fading away into oblivion. The Minutewomen have failed to finish a season above .500 since the 1998-99 season, which they ended at 16-14.

With the Maroon and White's continuing success, the losing culture for the women on the hardwood is beginning to change. The team's confidence level the highest it's been in some time, and the squad expects to win each and every time they step onto the court.

"We expect to win every game we go into," junior co-captain Kate Mills said. "I think that's even more the case this year. We're a powerful team and we're going to play as hard as we can and try to win every game. It will be a disappointment for us if we don't."

In their 73-58 triumph over the Wagner Seahawks (1-4), the Minutewomen got major contributions from all over the roster. UMass recorded 23 points off the bench, including a career-high 15 points from sophomore Stefanie Gerardot. Backup freshman point guard Kim Benton continued her hot shooting from the perimeter, draining two early three-pointers to help spark the club off the pine.

The starting five played just as well for the Maroon and White, including a third-straight big game from the team's lone senior – Tamara Tatham. She finished just shy of a triple-double, notching 12 points, eight rebounds, and eight assists. Junior Pam Rosanio added a team-high 18 points. Mills, the team's leading scorer, put in 12 of her own.

The balance in scoring and heady contributions from the reserves has been a key factor this season in increasing the team's chemistry, which is much improved from a season ago.

"We have great chemistry this year," Mills said. "We're all pulling for each other and we want one another to be successful. That attitude has helped us achieve our good start so far."

"I think it's our chemistry, all

No time for a break with Purple Eagles

By Jon Pelland
Collegian Staff

Even when taking a night off from Hockey East play, the No. 19 Massachusetts hockey team still can't let its guard down. Tonight the Minutemen (6-3-2, 4-2-1 HEA) take on Niagara at the Mullins Center. The puck is set to drop at 7 p.m.

Niagara (6-5-3, 4-1-3 College Hockey America) is a very formidable opponent entering tonight's matchup. Despite the fact that it plays in a lesser conference, doesn't mean the Purple Eagles are easy pickings. They come to Amherst riding a seven-game unbeaten streak. It's been nearly a month since the Purple Eagles tasted defeat.

The last time Niagara lost was way back on Nov. 3 at Robert Morris in a 4-2 contest. Its unbeaten streak includes two wins over Alabama-Huntsville who the Minutemen meet in the Dodge Holiday Classic at the end of December – two ties with Bemidji State and a win over RPI last weekend.

"Now we go into a game tomorrow night, it's non-conference, but it's a very important game in our overall schedule," UMass coach Don Cahoon said. "We had better be prepared to play because this is a quality team. They beat Colgate and RPI last week and RPI is building. They're not going to be intimidated by coming in here."

Because of its recent success, Niagara received 38 votes in the USCHO.com/CSTV Top 20 poll this week.

UMass has faced the Purple Eagles three times prior to tonight. The Minutemen won all of those meets with the last one coming in February of 2005. That year, they traveled to upstate New York and came away with a 4-3 victory.

The only current member of the Minutemen to record a goal in that game is Zech Klann. The score was his third on the season, his freshman campaign, and gave UMass a 3-2 lead. Current senior and assistant captain Mark Matheson got the assist. Kevin Jarman also recorded a helper in the win.

Entering tonight's contest, the Minutemen are fresh off a 2-2 overtime tie with Boston University on Tuesday night. The conference point is the first the Mass Attack has ever scored at Agganis Arena.

Sophomore Cory Quirk netted a beautiful goal in the first, and later in the third period, Jarman tied the game with his fourth goal of the season. But Jon Quick's play between the pipes made the tie possible. The sophomore stopped 33 Terrier shots, including 16 in the third period alone.

Many times a team faces a letdown directly following a big performance, but that isn't a concern for the Minutemen. Cahoon said the nature of a team's performance depends on its mental make up, not its previous competition.

"I don't buy that. I think it's a mentality issue," he said. "This is a proposition that starts in September and doesn't end until March or April."

The long haul means the team plays a lot of games. Even though the hockey season is still young, the past few weeks saw UMass play its fair share of games. This week is the second in a span of three weeks that the Minutemen play a Tuesday contest and one on the weekend. Concern lies not from Tuesday to the next weekend. It's the short recovery time from the weekend to the following Tuesday that wears a team out.

Again, Cahoon isn't worried about the physical state of the Minutemen. He says they are prepared for rapid succession of games, but that doesn't mean they necessarily help.

"We train accordingly," Cahoon said. "We don't ask these kids to come out here and spend four hours a day on the ice and grind them down to nothing.

"We work with intensity and duration being critical each and every day. Today's practice session was 45 minutes long on the ice. I want their absolute attention and intensity, and tomorrow is another day – I expect their attention and their intensity."

Even though UMass isn't in the best situation, according to Cahoon, his team must take each game as it comes.

"It's something you prefer not to get involved in as regularly as we have of late, but that's the way the schedule worked out," he said. "It's one more week to get through and we'll have it behind us. We'll take tomorrow night, have a good outing and we can build off of that."

Minutemen continue title run

UMass defeats Wildcats 24-17

By Rob Greenfield
Collegian Staff

The No. 3 Massachusetts football team, amidst an exuberant McGuirk Stadium crowd full of students, children, parents and alumni, won the most important football game on the UMass campus in eight years on Saturday.

The Minutemen (12-1) triumphed, 24-17, over the New Hampshire Wildcats, an annual Atlantic 10 challenger and their fiercest rival.

Like in the two teams' last meeting in Durham – in which UMass edged the Wildcats, 28-20 – Saturday's game came down to one final play.

UNH, down by a touchdown late in the fourth quarter, had a 4th-and-1 situation on the UMass 6-yard line with less than a minute left. Wildcats quarterback Ricky Santos dropped back, rolled out to his left and tried to float a pass to receiver Keith Levan running an out rout.

But UMass linebacker Jason Hatchell batted the pass down and stuffed the Wildcats with 29 seconds left in regulation to win the game – just like his older brother John did in New Hampshire one month ago.

"That was just a great football game," UMass coach Don Brown said. "I was looking around at the environment prior to the game, and I thought what a great testament to New England college football it was to have two great teams in this type of setting and this type of atmosphere."

The Minutemen dominated UNH in the first half of the teams' first meeting of the year, sending the Wildcats

As fall turns to winter in Amherst, take notice of the pond as the temperature falls below freezing: it fails to freeze over completely. The campus pond is heated.

This is not a joke. There are explanations.

The pond used to freeze so solidly that you could skate on it. In fact, the UMass hockey team played its first game on the pond's ice in 1909, according to a 1982 pamphlet entitled "The College Pond and Massachusetts Garden," a publication archived in the W.E.B. Du Bois Library. But the pond hasn't frozen solid enough to skate on since the early 1970s, according to Dick Nathhorst, a Physical Plant capital project manager and resident historian.

So is the campus pond actually heated? It depends whom you ask. Some say it's heated unintentionally.

Water that flows into the pond from Tan Brook, a stream which runs under the Haigis Mall, is warmer than the water already in the pond. Tan Brook is protected from the elements as it flows underground, while the water in the pond, by contrast, is constantly exposed.

Ethan Nedeau, head of Biodrawversity, an Amherst consulting company specializing in environmental sciences, estimates that up to 80 percent of Tan Brook runs underground. As a result of being fed by the warmer stream, the pond is unintentionally heated, according to Nedeau.

Nathhorst said that the physical plant has taken steps to cool the temperature of the pond – not to heat it.

"We've put in several settling and cooling tanks to hold rain water run-off from culverts that run into the pond to reduce the amount of silt that goes into the pond," Nathhorst said. The effect of those projects is to cool the pond more than heat it, he said. And as far as any claims that Tan Brook heats the pond, Nathhorst said the water flow from the brook is so little that the warm water pouring into the pond would have little effect.

On the other hand, Nathorst said there may have been some accidental, minimal heating from leaky steam lines around the campus, but only until workers repaired the steam lines this year. That, he said, should have taken care of that.

"In years past, when steam was sent out to heat the buildings," Nathorst said, "a certain amount of condensate escaped into the groundwater, and the campus pond is part of the groundwater."

Now that those leaks have been plugged, however, there's one less explanation for why the pond still doesn't freeze, so Nathhorst advanced

Deval Patrick attends UMass student forum

By Nicole Boonjakuakul

University of Massachusetts students who attended a community meeting on higher education Friday expressed criticisms towards the nature of the forum.

A transition team, part of governor-elect Deval Patrick's incoming administration, met with community members to address the issue of higher education in the state in the "Higher Education Summit."

The public forum, convened by the Public Higher Education Coalition and the UMass Student Government Association (SGA) allowed students, as well as other members of the public, to voice their concerns on the subject.

"The governor was very receptive with using the transition team," said SGA president Elvis Mendez after the forum. "In an earlier meeting, I saw Governor Patrick actually taking notes and having a sincere interest in his part to give input and formulate a plan."

SGA member Pedro Galvao was surprised that he didn't receive a "bureaucratic brush-off" while speaking to the panel.

"Between 2001 and 2004, the state has cut funding by 32.6 percent, more than any other state in the country," Galvao said to the panel members. "According to the Massachusetts Taxpayer Foundation, we now spend more money incarcerating citizens than on higher education. Students are paying $68 billion more for college, while the state is paying $19 billion less."

"Members of the panel should have directly addressed the audience. It would have been more effective if they actively conversed with us," Galvao said. "But their presence was more than we can ask for."

UMass junior Lenz Bayas, expressed disappointment in the disengagement of the panel from the audience.

"The transition team wasn't taking any notes during the discussion," Bayas said. "I assumed they set up microphones for them to comment, but no one did. It leads me to question, 'why did they come?' and 'is this all going to fall into dead ears?' But I'm trying to remain optimistic," he said.

Bayas, during the meeting, addressed the issue of accessibility for higher education. He believes UMass should "exemplify an institution for the Commonwealth by giving resources and support to high school students to ensure a fair and equitable transition into higher education in the state."

"One drawback of the meeting was when the majority of the audience left after Deval Patrick spoke," said Mendez. "There wasn't enough attention paid to the breakout session afterwards, which is where we go in-depth with the main points of higher education to lay out a foundation for the future."

Another student, who wishes to remain anonymous, said that she

Teach For America founder to speak

By Tucker Merrick
Collegian Correspondent

The Pioneer Valley will host Wendy Kopp, the founder of Teach For America, at Amherst College tonight. The talk, taking place at 7:30 p.m., has been highly anticipated by advocates of equal education for the United States.

Kopp founded Teach For America (TFA) in 1990, as the project for her senior undergraduate thesis at Princeton University. Since its beginnings as a grassroots campaign, the organization has grown to take in 19,000 applications this year, while employing 4,000 teachers in over 25 communities.

The basis of TFA is the idea of doing what you can to change the world for the better. Kopp describes her own experience as a senior in college and the labeling of her and her peers as the "me" generation, a group of students only concerned about their future paychecks.

Instead, Kopp found herself "searching for something I wasn't really finding in terms of making a real difference in the world." With this self-realization, Kopp guessed that she was not alone – a fundamental idea that would come to spark TFA.

"One day, during a conference I had organized in education reform, I just thought 'with all these talented, committed people being recruited aggressively to work on Wall Street, why aren't we recruiting them as aggressively to teach in our country and low income communities?'"

Since these intuitions, TFA now has realistic hopes of becoming one of the largest employers of recent college graduates in the United

Saddam lawyers appeal sentence

Hussein's lawyers formally appealed the death sentence against their client yesterday, for the killing of 148 Shiites.

BY QASSIM ABDUL-ZAHRA
ASSOCIATED PRESS

BAGHDAD, Iraq — Saddam Hussein's lawyers on Sunday formally appealed the death sentence against their client for the killing of 148 Shiites, a court spokesman said.

Five Iraqi judges sentenced Saddam and two other senior members of his regime to death by hanging on Nov. 5 for the killings in the town of Dujail, north of Baghdad, following a 1982 attempt there on the life of the ousted leader.

Under Iraqi law, death sentences are automatically appealed before a higher court within 10 days of their passage. But defense lawyers must file a formal appeal within 30 days, detailing the legal grounds for their action and presenting new evidence that could support their clients' claims of innocence. The lawyers could also make a plea for leniency.

"Today, defense lawyers came to the court and filed an appeal against the death sentence passed against Saddam Hussein and other sentences in the Dujail case," Iraqi High Tribunal spokesman Raid Juhi told The Associated Press.

Saddam's chief lawyer, Khalil al-Dulaimi, said two lawyers on the defense team had submitted the papers. He complained defense lawyers had not received copies of the verdict until Nov. 23, delaying the appeal process.

"Finally we were able to do it," al-Dulaimi said. "We had to hastily prepare the appeal because the court procrastinated in giving us the documents necessary for the submission in a bid to obstruct the appeal process."

Also sentenced to death by hanging was Barzan Ibrahim, Saddam's half brother and Iraq's former intelligence chief, and Awad Hamed al-Bandar, who was head of Iraq's Revolutionary Court when it condemned the Dujail residents to death following the assassination attempt.

Iraq's former Vice President Taha Yassin Ramadan was convicted of premeditated murder and sentenced to life in prison.

Three defendants were given up to 15 years in prison for torture and premeditated murder. The three — Abdullah Kazim Ruwayyid, Mizhar Abdullah Ruwayyid and Ali Dayih Ali — were party officials in Dujail who were believed responsible for the mass arrests.

A local Baath Party official, Mohammed Azawi Ali, was acquitted for lack of evidence.

The nine-judge, higher court does not have a time limit for ruling on the appeal. But the death sentences passed against Saddam, Ibrahim and al-Bandar must be carried out within a maximum of 30 days from the day they are upheld by the higher court.

If the appeals court upholds the sentences, all three members of Iraq's Presidential Council — President Jalal Talabani and Vice Presidents Tariq al-Hashimi and Adil Abdul-Mahdi — must sign death warrants before executions can be carried out.

Jaafar Mousawi, the chief prosecutor in the Dujail case, said in November that the trio could be hanged by the middle of January.

Associated Press correspondent Jamal Halaby contributed to this report from Amman, Jordan.

HIV research gives patients hope

BY ANNE DOBSON
DAILY PENNSYLVANIAN (U. PENN)

PHILADELPHIA — University of Pennsylvania researchers say the future of AIDS treatment – and perhaps the treatment of other diseases – could lie in giving sick patients doses of a genetically modified HIV virus.

HIV – the virus that causes AIDS – attacks T-cells, white blood cells that are critical to the immune system.

In the first in-human trial ever, Bruce Levine and Carl June of the Department of Pathology and Laboratory Medicine, along with Penn Medicine professor Rob Roy MacGregor, took T-cells from HIV patients and inserted a modified virus back into them.

Levine described the engineered virus as "wearing the enemy's uniform."

"The use of HIV itself ... has never been done before," he said.

The trio recently published the results of the first phase of their study, in which they observed the effects of a single injection.

"The modified virus tricks its way into our cells," MacGregor said.

The results were astounding.

June said patient's T-cell levels not only stopped dropping but also dramatically increased in some patients.

The primary objective of the study was to determine the "safety and feasibility" of the procedure, Levine said.

There are high risks associated with such treatment, June said, including leukemia and the possibility of the virus mutating and making the patient sicker.

MacGregor said the five patients who participated in the study had advanced HIV that had failed to respond to other therapy.

They were, in a sense, "backed into a corner," MacGregor said, with nowhere else to turn.

"It's an altruistic cohort of people," Levine said.

It took years for June and Levine to get approval for their study, especially after the death of 18-year-old Jesse Gelsinger from complications of a separate gene-therapy study conducted at Penn in 1999.

The field of gene therapy underwent "intense scrutiny" as a result, June said. He added that, while "appropriate," it put them "on hold for about two years."

If the studies continue to prove safe and effective, the question becomes whether this can be a treatment for the larger HIV-infected population.

"We would have to treat the process as a drug," Levine said. He added that the treatment is not as simple as taking a pill because "everyone's immune system is different."

MacGregor and Levine said modified-virus insertion could become a viable treatment option for HIV patients within 10 years.

Additionally, June said, other Penn researchers are interested in how this therapy could be used for certain kinds of cancers, as well as disorders such as sickle-cell anemia.

Advertising blamed for kids' ills

BY LINDSEY TANNER
ASSOCIATED PRESS

CHICAGO — Inappropriate advertising contributes to many kids' ills, from obesity to anorexia, to drinking booze and having sex too soon, and Congress should crack down on it, the American Academy of Pediatrics says.

The influential doctors group issued a new policy statement in response to what it calls a rising tide of advertising aimed at children. The policy appears in December's Pediatrics, scheduled for release Monday.

"Young people view more than 40,000 ads per year on television alone and increasingly are being exposed to advertising on the Internet, in magazines, and in schools," the policy says.

Advertising examples cited in the statement include TV commercials for sugary breakfast cereals and high calorie snacks shown during children's programs and ads for Viagra and other erectile dysfunction drugs shown during televised sports games.

The statement also is critical of alcohol ads that feature cartoonish animal characters; fast-food ads on educational TV shown in schools; magazine ads with stick-thin models and toy and other product "tie-ins" between popular movie characters and fast-food restaurants.

These pervasive ads influence kids to demand poor food choices, and to think drinking is cool, sex is a recreational activity and anorexia is fashionable, the academy says.

Interactive digital TV, expected to arrive in a few years, will spread the problem, allowing kids to click on-screen links to Web-based promotions, the new policy says.

In response, the academy says doctors should ask Congress and federal agencies to:

— ban junk-food ads during shows geared toward young children;

— limit commercial advertising to no more than 6 minutes per hour, a decrease of 50 percent;

— restrict alcohol ads to showing only the product, not cartoon characters or attractive young women;

— prohibit interactive advertising to children on digital TV.

The academy also says TV ads for erectile dysfunction drugs should be shown only after 10 p.m.

Jeff Becker, president of the Beer Institute, an industry group for breweries, said parents have more influence than advertising on teens' decisions to drink. He also said brewers work to ensure that beer ads appear in adult-oriented media. For much of the sports programming where beer ads appear, most viewers are at least 21, Becker said.

"The American Academy of Pediatrics is wrong to blame alcohol advertising for the actions of underage teens who willingly break the law to drink illegally," he said.

Critics of advertising restrictions say it's a free-speech issue. But the academy notes that several Western countries, including Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Belgium and Greece, limit ads directed at children.

"What kind of society exploits its children and teenagers for money? This is an example of where public health really has to trump capitalism," said Dr. Victor Strasburger, lead author of the policy statement and an adolescent medicine specialist at the University of New Mexico in Albuquerque.

Advertising aimed at children has come under increasing scrutiny in recent years, particularly because of data showing that growing numbers of U.S. children – now about 17 percent – are obese.

Deval Patrick joins students in community meeting discussion

Deval Patrick spoke at UMass Friday, about the importance of higher education.

attended the meeting to become better-informed on higher education.

"I never really heard much on the subject or on the governor's take on it, so I hoped to come here to learn more. But unfortunately, I'm leaving knowing just as much as I knew when I got here. I would've loved to hear Deval Patrick and his team speak more to us about their plans," she said of Patrick. Galvao blames students' lack of knowledge on their lack of motivation to become involved in the issue.

"We can truly get something done if we – students, faculty and the community – unite," said Galvao. "We can prove that the democratic process isn't as removed as people think. We have to get students to be aware of the power of democracy and education."

"This meeting was very empowering for students because it gave them a chance to voice their concerns," said Mendez. "Students are viewed as consumers by the University, so the meaning of education is undermined."

Emma Lang, a member of the UMass Higher Education Coalition, said, "Starting off the first public meeting on higher education at a public institution like UMass means a lot." Mendez, Galvao, Lang and other members of the student body believe this was a great first step in the right direction towards improving higher education.

Judge will not release trial jurors' names

BARNSTABLE, Mass. (AP) — A judge won't release the names of the jurors who convicted a garbage collector in the rape and murder of a Cape Cod fashion writer because of death threats made against them.

Threats were made during three anonymous phone calls to the Barnstable County courthouse switchboard within an hour after Christopher McCowen was convicted on Nov. 16 of killing Truro resident Christa Worthington.

At that time, Superior Court Judge Gary Nickerson refused to release the names and addresses of the seven women and five men of the jury. Nickerson on Friday revealed the reason for keeping the names secret.

"The caller was agitated about the verdict," Nickerson stated, according to a Cape Cod Times report Sunday. "During one of the calls the caller threatened the trial jurors."

State Police and court security are investigating the threats. The judge said the names and addresses will be kept secret until the investigations produce more information.

Eric Gomes, a juror who was interviewed by the newspaper last month, said some of the jurors were concerned about threats made against them.

After the verdict, jurors jointly issued a statement saying they did not yet want to speak publicly about the case.

McCowen, 34, was found guilty of murder, rape and burglary in the January 2002 killing of 46-year-old Worthington, whose 2-year-old daughter was found unharmed by her side. McCowen is now serving a life sentence in prison without the possibility of parole.

The original jury in the case deliberated more than 28 hours over five days before declaring they were deadlocked. Nickerson sequestered them and ordered them to keep trying, but a day later he removed a juror who was recorded talking to her jailed boyfriend about media reports of the case and disparaging police officers, raising concern about bias.

Students voice doubts about pond heating

three other theories for why.

One, Nathhorst said, is a microclimate effect created by the surrounding buildings. The heat given off by the Fine Arts Center, Dubois Library, Student Union and Campus Center create an enclosure on three sides that may keep the pond heated to a certain degree.

A second theory Nathhorst proposed is the presence of the ducks and geese in the pond, and the feces they expel. "They've created a biological reactor," Nathhorst said.

A third theory that Nathhorst proposed is that water run-off from North Pleasant Street and other streets upstream makes its way into the pond, bringing with it salt and other pollutants that prevent the pond from freezing. All these factors have built up cumulatively over the years as the campus has changed from a small agricultural college to one of the largest universities in the Northeast.

Although the campus pond is a natural haven from the congested campus that surrounds us, its creation was not a natural act. When the Old South College burned in the 1880s, University officials worried about other buildings meeting the same fate, according to Nathhorst.

The University president at the time, Henry Goodell, for whom the building is named, suggested a pond be created as a water supply in case of another fire. To build it, students temporarily dammed Tan Brook, and in 1892, the state legislature allocated $1,750 for a permanent dam that created the campus pond we know today.

Since then, the pond has been a center of campus activity. From the annual freshmen-sophomore rope pull in the early 20th century, to the "duckings" of the 1920s – freshmen were thrown off a platform into the pond spread-eagled as punishment for such infractions as speaking to a coed or smoking – to the celebration of the Red Sox's historic victory over the Yankees with a bonfire in 2004, the campus pond has always been a rallying place for students.

Students of today met the idea of the campus pond being heated with mixed reaction. "That's ridiculous," exclaimed senior Amanda Marciano.

Others didn't seem to care. "As long as I don't have to pay for it, it doesn't bother me," remarked junior Tyler Mills.

Some found it humorous. "Let's take a dip then," laughed junior Corey Varga, who seemed unaware of Nathhorst's second theory.

In short, the University takes no measures to heat the pond, but through a combination of environmental factors, it appears that the pond is unintentionally heated.

You were hoping, perhaps, for some kind of massive cover-up and gross misuse of taxpayers money? Perhaps an alien heating grid at the bottom of the pond?

Sometimes things are simpler than they seem.

After Old South College burned in the 1880s, campus president Henry Goodell suggested a pond be created as a water supply.

Speaker to address education

States. The aggressive recruitment of students from all educational backgrounds to work for two years in low income communities has appealed to many, as TFA's success proves.

In an interview last Friday, Kopp advocated TFA's main message, that "We've reached a place in where you're born determines your educational prospects. We think that issue has to be our generation's civil rights issue."

This issue, also discussed by Robert Moses in his visit to the University of Massachusetts campus several weeks ago, is one gaining notice on a national level. In a country that prides itself on public education, people like Kopp have begun to worry about what has been called the "educational gap," a disparity that many students cannot escape, despite their motivation and effort.

"In urban areas, only 40-50 percent of kids are actually graduating from high school. Those kids who graduate...are only performing where 8th graders are in high-income communities," said Kopp.

For the Teach For America organization, this situation is unacceptable. In over 15 years of experience, Kopp boasts that TFA has proven to change children's futures. This fact drives them forward day to day.

"We have found that kids who are given the same educational opportunities excel. It's clear evidence that those disparities don't need to exist. And that really fuels our sense of urgency in saying that we have to enlist our country's future leaders to solve this problem," Kopp said.

She has come to Amherst to do just that. Tonight, Kopp will engage in discussion with attendants about TFA's beliefs, opportunities and approach. Most importantly, she wants to communicate a "sense of responsibility" to those present. To TFA, it is this generation's responsibility to take on this issue of "incredible disparities in our country" and rectify them. TFA gives burgeoning leaders this possibility.

Yet, even Kopp admits that TFA is not universally appealing. It's a difficult job, but one that has great lifelong rewards.

"TFA isn't right for everyone. But what we've found is that people who have real leadership skills and who have just graduated from college can be absolutely extraordinary teachers who literally change the paths of their kids," said Kopp. "We can't meet the demand for TFA core members," she said.

Being a part of TFA requires dedication, hard-work and perseverance. Yet, through it all, these core members can look at what they have done, see its impact and look toward the future.

"We are a truly effective movement to eliminate educational inequity. In order to just that, we need to get bigger and better, and that's what we're going to do. We're trying to grow to become one of the biggest employers of recent graduates, while at the same time becoming still more effective," Kopp said.

She will be speaking at 7:30 p.m. at the Cole Assembly Room in the Converse hall. At the end of Kopp's interview, all she could say was: "I look forward to being there on Monday," and she hopes you are too.

Pressures on Pfizer multiply as it ends development of key drug

U.S. drug manufacturer Pfizer said it was stopping all clinical trials of the cholesterol-controlling drug Torcetrapib.

BY THERESA AGOVINO
ASSOCIATED PRESS

NEW YORK (AP) — Pfizer Inc. will likely slash staff and accelerate merger and licensing deals as the pressure on it to improve its financial performance intensified after the weekend's announcement that the company ended development of a key drug, analysts said.

Analysts differed on how much they believed Pfizer stock would fall when it opened on Monday. Barbara Ryan, an analyst at Deutsche Bank, said she believed the dividend yield of roughly 4 percent would keep shares from a free fall, but another analyst estimated the stock could plunge to $20 a share. Pfizer shares closed Friday at $27.86 on the New York Stock Exchange.

The world's largest drugmaker said Saturday that an independent board monitoring a study for cholesterol treatment torcetrapib recommended that the work end because of an unexpected number of deaths.

The news is devastating to Pfizer, which had been counting on the drug to revitalize stagnant sales that have been hurt by numerous patent expirations on key products. It has said it was spending around $800 million to develop torcetrapib, which was supposed to fill the void when its best-selling drug, cholesterol treatment Lipitor, loses patent protection in either 2010 or 2011. Lipitor sales totaled $12.2 billion last year.

"This is obviously unfortunate because this was the biggest opportunity in their pipeline," said Ryan. "Clearly there is more pressure on them to do cost cutting."

Two months ago, Pfizer said it would detail plans in January to turn the company into a more nimble organization that would go beyond the program announced last year to cut $4 billion in expenses by 2008. Patent expirations will cost the company $14 billion annually between 2005 and 2007.

In the statement Pfizer issued Saturday, CEO Jeff Kindler said the company's pace of transformation will be expedited because of the loss of torcetrapib although he didn't give any specifics. Last week, Pfizer announced it was cutting 20 percent, or 2,200 jobs, of its U.S. sales force.

Ryan said Pfizer may lay off as many as 10,000 people in the near future. Pfizer employs roughly 100,000 people. Ryan added that she expects Pfizer to hike its annual dividend from 96 cents to $1.10 per share in the next few weeks in the hopes of putting a floor on the stock.

But Jason Napodano, an analyst at Zacks Independent Research, doesn't think the yield will be enough to prop up the shares. He points out that at the end of last month, Pfizer pulled out of its deal with drugmaker Organon to develop the schizophrenia treatment asenapine. Napodano said he expected that drug to add $500 million in sales by 2010 while by that time torcetrapib's sales would total $3 billion.

"Losing asenapine was a hole in the boat. Now they have hit an iceberg," said Napodano.

Pfizer reiterated it hopes to introduce six new products to the market by 2010, but Napodano said its pipeline just doesn't have another drug which offers the sales potential of torcetrapib.

Ryan and Napodano both expect Pfizer to act swiftly to bring new products into the fold, either through acquisition or licensing. But Napodano said that until investors see what those products are, he sees little reason to buy the stock. He said he intends to review his "hold" rating on the stock.

Torcetrapib was designed to raise levels of HDL, or what's commonly known as good cholesterol. Pfizer has two other products in early development to raise HDL, using the same method as torcetrapib. It is too soon to say where they will be affected by the compound's demise because it's still unclear what caused the patient deaths in the trial.

Torcetrapib had been shown to raise blood pressure in some patients, but the other two compounds haven't displayed such a side effect, according to Pfizer.

Dr. Steven Nissen, chairman of cardiovascular medicine at the Cleveland Clinic, said it is too soon to say whether the entire class of drugs known as CETP inhibitors is dangerous or if there was something specific to torcetrapib that caused the deaths. He said that Roche Holding AG is developing drugs of the same type, and there's speculation that Merck & Co. is too. Merck declined to say if it had such a drug in its pipeline.

Roche spokesman Darien Wilson said that in clinical trials its compound has shown a risk of elevated blood pressure and that it was slated for introduction in 2009.

CETP inhibitors work by blocking an enzyme that transforms good cholesterol into bad cholesterol, according to Nissen. Lipitor lowers bad cholesterol and initially Pfizer was planning to sell torcetrapib in combination with Lipitor.

Nissen was conducting a trial for Pfizer which was going to use images of patients' arteries to see if torcetrapib helped reduce plaque, fatty deposits that can build up and reduce blood flow. Just three days ago, to tell the public and researchers about the problem.

When's the time to quit?

Nick Milano

While reading the Boston Globe the other day, I came across a story about a man who was terminated from his job for failing a drug test. He had just filed a lawsuit claiming he was fired unfairly. At first glance, I rolled my eyes – a business should obviously have the right to fire employees for using illegal drugs – but then I read the next line.

Scott Rodrigues was fired from the Scotts Co. for testing positive for nicotine. Not marijuana, not cocaine, not even steroids, but nicotine. Nicotine is a perfectly legal drug found in a variety of perfectly legal tobacco products. It is appalling to hear of businesses firing people for partaking in an unhealthy, but legal habit.

The government has recently been more aggressive in discriminating against cigarette smokers. In Massachusetts, smoking limits first affected restaurants, but then a statewide ban on smoking in all workplaces went into effect in July 2004. It is common and funny to see a cluster of people standing outside a business in the winter shivering while satisfying nicotine cravings. These laws were passed to protect non-smokers unwilling to be exposed to the potential health hazards of cigarette smoke.

By most people's standards this is acceptable, but Scotts took it one step too far. Last year, CEO

Entities trying to exert supreme control over their members must be contained, for even one step down the rocky road to tyranny can be one step too far.

Jim Hagedorn announced the company would not permit its employees to smoke at all. The reason for this new policy was rooted squarely in money. By employing only non-smokers, Scotts will no longer be required to pay for the additional medical treatments smoking can necessitate. It is one thing to charge smokers higher costs for health-care, but to discriminate against them to the extent that they are fired for smoking is unfair.

My father has always said that life is unfair, but firing people who smoke is only going to open the floodgates for restrictions of other activities. A skiing accident can mean many broken bones which can force a person to miss work.

Why not fire them for placing their fun ahead of the good of the company? Why not fire a person because they have a bad driving record? Why hire women when you would be required to pay for any necessary maternity leave? Why hire a person whose family has a history of heart attacks at a young age or a long history of skin cancer?

While it does make financial sense, a line must be drawn; these rules go against the basic freedoms the United States has fought wars to protect.

Entities trying to exert supreme control over their members must be contained, for even one step down the rocky road to tyranny can be one step too far. Businesses are not alone in their attacks on the liberties guaranteed to the people by the U.S. Constitution.

When the U.S. Government listens to our phone calls, it does so without warrants in clear violation of the Fourth Amendment. When the president praises the reporters who uncovered the Barry Bonds and baseball steroid controversy, he is defending the freedom of the press. When the president then sends his Attorney General after those very same reporters for refusing to identify their sources, he is not only two-faced, but he is also attacking press freedom. Little by little the government has attempted to gain control over its citizens, and now businesses are following suit.

It appears Rodrigues has the arguments to win his case. He was fired before the new no-smoking policy was even supposed to go into effect. On top of this, the company claims it was offering assistance to people trying to quit smoking, but in Rodrigues' case he was given no such help.

The technical argument for Rodrigues' firing is not the point. One should take notice that companies are doing any and everything they can to make a profit. If that means limiting personal freedoms, so be it.

While hiring people with definite health risks may negatively affect a company's bottom line, this argument can eventually be tied in with the same argument for genetic engineering.

If we have the technology to alter genes to create brilliant, hard-working and healthy people, then why leave anything to chance? People can be designed to work specific jobs, and the human race will become more productive than it can ever be through natural progression.

The conclusion that Scotts' new policy could lead to this may be extreme, but as Rodrigues said, "it also would have sounded extreme to me five years ago if you told me you could be fired if nicotine is found in your drug test."

Bring democracy to UMass

Jeff Napolitano

At the recent Higher Education Summit last Friday, a "roadmap" for advancing public higher education in the state was presented to Governor-elect Deval Patrick. This roadmap, created by students, staff, and faculty, consisted of five specific points: funding, accessibility, affordability, faculty hiring, and democratization of the University.

The Summit was a great success, with Patrick declaring that he would be a "champion" for public higher education. With throngs of members of the University community coming together not only to hear Patrick speak, but to participate in continuing to shape this roadmap through smaller break-out groups.

I attended and helped facilitate the group regarding "democratizing" the University. That particular discussion was not about specific solutions about the budget for the school year, the admissions policies, nor how many new professors we should hire, but instead how we should make such decisions at the University and in higher education. Democratization of colleges is an issue that must take precedence if true change is to be made.

While it is fortunate that we now have a sympathetic governor who has proclaimed his support for higher education, we have to look beyond a system in which members of the University community have to wait for a savior to win the governor's office.

We need a fundamental reconstruction of how decisions are made and enforced at the collegiate level. From the lack of power of student governance, to the way union contracts are approved, there exists an absence of accountability in how the University is run.

About 30 years ago, students pushed for and won a new policy at UMass. The Board of Trustees passed the "Wellman" document, which stated that each campus would have governance bodies appropriate to each constituency: undergraduates, faculty, and graduate students.

These provisions were not made simply for students either. Faculty governance is done at UMass Amherst through the Faculty Senate. In the same way students were given the authority of representing issues regarding student affairs, faculty were given the authority to represent academic and other related issues.

But while the document was a good first step, it was still necessary to modify it every decade or so. Unfortunately, despite these time-staggered improvements, change always fell short of providing true representative power to these bodies. Every recommendation and resolution they pass can be easily dismissed by campus administration without the possibility of appeal. Often times an issue will never be heard by the Board of Trustees.

Furthermore, the Board of Trustees itself is neither a representative nor diverse body. It is composed of businesspeople – some CEOs, some lawyers – most are all richer than anyone who actually attends public higher education in Massachusetts.

Nearly all of the Trustees have never attended UMass, and don't step on any of the five campuses unless a meeting is called there. There are 22 total Trustees, and only five of them (the only ones elected) are all students – and ironically, those five share a rotating two votes. It is not a coincidence that the other unelected, largely white, male, wealthy Trustees have not made diversity, affordability and outreach priorities of what is supposed to be public education.

From the lack of power of student governance, to the way union contracts are approved, there exists an absence of accountability in how the University is run.

Now we face a time when members of higher ed., not only at UMass, but at community and state colleges – have begun addressing these serious issues. People have come together to talk about how public higher education has to change, and they are making some serious suggestions. One of those suggestions has been, and must be, to make the way decisions are made at public campuses more democratic. This means a voice and power to the people who work and learn here.

There's a significant and relevant history here at UMass. It was students, not administrators, who ended the sexist policies restricting female students on campus. It was students, not administrators, who took over the Goodell building when admission rates and support for students of color were in the gutter.

While it was refreshing to hear UMass President Jack Wilson tell Patrick that UMass was striving for "Accountability, Affordability and Accessibility," it is that exact slogan students have been using to demand more justice on campus for the last two years. If we had structures that empowered the University constituency, we'd have a more diverse, accessible and less dysfunctional school.

The governor himself must recognize the merits of self-governance. The system by which there exists a governor's office; the system by which our entire state runs; by which the entire country runs (at least, in theory), is one of representative democracy. Why not here on campus?

There is a danger to treating people, particularly burgeoning adults, like consumers instead of citizens. Education is supposed to enlighten, to create better citizens – it is not supposed to simply cater to the desires of students without allowing them rights and privileges of effecting change. If we're going to make changes at this school, it has to be about process, not just policy. Making public education more democratic is a crucial step.

Battles of December

Dan Nicastro

I love Christmas. I love the entire period from Thanksgiving to New Year's. For me, the Christmas season starts at six in the morning on Black Friday and doesn't really end until the middle of January. My family puts up the Christmas tree the day after Thanksgiving. I have an index card hanging above my desk which lists the times and channels of my favorite Christmas specials. I'm actually listening to my Christmas play list while writing this.

But this year, something is missing. It could be that the temperature hasn't dropped below 55 degrees in what seems like two months, or that I don't notice the distinction between the rampant consumerism of Christmas and the rampant consumerism of the other 11 months of the year. But I don't think that these sufficiently explain what's missing. Instead, I think I miss the War on Christmas.

However, unlike the Iraq War, the War on Christmas really did end with the hoisting of the Mission Accomplished banner.

Last year, Bill O'Reilly told anyone who would listen that retailers who stopped greeting shoppers with the phrase "Merry Christmas" and instead turned to the more innocuous "Happy Holidays" were capitulating to the Atheistic, progressive agenda. Thus began the War on Christmas. Blows came from all sides. Whining liberals claimed that the phrase 'Happy Holidays' conveyed the same message as 'Merry Christmas,' without making those who aren't Christian feel uncomfortable.

But O'Reilly responded in kind, saying that the liberals were just trying to push religion out of government, because "if you can get religion out, then you can pass secular progressive programs, like legalization of narcotics, euthanasia, abortion at will, gay marriage, because the objection to those things is religious-based, usually." Well played, Bill, well played. Everyone knows that when religion and government are separated, everything goes to hell.

When O'Reilly triumphantly raised the Mission Accomplished banner to signify the end of the War, no one cheered louder than me. However, unlike the Iraq War, the War on Christmas really did end with the hoisting of the Mission Accomplished banner, leaving me and dozens of others wanting more. O'Reilly, the original architect of this conflict, has tried to incite some minor skirmishes, hopefully rekindling the spirit of the War on Christmas. Unfortunately, his actions didn't create the kind of fervor he expected.

O'Reilly claimed that he had read an article where a spokesperson for Crate and Barrel announced that the store would no longer wish a merry Christmas to their customers. Unfortunately for Bill, Crate and Barrel's spokesperson actually announced that the store does not force its employees to wish customers a merry Christmas, but it does not discourage it. Also, there is a 'Christmas' section on the Crate and Barrel Web site, further discrediting O'Reilly's claims. But it's OK. Crate and Barrel probably supplies terrorists with contemporary furniture and housewares for their gatherings. Bastards.

After hearing of O'Reilly's defeat, I sunk into a state of deep depression. If anyone could rekindle a war, I figured it would be O'Reilly, but obviously, this war would need some serious star power if it were to succeed in the year 2006. Thankfully, the Christian right knew exactly where to turn to win the hearts and minds of the American people: Chuck Norris.

In order to help first, restart and then win the War on Christmas, WorldNetDaily gave Chuck Norris a blog. Seriously. The headline on the Nov. 27 edition of his blog read: "I have a bone to pick with some Christmas retailers and reductionists." Now it's on. To set up his argument, Mr. Norris told a gut wrenching story of growing up "pretty poor by American standards," and that he became an all American boy whose faith in Jesus helped to overcome this relative abject poverty.

And isn't that what Christmas is all about? Supreme leader Norris thinks so: "Most of all, I still believe what mom taught me, the heart of Christmas is found in a stable not in a store."

Therefore, he orders the public to "inform businesses who keep 'Christmas' alive that you are appreciative and will encourage others to patronize their businesses," and to notify those who don't keep Christmas alive that they won't be receiving your business.

So, once again, Chuck Norris has saved not only Christmas, but he has restored my faith in mankind. I had a rough time coming to terms with the fact that people weren't as concerned with the use of the phrase 'Happy Holidays' as they were with the war in Iraq or the situation in the Middle East. The dangerous thing about an all inclusive phrase like 'happy holidays,' which is used to help combat religious intolerance, is that it could promote peace on earth and good will toward all. And Lord knows that's way down on the priority list.

Rolling back the rules

Melissa Garber

Our school has been getting a bad rap lately. Last year ABC's "Primetime" declared us the most dangerous school in the country. The Princeton Review claims we are the number seven party school up two slots from '05 reports.

The students are rowdy, the school is dangerous, and the administration is unsure of how to handle the situation. Security has been increasing slowly but surely. Frat Row has been demolished. Construction is bringing newer, prettier buildings all over campus to make way for the more civilized student body to come.

But what is to come of the current study body – the wild one that is continuing to give UMass a bad name? The administration's attempts at taming its current population haven't been ultimately successful.

I think it was my seventh grade social studies teacher who first told me that you have to learn from your past. In order for UMass to gain some respect from the academic community, and the stiffs at ABC and the Princeton Review, we need to take another look at our past policies.

The current system is not working, which is why I took the liberty of consulting a past UMass student handbook, provided by a generous professor, to figure out what went wrong. Under the "Residence Regulations for Women," section circa 1950, I unearthed a whole plethora of ideas waiting to be initiated into policy reform.

Far too often we see girls gaining leadership positions and expressing their views. Their behavior is leading to the demise of our school.

According to the handbook, "Every student shall conduct herself at all times in such a way as to uphold her own good name and that of the University." Just imagine a UMass where all the females held up their good name and that of our school. It shouldn't just be a dream.

Students seem to forget that they are representatives of our school. Every misguided action they take part in gives UMass its reputation. Student activism is the leading cause of immorality on campus. Students' protesting for their beliefs creates diversity and individuality – two key culprits in the downfall of this institution.

Far too often we see girls gaining leadership positions and expressing their views. Their behavior is leading to the demise of our school. UMass did not always allow these girls to run wild, reeking havoc and destroying our reputation.

Dormitories were strictly male or female. Past policy dictates seven o'clock curfews for freshmen girls Monday through Thursday. Lights had to be out by 11. Saturday nights granted a midnight curfew.

Every night for the first eight weeks of school freshmen had to follow strict study hours from 7:15 p.m.-9:30 p.m. The handbook rules state, "During these hours, girls are to remain in their rooms for study. There is to be no wandering in the halls or gatherings in the rooms."

These rules promote a rigorous work ethic that if applied to our current situation could thwart all kinds of depravity. We have to get them while they're young. Freshmen girls are impressionable. If we can instill in them these principles before the rest of the degenerate student body leaves their mark, UMass can step above its reputation.

I'm not suggesting, nor does this handbook suggest, we ignore the current populace. Upperclassmen girls are still subject to curfews and other strict rules intended to guide them toward morality.

The only way to curb raucous behavior on campus is to destroy its foundation. Gender separation cannot be limited to dormitories alone. It is only when girls are not bound by restrictions limiting their interactions that UMass becomes the home of debauchery.

We need to take a cue from a former student handbook and enact rules for male callers again. Past rules state, "men callers may be entertained after 6:30 p.m. in the upper-class houses and dormitories on three nights per week." Upperclassmen get Saturday and two days of their choice for male callers. Freshmen on the other hand get Friday, Saturday and Sunday as their male caller days. It is important to make these distinctions so that students know seniority does bear reward.

If UMass is ever going to live down its reputation as a party school, we need to take out the root of the problem. Emphasis needs to be placed on academics not gender equality. Female students cannot be left to their own devices. UMass never had to live down a bad name in 1950 when girls were being marginalized.

It is imperative to the reputation of this institution for female students to be subject to unyielding disciplinary action regulating their independence. How else can UMass escape the top 10 party school list?

Hailing from Amherst, Dino Jr. does Noho

Dinosaur Jr.'s live set wasn't an all-out show stopper at The Pearl Street Night Club on Thursday, as the band lacked a good deal of stage presence and failed to stir-up the crowd with enthusiasm.

By Tim Sheedy

When setting a band like Dinosaur Jr. live, it almost impossible to think about the band as a band that had back in the early '90s. How can band members go from hating one another so much that they don't speak for 10 years, breaking up, getting sober and reuniting, as others do, but it doesn't make sense.

On second thought, it does. Everything surrounding Dinosaur Jr. is not only understandable, it can be sold as a product – a product that involved Especially Dinosaur Jr. that had reunited in the early '00s, bringing an entire generation of kids and knowing this band was very relevant due to extinct record store owners and college radio.

So it pushed, once again, Dinosaur Jr. was performing last Thursday night at Pearl Street Night Club in Northampton. The band rolled on stage at quarter of 10, a time when most club shows now end in cities such as Boston. Almost completely surrounded by amps taller than each member of the band, they played a tight 45-minute set that was mostly composed from its earliest albums.

Playing songs from most of the band's early catalogue makes the most sense, because guitarist and vocalist J Mascis is the only band member in the lineup who released new material in the '00s.

The band was loud, real loud – so loud that the sound was still deafening by the couch near the bathrooms in a room away from the stage. How rock 'n' roll of them.

Besides the loudness factor, the band did not have much of a presence on stage. Maybe it was because the stage was small, or maybe it was just because the members aren't really ones to move around and switch things up.

At times bassist Lou Barlow would play from his knees, but that was really all the movement the band did throughout the set. Drummer, known only as Murph, appeared to be the only outgoing member of the band, smiling as he played. At times he even hollered back at the crowd.

Fans throughout the set would yell out requests and ask for details about the upcoming album, but all of the shouts were wasted. During the set, the band never once disclosed when its new album was coming out, but the band did play some songs from it.

Regardless of being ignored, the audience seemed to enjoy the show. A group of girls danced furiously in front of the stage as if they were hippies at The Doors concert back in the late '60s. Some fans pushed and shoved but not in a moshing sense. A mosh pit at a Dinosaur Jr. show would make little, if any, sense.

In the back of the crowd, Thurston Moore of Sonic Youth was seen talking to friends and fans alike during Dinosaur Jr.'s set. Moore has been friends with the band since the early days and has shared the stage with them many times throughout the years.

In a time when most modern musicians can't rival those elite giants of the past, and money seems to be the only thing keeping rock 'n' roll from going extinct, maybe we should just go along and try to enjoy what we can get.

Professor publishes new book

A look at women's sportswear, then and now

By Sydney Towne
Collegian Staff

UMass Theater Professor Patricia Campbell Warner recently published a book that covers the history of women's clothing trends in sportswear.

On the average college campus, the prevailing attire is ruled more by comfort than by class. It's almost startling to see a skirt after Labor Day, and those present before that first Monday in September can verge on the obscene. Indeed the wardrobes of college students, male and female alike, are a blur of jeans and sweats.

Clothing intended for class, a social life or working out are often differentiated only by the length of ownership, and perhaps the smell. But the casual and gender neutral nature of modern clothing is over 100 years in the making, according to Patricia Campbell Warner, author of the new book "When the Girls Came Out to Play."

As a theater professor at UMass, Warner seems to have found a home for her love of clothing, past and present. Warner teaches primarily about the importance of costuming in giving any play or movie adequate depth, but her depth of knowledge and passion for clothing are expanded from representations of life to reality.

On a recent November afternoon at the University of Massachusetts Amherst campus, Warner agreed to talk about a book she seems deservingly proud of.

"All the thoughts I have been carrying in my head for many, many years are in this book," Warner said.

It is within the theater department that Warner seems to have found a home. It's there she says, "I teach the history of the activities and clothing of women throughout the late 19th and entire 20th centuries."

Warner draws on the technological developments of the Industrial Revolution as an example of how the mass production of clothing, and subsequently the mass marketing of it, made for more streamline looks for both men and women. The Industrial Revolution, she argues, also affected the way the average American's time was spent.

Many television shows are taking a long hiatus after this month. "Lost" has been on the air for a few weeks with "Day Break" replacing it.

In a column a few weeks ago, I mentioned the show "Heroes," which has really taken off. "Heroes" deals with random people who soon discover their latent super powers. Despite the fact that a lot of people are tuning in to see what will happen next, the show is going off the air after this week.

We were recently introduced to a new character who has the amazing ability to zoom in/normalize. She can leave anything within the time span of a few minutes.

Also, episode of "Heroes" is airing this week. After the upcoming episode the show will go off the air until February, which offers time to catch up on all week if you want to get into this show. I suggest you do because it is truly interesting. There are no accidents on "Heroes."

Another show that has become a personal guilty pleasure is "The Tree Hill." I have come to all thinking. There is the show is an extreme soap opera. It is almost a soap opera. The latest episode had Nathan [illegible] championship game for the Ravens because he borrowed [illegible] and the man he borrows from wants him to lose.

Lucas and Peyton finally got together, but the episode ended with him suffering from a cardiac problem. Brooke finally came to terms with Peyton "hooking up" with her former boyfriend.

However, Hailey, the "good one" in every episode, got hit by a car in the last three minutes of the episode, leaving the cliffhanger as to whether or not she and Lucas are all right. "One Tree Hill" aired on Sunday as a repeat and pulled me and my roommate back into it. This show is not going on hiatus yet, but within a week or two it will also begin repeating.

For television watchers, it's tough having these breaks. Hopefully this year will be worth the wait when all the shows come back on the air in February.

As a final note the, "Desperate Housewives of Orange County," is coming back on Bravo this January. This show aired last year with drama and intrigue. It's a reality show that follows a few families' lives as they go about life within a gated community.

They are all extremely rich, which always pulls in an audience. They are all beautiful women that have awesome lives, but they also have problems. I suggest everyone to tune in to this show over break.

Rising musician tells his story of stardom

By Anthony David Ruell
Collegian Staff

The last thing Cleveland-born Joshua Radin ever expected was to become a famous musician. Living in New York as a painter and aspiring screenwriter, he spent his free time singing and playing guitar. Then, three years ago, he was set to appear at an open-mic night. He decided to write an original song, not taking it too seriously.

When Radin's close college friend Zach Braff (writer/director/star of the film "Garden State," in which Radin had a cameo appearance as a pill-popper) heard the song, entitled "Winter," he was immediately intrigued. He took the song to Bill Lawrence, the executive producer of NBC's "Scrubs," the popular television show that Braff directs and stars in. Good fortune came to Radin when Lawrence decided to play "Winter" during the end credits of a third-season episode, "My Screw Up."

The night that this episode aired, Radin's life was forever changed. That night, NBC's Web site was flooded with online visitors from 46 different countries, all trying to find out one thing – what was that song, and who sang it?

"They nearly crashed the site," laughed Radin. Radin's own Hotmail.com inbox was also filled to its maximum capacity from people who had gotten his e-mail address off of NBC's Web site. He describes it as one of the most amazing things he has ever witnessed.

That same night, Radin began his own official Web site. The e-mails continued to pour in, demanding more music. Radin complied, quickly writing four more original pieces. These four, along with "Winter" and a cover of "Girlfriend In a Coma" by The Smiths, became an EP entitled "First Between 3rd and 4th," which he sold off of his Web site. The EP was produced independently by another one of Radin's old college friends, Cary Brothers.

After the EP's release, Radin's fan base grew even wider. He played 10 shows around New York, and then, just six months after the premiere of his song on "Scrubs," he decided to move out to Los Angeles. He received five offers from major record labels in one week's time.

He eventually signed with Columbia Records and released his first LP, which he called "We Were Here." It was released earlier this year and was received overwhelmingly well by fans and critics alike. Rolling Stone magazine gave the album a four out of five rating.

"We Were Here" contains 10 original, freshly-written songs. The closing song, "Only You," is a cover of a song by British band Yazoo (Yaz in the United States). Radin claims that he fell in love with the song's "beautiful melody" and was compelled to record it himself.

As if Braff hadn't helped Radin's career out enough already, he also volunteered to direct a music video for Radin's song "Closer," from "We Were Here." Radin says that Braff's friendship is very close, and he has certainly been a positive force in Radin's life. To return the favor, Radin arranged a deal with Columbia – Braff may use any music written by Radin in any of his projects, free of charge.

Radin also cites many other sources for his musical influence. Artists that he claims to have been most heavily influenced by include The Beatles, Paul Simon, Nick Drake, Elliot Smith and, most of all, Bob Dylan. "(Dylan) basically invented music," said Radin admiringly.

Another part of Radin's life that influences his music is his background in screenwriting; he claims that his music has a "cinematic quality" to it and that the album has a central story, so to speak, about "falling in and out love and those moments in between."

With his busy schedule in Los Angeles, Radin no longer has the time to keep up his own Web site; Columbia has taken it over and is now in charge of it. However, when he finds the time, Radin still updates his MySpace account and his own personal blog on the Web site. He feels that it is important to speak candidly and openly to his fans, simply because "they appreciate it…none of this would have been possible without them."

Radin is finally finishing up from touring around the country since May (with a benefit concert in Hawaii and one final performance in LA on Dec 11). He will have about a month off before he begins his 2007 tour, which will last most of the year.

Radin finds it a bit difficult to balance touring and writing simultaneously. This is likely because he has very specific ways of writing. "I have to (write) in private, with no one else around me," admitted Radin. Nonetheless, he is managing to create some new material, although a new album release for 2007 is probably unlikely with his busy touring schedule.

His music has now been used on five episodes of "Scrubs," as well as the shows "Grey's Anatomy" and "One Tree Hill." You can hear his music on many radio stations, and his album "We Were Here" is on sale in major stores across the country. The music video for "Closer" is available for free viewing on Radin's Web site (www.joshuaradin.com) and also on Braff's Web site (www.zachbraff.com).

Up and coming musical artist Joshua Radin spoke with The Daily Collegian about his first big break, and life in the industry.

And for celebrity news:

Danny Devito is rumored to have been drunk during his appearance on "The View."

Lindsay Lohan is attending Alcoholics Anonymous meetings, according to her mother.

Eva Longoria is now engaged to her boyfriend, Tony Parker – guess those rumors were wrong about them being on the rocks.

Various television watchers are now boycotting "Seinfeld" due to Michael Richards's racist outbursts during a comedy show a few weeks ago.

Susan Sarandon spent a night "In the Valley of Elah" with Jonathon Tucker – the two joined Paul Haggis' mystery thriller as a mother-son duo.

Charlize Theron and Tommy Lee Jones round out the cast in the movie based on Mark Boal's Playboy article "Death and Dishonor." Filming kicks off this month in New Mexico.

John Krasinski steps out of "The Office" for a movie. He joins George Clooney and Renée Zellweger in Universals' "Leatherheads," a romantic comedy about professional football in the 1920s. Krasinski steps in as a college football sensation when Clooney rolls cameras in the spring.

Various shows from E! are available on itunes, such as "Dr. 90210," "The Girls Next Door" and "The Soup."

Though Ben Affleck recently said he's eager to have more children, Jennifer Garner told "Elle" magazine that she is most definitely not pregnant, just a little chubbier than usual. The actress, who appears on the cover of the magazine's January issue, claims she is "as physically unfit as [she's] probably been in [her] whole life."

'Fast Food Nation' served with a side of disgust

By Christina King
Collegian Staff

Sick. Disgusting. Filthy. Cheap. Phony. These words not only describe fast food, but the corporate America that the gritty political film "Fast Food Nation" exposes. The film opens with a scene in a fast food chain that closely resembles the ever so popular McDonald's but bears the name "Mickey's."

People are there eating with a smile, quickly devouring the "Big One," blissfully ignorant to what they're putting into their mouths. To avoid any legal issues, the film came up with the name Mickey's for the fast food chain that is the focus of the film.

Like the well-known chains, such as McDonald's and Burger King, they too have meals with names invented by money making market-

ers. The "Big One" appears to be McDonalds' version of the Big Mac, which bares another subtle meaning. Their version of the Kid's Meal is called the "Itty Bitty." Although they bare different names, the Mickey's Meal is all too familiar.

To boost the appeal for audiences, Eric Schlosser, the muckraking journalist and author of the best-selling book "Fast Food Nation," adapted the screenplay to take on a more fictionalized, narrative form rather than a political documentary.

The story ties together the lives of several people in the town of Cody, Colorado, affected by and actively involved in the Mickey's empire. One character, a Mickey's marketing director played by Greg Kinnear ("Little Miss Sunshine"), is sent to Cody to investigate the recent discovery of cow feces in their meat. Another, a Mickey's cashier played by Ashley Johnson ("Growing Pains"), realizes the disadvantages of working in a fast food chain. Other characters include illegal Mexican laborers played by Wilmer Valderrama ("That 70's Show") and Catalina Sandino Moreno ("Maria Full of Grace") working in a hazardous meat-packing plant that supplies Mickey's. The acting was mediocre at best. Kinnear's performance topped all others.

There were surprising cameos by Bruce Willis, who played the part of a meat supplier who doesn't mind if there's "a little shit in the meat," and Ethan Hawke as the liberal uncle against uniformity.

The most amusing cameo was that of Avril Lavigne, who played an activist college student. Hawke's character came off a bit overly preachy, and Lavigne I pray will venture only within the confines of the music business. But Willis's tough-guy persona worked out great in representing capitalist America.

Although Schlosser and director Richard Linklater ("A Scanner Darkly") wanted to present the issue from different perspectives, it may have been more effective and less muddled if it was presented through the lives of the two main groups: the marketing director of Mickey's and the illegal aliens working in the plant. Because there were so many characters and sub-plots, no one was really given much screen time, so character development was minimal. Then again, the real purpose of the film was to raise awareness of a disgusting trend in America. Lazy and cheap: the pride of this nation. We're too cheap to hire legal citizens, so we hire the hoard of illegal aliens that crosses the border daily, free from responsibility and liability, and train them so poorly that cow feces manage to wind up in the meat. Of course the executives don't mind as long as the labor remains cheap because their burgers continue making them a fortune, and nobody finds out. Unfortunately for them, their dark secret has leaked. "Fast Food Nation" exposes the dark side of the all-American meal with plenty of graphic images. It wasn't the most pleasant film to sit through. While the final scene of the "kill floor" in the meat-packing plant was disturbing on several levels, not every scene was filled with such explicit images.

The subject matter was the most unsettling. Every scene shot in the meat-packing factory caused a build up of anxiety, knowing there was inevitably going to be a graphic display of someone getting injured in such a death-trap. However suckering the film may be, it added to its effectiveness in spotlighting a problem that's in dire need of attention. It has to scare people in order to grab their attention. Sex, lies and violence – this film has enough to satisfy the typical American just as a McDonald's Big Mac does. It lacked real emotional force and talent, leaving the pay-off to be weak. For those who have weak constitutions, this film isn't suggested unless by tolerating some scenes with the occasional eye-covering.) Watch the film because it's an important political film, not because of a need for emotional awe.

Wilmer Valderrama stars as a Mexican illegal immigrant in Richard Linklater's new exposé film about the fast food industry in America.

Professor writes book on clothing trends

the concept of leisure time arose and with it a need for clothing that allowed ease of movement and durability. Beginning with croquet and expanding to skating and tennis, women were gradually allowed to participate in these social activities and, therefore, began to need clothing that was appropriate as well.

Warner's book adds to this analysis a wealth of details about the contributions of women's colleges, World War I, popular magazines and sewing machines. She makes a point to provide interesting details and an unexpectedly generous amount of photos and drawings, adding color to what could have otherwise been merely a textbook chronology of women's clothing.

The ease with which Warner uses female sportswear to explain American culture and vice versa, makes a connection seem obvious. She said, however, that "People take clothes for granted…nothing expresses society and where society is more than the clothing people wear."

Although her contributions can be found in many anthologies on dress and costuming including the "Encyclopedia of Clothing and Fashion," this is her first solo work. Warner explained, "Yes, I've written chapters…but no, it is a very different feeling. It made me feel good to finally get it done." This book, "the one that I published is the one I've lived with for twenty years." She is not, however, without topics for subsequent books.

The first of two planned is about a subject she knows well: clothing and movies. It is the focus of her class "Plays to Movies: Costume Interpretation." She feels the need to explore it more fully because as she said, "I realize that no one ever got it right," and perhaps because her inner critic needs a voice. About costumes in period movies Warner said, "I have a tendency to roll my eyes."

The second appears to embrace an autobiographical side of Warner that this book merely hinted at – clothing of the 1950s. A child of that era she said, "You can't help but remember your own clothes in any way but autobiographical."

When a woman loves and respects fashion as much as the exquisitely accessorized Warner does, it makes sense that any study of modern clothing would have to include her own interactions with it. Personal stories about the embarrassment of mid-century gym clothes pepper "When the Girls Came Out to Play."

The decision to include not only her own, but her peer's opinions of the clothing they were forced to wear, was a delightful one. It added humor and gave the women about whom it was written a voice.

The personality of the professor-turned-author and the relatable topic combine to make this book one wouldn't mind being assigned to read. And as any college student would most likely do the reading while lounging in a perfectly aged t-shirt and sweats, the evolution and acceptance of modern sportswear is something one should appreciate.

into halftime with a 21-3 deficit. This time around, it was a little different.

UMass' sophomore quarterback, Liam Coen, and running back Steve Baylark got the Minutemen rolling in the opening drive.

The Minutemen suffered a scare on the opening kickoff when Courtney Robinson fumbled on the return and E.J. Barthell recovered the ball at the Minutemen's 2-yard line. A false start moved UMass back to the 1-yard line before Coen and Baylark went to work.

Two Baylark rushes on the ensuing downs put UMass in a 3rd-and-7 jam, but Coen bailed his team out with a perfect pass to wideout Brandon London down the left sideline for a 22-yard gain and a first down.
